Undercurrent of antisemitism at Wall Street protests

Dan Klein
JTA

NEW YORK — The most unloved man in Zuccotti Park, the epicentre of the Occupy Wall Street protests, isn't a Wall Street banker but a fellow who wears a baseball cap and carries signs denouncing "Jewish bankers."

The man, who told Slate his name is David Smith, comes almost daily to broadcast what he believes are God-given messages against Jews, Zionists and U.S. President Barack Obama, whom he calls a "Jewish puppet." One recent placard read "Google: Zionists control Wall Street."

Organizers and activists have tried to provide a counterpoint when Smith speaks to reporters and gawkers, holding their own signs deriding him. "A-hole," reads one. "Who's paying this guy?" reads another. In one video, demonstrators nearby can be seen chanting "Nazis, go home!"

"Everyone's been trying to get rid of him," said Dan Sieradski, a Jewish activist who organized a mass Yom Kippur service at the site of the protests, which are now entering their second month. "But the police say he has a right to stay there, and he does."

Though the man is one of the few overtly anti-Jewish protesters at the site in New York, he is a sign of an undercurrent of antisemitism that runs through some of those protesting at the Occupy Wall Street gatherings across the United States.

While movement organizers and sympathizers are quick to argue that such protesters are a fringe element, they are a reminder of the small proportion of Americans that still clings to the canard that Jews control the nation's money. According to the Anti-Defamation League, 16 per cent of Americans hold antisemitic beliefs about Jewish control of the banking system.

"With any kind of populist movement, you're going to have that kind of expression popping out," said the ADL's civil rights director, Deborah Lauter. "But this is a particularly sensitive one in the Jewish community, and we have to make sure it doesn't take hold."

For the Jewish activists who see great merit in the Occupy Wall Street protests and have been trying to amplify their impact, they have had to do double duty tamping down antisemitic and, in some cases, anti-Zionist expressions. That task has gained greater urgency as critics of the protests – within and outside the Jewish community – have pointed to the antisemitic ferment of a few to disparage the larger anti-Wall Street movement.

The conservative Emergency Committee for Israel released a video calling for Democratic leaders to denounce the protests. It featured both Smith at Zuccotti Park and a young New Yorker named Danny Cline, who was caught on video telling a yarmulke-wearing man to "go back to Israel." Cline later claimed to be Jewish and a descendant of Holocaust survivors.

Radio personality Rush Limbaugh said the protesters' rants against bankers and Wall Street were coded references to Jews. Similarly, Washington Post columnist Jennifer Rubin accused politicians and the media of hypocrisy for a lack of coverage of the antisemitic content compared to coverage of racism at Tea Party events.

For their part, Jewish activists involved in the protests acknowledged that an Israeli organizer of the social protests that swept Israel over the summer was booed when he came to speak at Zuccotti Park. But, they noted, the heckler was kicked out.

"Anti-Zionists come and try to make it about Israel," Sieradski said. "We accept them into the movement, but we don't allow them to hijack the movement."

Overall, the Jewish protesters argued, the focus on antisemitism is exaggerated.

Day 14 of the Occupy Wall Street protest

"Wherever you go to a public demonstration," said Rabbi Michael Lerner, editor of the left-wing Tikkun magazine, "you always have a few nutcases standing on the side."

Lerner, who is based in San Francisco, helped organize Occupy Wall Street protests in Washington state. He said the strategy should be to ignore the occasional antisemite.

"Unless you're a movement that beats up outsiders, you're going to have people on the periphery show up," he said.

But detractors say the antisemitism is not just a fringe element. Among other things, they cite support for the protests by the Canadian magazine Adbusters, which was widely condemned for a 2004 story that focused on the influence of Jewish neoconservatives in drumming up support for the Iraq war and featured a list of 50 neoconservatives with asterisks next to the names of the Jews. In 2010, the magazine published a story comparing the Gaza Strip to the Warsaw Ghetto.

Protesters say that beyond promoting the protests in its magazine, Adbusters has had no influence on their actual content.

Defenders of the protests also note that some Tea Party rallies have had offensive messages, including Hitler analogies. Pressure by Jewish organizations and others have helped marginalize those voices.

After being inundated by concerned calls after antisemitic manifestations at the Occupy Wall Street protests, the ADL issued a statement saying it is keeping an eye on the protests but does not believe that there is significant antisemitism.

"While we believe that these expressions are not representative of the larger views of the OWS movement, it is still critical for organizers, participants and supporters of these rallies to condemn such bigoted statements clearly and forcefully," ADL national director Abraham Foxman said.

Sieradski told JTA that protesters are printing pamphlets explaining how to confront the antisemites. He also accused critics of crying wolf and making it harder to fight real antisemitism.

"The only people who yell at us are Jews calling us traitors and self-hating Jews," Sieradski said. "We haven't encountered many antisemites, but we're still worried about it. It is in every part of our lives, and we need to be ever vigilant."

Talented 'mentalist' has an otherworldly gift

Haim Goldenberg

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Haim Goldenberg, a "real-life mentalist" and the star of the critically acclaimed television series GoldMind, can (seemingly) bend spoons, read your mind and drive blindfolded through Toronto traffic.

But he'll be the first to shoot down theories that he possesses supernatural powers and argue that there is no such thing as a psychic.

He said his live shows always begin with a question for the audience: "Who believes in mind-reading…" and as people begin to raise their hands, he adds, "and all this kind of bullshit?"

Thirty-six-year-old Goldenberg, who moved from Israel to Toronto in 2004, said he explains to his audience that it's not real.

"I don't have secrets in my show," he said, adding that he's opposed to those who "take advantage of people," by charging them to heal them, predict their future or relay messages from dead loved ones.

"This is terrible in my opinion. Maybe I'm wrong."

So Goldenberg has chosen to use his talents for good rather than evil.

With a successful, Gemini-nominated reality show under his belt, as well as consistent corporate gigs and live shows, he said he's happy to entertain and inspire his audiences, not swindle them.

He's also got a lecture in the works on the subject of achieving skills and goals through the power of believing.

If anything, Goldenberg's dismissal of supernatural psychic abilities makes his talent that much more mysterious and impressive.

If he wasn't born with some kind of otherworldly gift, how has he succeeded in tapping into a part of the brain that eludes the rest of us?

Within minutes of speaking with Goldenberg, it was easy to see why his show, GoldMind, and his live shows have been lucrative.

He possesses the charm, mystique and talent required by a performer, without the old-school, magic-show smoke, mirrors and over-the-top hand gestures.

Despite the success of the first season of GoldMind, which debuted on TVtropolis in 2009, it has yet to be picked up for a second season.

"We're working on the second season. We don't know if it's going to be with TVtropolis because we're trying to sell it in the U.S. now, so it's a very long process," Goldenberg explained.

For those wanting to catch clips of the first season, search YouTube or his Facebook page.

His enthusiasm for mentalism was inspired by famed Israeli mentalist Uri Geller when Goldenberg was just six years old.

When he first saw a television performance by Geller, bending spoons, "for me, he was like a superhero."

After the show, Goldenberg grabbed a spoon from his kitchen, and tried to emulate his new-found hero.

He did this every day for two years.

One morning, Goldenberg woke up and opened the drawer where he kept his spoons. With his eyes closed, he grabbed a spoon and focused his energy on bending it.

"After five seconds, I felt something strange, but I didn't want to open my eyes. Suddenly, I saw that the spoon was bent. I was amazed," he recalled.

"The real story is that one day, my mother took all the spoons in the kitchen and bent them because she was tired of seeing me try everyday."

But she only told him three years ago, years after he began performing the feat in front of countless audiences.

"I explain almost everything I do with my show, but [spoon bending] is the only thing I don't explain."

Geller used to proclaim that his abilities were the result of supernatural powers. Goldenberg insists that anyone with unwavering persistence and some talent can train themselves to do the things he does.

"And even though I have these abilities, I'm not above anybody. Some mentalists or magicians think that because they can 'read your mind,' they are better than you."

He said one of the skills he acquired is learning to read people's body language, but he's not talking about the way a shy person might sit with their arms crossed over their chest.

"Body language is something that you need to feel. It's more like intuition. If you want to get better at reading people's body language, you have to practise again and again and again."

To demonstrate, Goldenberg handed me a six-sided die and asked me to choose a number. He said that based on the numbers I chose, he'd be able to predict future decisions.

I chose four. He asked me to either stick with four or chose a different number.

I flipped the die over and saw number 1.

"Now what you did was very simple," Goldenberg said.

"You were holding the die like this, you turned it over and chose number 1. I can see the way you are thinking."

He asked me to choose again. I stuck with number 1. Next, I chose five.

Goldenberg explained that based on the information I gave him, based on the way I chose the numbers, my body language, the pattern, he would be able to predict the next two numbers I would choose.

I chose another number and covered it with my hand.

"I know that you are very spontaneous in that what you see is what you take," Goldenberg said. "But this time, you were different. You chose probably number 3.

He was right. He asked me to do it again.

"This time, you were thinking about what to do and you tried to confuse me. You went to number 1 again."

He was right.

"It's about choices. It's your choice, but I needed to learn the pattern of the way you are thinking. It's not that I read your mind, but based on [the previous numbers] and based on other things, I knew the others."

On the other hand, he said he also relies on an indescribable feeling.

It's like trying to explain the feeling of moving your hand from the left to the right, he said.

"My brain tells my hand to move, but I don't know what I feel. It's natural."

It may feel natural to Goldenberg, but being on the receiving end of one of his demonstrations feels anything but.

After our interview, he asked me to doodle something on a piece of paper, fold it up and put it in my pocket without showing him.

He told me that I might see that same image somewhere at some point later in the day.

I wasn't too impressed, because I often doodle that same image – a flower – on my notepad, so I was certain that I would see it later. But I wasn't prepared for an e-mail from Goldenberg a couple hours after our meeting.

Attached to the email was a photo of the exterior of the Starbucks coffee shop where we meet for our interview.

On the bottom right corner of the image, Photoshopped onto an electrical box, was a hand-drawn flower eerily similar to one I had drawn on the piece of paper that was still folded up in my pocket. [See above]

Awesome.

Between his show, his live performances and his new lecture, Goldenberg said his ultimate goal is simple: to help people believe in the power of believing.

"I cannot help you, I cannot heal you, but I can convince you that you can help yourself. I really believe that people can do miracles for themselves."

"תגידי מה עובר עליך?" טלי מביטה בי במבט מצומצם וכועס. אני אוחזת בחוזקה בספל הקפה שלי ולא מישירה מבט. "למה התנהגת אליה בצורה אנטיפתית כל כך?" היא חוקרת. אני מתבוננת בדמותה המתרחקת של ענת. "הייתי די חביבה אליה." אני עונה לבסוף.

טלי: ממש. רק בגלל שהבן אדם לא התחנף והתלקק אלייך, ולא הרחיב בתיאורי הסופרלטיבים כלפייך, את חייבת להיות ביץ'? מותר לדבר על עוד דברים, יו נואו. נגיד עלי, נגיד עליה.

אני: אה באמת? אתן בכלל לא התייחסתן אלי. כל הזמן דיברתן על דברים שלא הבנתי, על דברים משעממים, וצחקתן מבדיחות פרטיות. כאילו אני לא קיימת.

טלי: תודה רבה שהבת שלי היא דברים משעממים לגביך. לידיעתך, ענת מאוד מתעניינת בבנות שלי, בקריירה שלי, בבעלי, אפילו בעציצים שלי!

טלי: אל תסלפי סתם דברים ברישעות. הבנת יפה מאוד למה אני מתכוונת.

אני: ועוד לשמוע שהזמנת אותה לארוחת ערב שבוע שעבר? הייתי בהלם. בשוק.

טלי: אסור לי להזמין חברה לארוחת ערב? מה, יש לך ריבונות על מדיניות האירוח אצלי? אני חושבת שזה הזמן שתשמעי את זה: הזמנתי גם את סיגי.

אני: כשבאנו לקנדה היינו כל כך לבד. ואז פתאום מצאתי אותך, והרגשתי שיש לי עוד קצת משפחה. אנחנו תמיד ביחד בחגים, בימי הולדת, והנה את מתרועעת לך עם עוד אנשים ומי יודע, יום יבוא ואני כבר לא אהיה חשובה.

טלי: לא, את חייבת להפסיק עם זה. את חייבת לעשות עוד חברים. זה כל כך מעשיר. תזמיני, תפתחי את הלב, את הבית. הנה לדוגמה בואי נקרא לענת, היא עדיין עומדת שם ליד המים הקרים. תני לה צ'אנס. אני קוראת לה.

טלי: נינה היתה במצב רוח על הפנים. עבר לה. בואי שבי איתנו עוד כמה דקות.

אני: סליחה אם הייתי קצת פוצה, בדיוק הרהרתי נוגות על מהות החיים.

ענת (מתיישבת): לא שמתי לב בכלל. אז טלי מה נסגר עם ההרצאה על גידול שתילים בקרקע לא מוזבלת בחומר אורגני, בעד ונגד?

ענת (בוחנת אותי מחדש): ברצינות? אז את בעד או נגד?

אני (במסתוריות): או, זה לא על רגל אחת... בנושא כזה חשוב מאוד לדייק.

ענת (קמה): גדול. אז איך נעשה את זה? שאני אבוא אלייך עם כל הגרפים וזה?

אני: בטח. קחי את הטלפון שלי. נשמח לארח אותך אצלינו. עם כל הגרפים וזה.

טלי (כשענת עוזבת): יופי. כל הכבוד לך. "נשמח לארח אותך אצלינו". ואותי חשבת לצרף לאירוח הזה בכלל? זהו? מצאת לך אהבה חדשה? בוגדנית!

Does intimidation divide us?

In a previous column, I asked readers to send me questions and ideas about our community, things we rarely discuss, such as how inspiring is our community or how warm is it?

I received e-mails asking poignant questions, and I appreciate the response. In this column, however, I will comment instead on a request that came from all those who communicated with me, which was to remain anonymous.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Why? What lies at the core of our community's emotional state that causes us to fear open discussion and debate and a challenge to our leadership and authority? Could it be we are a community with a bullying mentality and we are managed by fear? Is it possible our efforts to counter such behaviour should be directed at our adults, rather than just the children? If not, why is the membership of the Toronto Jewish community petrified at the idea of standing out?

As someone who has been bullied and has been a bully, I offer this theory.

Here is an example. I've worked with a particular affluent person, a leader in our community, assisting his family, and done a good job. Along the road, challenges arose, as they will, having to do with money. The individual threatened a number of times to pull support if I did not do what he wanted, when he wanted, how he wanted – even though his position was wrong (I double- and triple-checked with others). Sometimes I would acquiesce, because it meant losing funding and support if I didn't, and other times I would refuse, always knowing standing up to him could cost Ve'ahavta.

I have watched my own behaviour over the last few years, after being told I can push too hard when trying to get my own way. While there is a fine line between passion about an issue and aggression, I determined that I needed to relax my insistence on getting what I want when I am in a position of power or control. I have also learned that I was often harsh with others as a child and a teen, and I carried this into my adulthood. As difficult as it is to admit, I have bullied, and hence been a bully.

Have you been bullied as an adult? Have you bullied? Ask someone you love or work with.

Are we afraid to express our thoughts about our community because we might be castigated or ostracized? Could it be our eastern European roots planted by brash and controlling individuals that established this pattern? What would you say about the nature of our major organizations, those that set the tone for the character of the Jewish community? Do they allow for debate and discussion on key issues of growth and philosophy? Do our religious and secular leaders encourage differences? Is the Toronto Jewish community a rainbow of acceptance, or surrounded by a partition erected by intimidation?

Blog about the Toronto Jewish community. State what's on your mind. Do so with a group so that you're not the only one standing out. Create a committee of individuals whose opinions are worthwhile. Challenge authority.

It's time for our community to catch up with the world through protest and debate, and ultimately arrive at a healthier place where our members are courageous in expressing a multiplicity of ideas.

P.S. Adult bullies, get counselling. Let's stop putting this all on the kids.

N.S. premier talks trade with Israel

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Nova Scotia Premier Darrell Dexter is full of enthusiasm, optimism and hope after heading a one-week trade mission of provincial business and educational leaders to Israel.

"It was extraordinarily positive, and certainly successful, as even those who went with modest expectations learned much and made contacts through a great spirit of co-operation," he said on his return last Friday. "The Israeli government went out of its way to accommodate us."

A group of a dozen Nova Scotians, representing education, technology, medical research, shipping and real estate, made the trip, meeting their counterparts and discovering opportunities that exceeded their initial thoughts.

Dexter was particularly impressed with Israeli President Shimon Peres who, the premier said, "was well-briefed on Nova Scotia, knew what we were about and spoke in very visionary terms about what working together could provide. He was enthused about our technology and research opportunities and said, 'Bankers deal with yesterday's money. Research and technology deal with tomorrow's money.' I thought that was a visionary way of taking advantage of your research asset."

Meetings were held with officials at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology and the Weizmann Institute of Science, who, Dexter said, "are masters at taking basic research and transferring it to commercial products. From them, we learned methods of doing this and hope to use it in our research areas."

Arms Charges

MONTREAL — A woman active in Montreal's Muslim community is facing a charge of illegally exporting arms to Lebanon. She pleaded not guilty Oct. 20. Mouna Diab, 26, a Canadian citizen, was arrested in May after AR-15 assault rifle parts were allegedly found in her luggage before she was to fly to Beirut. Other parts were allegedly shipped separately. She's been an outspoken critic of the Harper government's Mideast policy. Regulations in place since the 2006 Israel-Hezbollah war bar Canadians from supplying "directly or indirectly, arms and related material... to any person in Lebanon," in keeping with a UN Security Council arms embargo. Diab is due back in court Nov. 10.

Quake Relief Sought

TORONTO — Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish relief organization, is partnering with the Jewish Coalition for Disaster Relief and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) to send aid to Turkey after the 7.2 magnitude earthquake there Oct. 23. Funds raised will be directed through the JDC in partnership with the Turkish Jewish community. More than 450 people were killed and more than 1,000 injured in the quake. The priority is to provide basic relief and the groups will be allocating $50,000 to buy 1,000 wood-burning cookers/heaters to be distributed in the region. Turkey previously turned down outside offers of aid, including from Israel.

New Ponzi Charges

TORONTO — New fraud charges have been laid against a Toronto man in connection with an alleged Ponzi scheme. Police arrested and charged Tzvi Erez, 44, with 10 counts of fraud Oct. 25 after 10 complainants came forward with allegations they were bilked of $9 million in total between 2005 and 2009. Erez had previously been charged in connection with an alleged $27-million Ponzi scheme dating back to 2003 that targeted members of the Jewish community, but those charges were dropped last year, at least partly because the courts lacked the resources to deal with a long fraud trial, a lawyer for an alleged victim said. Police said investors were promised large returns in exchange for investing in Erez's printing business, which later went bankrupt. Erez is due in court Dec. 6.

Singer Died of Alcohol Poisoning

LONDON — Grammy Award-winning R&B and jazz singer Amy Winehouse died of alcohol poisoning, according to the results of her autopsy.

Amy Winehouse

A coroner's report said Winehouse, 27, died with five times the legal drunk-driving limit in her blood. The court hearing Oct. 26 in London described her final days and struggles with alcohol addiction, which had persisted even after she stopped using illicit drugs in 2008.

Her parents were at the hearing but didn't speak to the media. Through a spokesperson, they said it was a relief "to finally find out what happened to Amy."

Winehouse died July 23 in her London home.

WORLD

Speech Offends

PORT OF SPAIN — U.S. Jewish groups criticized a Catholic archbishop in Trinidad and Tobago for making anti-Jewish remarks in an Oct. 24 sermon. Archbishop Edward Gilbert, leader of the Catholic Church in the capital Port of Spain, compared politicians in the southern Caribbean republic to Jews, who he said only care about their own. "In many cases in this country, there are people who love one another, who are compassionate, but they have the mindset of the original Jewish People. They are good to their own... but they have not universalized the concept of love," he said. The Anti-Defamation League called his statements "a disturbing repackaging of ancient anti-Jewish canards and supersessionist beliefs."

Treatment home offers an oasis of hope for troubled teens

Youthdale staffer Annik Scholz, a child and youth worker, leads the kids in the celebration of Sukkot at the Youthdale Jewish group home. For privacy reasons, only the backs of the residents are seen.

Rena Godfrey
Special to The CJN

On a warm afternoon during Sukkot, a group of teenage boys and girls sat side by side in their beautifully decorated sukkah.

I listened attentively to a 12-year-old boy as he read prayers out loud in Hebrew and English. A girl, 16, shook the lulav and etrog together, while other young guests looked on.

Feature

After the little sukkah party, the group dispersed to do homework and household chores – a regular routine for the seven children living in a charming, old, five-bedroom house in downtown Toronto.

But this is no ordinary home. This is a treatment residence – believed to be the only Jewish treatment residence for adolescents in Ontario – run by Youthdale Treatment Centres, which provides comprehensive, integrated health services for troubled children and their families.

The children living in this Jewish house are aged 12 to 18. They are Jewish youth who all suffer from serious mental health and other problems, including Attention Deficit Hyperactive Disorder (ADHD), Tourette syndrome, Asperger syndrome, conduct disorders and eating disorders. Although each child's particular difficulties are first apparent in the school environment, additional underlying issues usually become more evident once the child is placed in the care of the staff at Youthdale. Approximately 60 per cent of referrals to the four Youthdale treatment residences come through social agencies including Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS).

Established in 1996, this Jewish home is a residential treatment centre that incorporates religious observance and practice. The home is strictly kosher. Shabbat and the other Jewish holidays are all observed.

"The children typically take three to six months to adjust to their new surroundings," says Anna Quattrocci, residential supervisor of the Jewish home for 15 years.

Rebuke stands forever

From the editor's desk...

The first time it happened was some 2,600 years ago. The Jewish governor of Judea, Gedaliah ben Achikam, was murdered by a fellow Jew, Ishmael ben Nethaniah. Scholars are not quite certain of the date but most believe ben Achikam was murdered either in 586 BCE or 585 BCE. The date recognized by Jewish tradition is the third day of the month of Tishrei.

Indeed, a great deal of uncertainty surrounding Gedaliah ben Achikam still lingers. We know he was appointed to his post by the Babylonians who had captured Jerusalem and destroyed the First Temple. We know, too, that his family had been a prominent one, strong supporters of King Jehoiakim before the king's exile by the Babylonians, and probably after the exile as well. We also know that Gedaliah's father, Achikam, had helped save the life of the prophet Jeremiah from some of the people who were angry with and resented the prophet for his constant moralizing and finger-wagging remonstrations against them.

The Encyclopedia Judaica suggests that Gedaliah's family "evidently followed a line of moderation and submission to Babylon which explains the choice of one of its members to govern the remnant in Judea."

It may have been Gedaliah's apparent moderation that so enraged Ishmael ben Nethaniah that he believed he was justified in murdering Gedaliah, perhaps as a first step in eventually overthrowing the Babylonians.

The encyclopedia also suggests that, in committing the murder, the assassin had at least the tacit if not the active support of the king of the Ammonites.

It also seems that the assassin and his henchman may have also targeted Jeremiah when they plunged their swords into Gedaliah. But he and a number of others around Gedaliah were spared "and fled to Egypt out of fear that the Babylonians might consider them responsible for the murder of Gedaliah."

It may be simply that Jeremiah's life was not spared, per se, but rather, that he had never been an intended target in the first place. Either way, for whatever reason, flight from the turmoil in Judea was necessary to save his life.

We cannot see so clearly into the thick haze of the past to be able to write an accurate chronicle of events. But we know two facts for certain:

1. The societal context for the murder in Judea was one of deep political tumult and upheaval.

2. Our ancient sages were appalled, horrified and outraged by the murder. They considered the assassination a moral stain on the conscience and the body politic of the Judeans, i.e., the Jewish people. They declared the day to be a day of national mourning and a day of fasting.

There were, to be sure, disagreement and profoundly inflaming differences among the Jews at that time regarding Gedaliah, his policies and his relationship to the Babylonians. But the disagreements and the differences did not even slightly abate the sense of overwhelming disgust for the murder. So entrenched was the collective sense of revulsion for Ishmael ben Nethaniah's deed, that the fast declared by the sages – Tzom Gedaliah – is commemorated and observed in our time too, as an everlasting rebuke for the offence.

The second time it happened was 16 years ago.

Israel's prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, was murdered by a fellow Jew, Yigal Amir, on Nov. 5, 1995 (the 12th day of Cheshvan on the Hebrew calendar, which falls on Nov. 9 this year).

No far away mists of time have yet enveloped that horrible Saturday night in Tel Aviv. The events are as fresh and as shuddering in our minds today as they were 16 years ago when they occurred.

As in Gedaliah's time, the societal context for the murder was one of deep political tumult and upheaval. The agreement Rabin had signed with Yasser Arafat two years earlier had evoked vehement and often ugly political opposition. And like Ishmael ben Nethaniah, Yigal Amir also believed himself to be justified in killing the leader. He sits in jail, and will for the rest of his life.

The years since Rabin's murder suggest that his faith in the Palestine Liberation Organization was misplaced. The honesty of his hope and the sincerity of his purpose were not matched by Yasser Arafat. Peace with the Palestinians is not closer at hand in September 2011 than it was in September 1993. But it must be still be the key striving of Israel's leaders.

And thus, just as in the aftermath of the murder of Gedaliah ben Achikam, there can never be the slightest abatement of the sense of overwhelming disgust for the murder of Yitzhak Rabin. As it was some 2,600 years ago, the assassination was an appalling, horrific moral stain upon the conscience and the body politic of the people.

We must recall, lament and learn.

Schulich program aimed at future leaders

Supports study in science in Canada and Israel

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Businessman and philanthropist Seymour Schulich is launching a university "leaders" program that will see 20 Canadian students and five Israeli ones receive $15,000 a year to pursue studies in science-related programs.

High school graduates studying science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM subjects) are eligible for the annual sums, maxing-out at $60,000 for a four-year course. Schulich has designated UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to administer the pilot project.

Seymour Schulich

In a telephone interview from his Toronto office, Schulich said the program is expected to grow from 25 student "leaders" in the first year to 75 in the third. If it proves successful, he's ready to endow a $100-million fund to continue promoting education in the sciences to Canadian and Israeli students.

Envisioned as a sort of Canadian Rhodes Scholarship, Schulich said, "I want this endowment to go on a long time."

Candidates will be selected with the expectation that they not only have good marks, but have also shown leadership either through community service or entrepreneurship, and demonstrate financial need.

The scholarship dwarfs the average $2,000 provided to students in leading science faculties in Canada, he said.

Canadian universities that will be asked to participate in the pilot program include York University, the University of Toronto, McMaster, Western, Queen's, McGill, University of Calgary, University of Manitoba, Dalhousie and the University of British Columbia.

The Israeli schools to benefit are the Technion in Haifa. (Schulich already has a relationship with the university: in 2006, he gave the school's chemistry department $22 million). Hebrew University, Tel Aviv University, Bar-Ilan University and Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

Some 1,600 high schools across Canada and Israel will be able to nominate a single student each for the scholarship, and the universities will award the funds to the most capable candidate, Schulich said.

He hopes the program helps develop young leaders – people who will go on to make contributions to society – while helping drive each nation's economy.

"Science and technology are the principal drivers for a country's economy where education, fuelled by strong math, is essential for national and global economic performance. My hope is that after a successful pilot, this initiative will help ensure Canada and Israel are at the forefront of excellence in science and research for generations to come," Schulich said.

The program was devised after a proposed major gift to the University of Waterloo fell through. Israeli universities were included because of his strong affiliation with his Jewish heritage.

"I'm Jewish, and if we don't stick up for our own people, nobody will," he said. "At the end of the day, if we learned a lesson it was that we have to depend on ourselves. I take that seriously. I'm as Canadian as can be, but I'm also Jewish."

As currently devised, the program "is a way of saying to the greater community in Canada, very specifically, that we don't only look after our own, but we're part of the bigger community."

Schulich turned to UJA Federation to implement the program because of the organization's longevity and experience managing large sums of money. He also has teamed with federation before, as well as World ORT and the government of Israel to build 850 classrooms equipped with white boards and computers for schools in the Jewish state.

"I was very impressed by the way they handled themselves," he said.

Federation will receive an annual $200,000 fee for the first three years the project runs.

Israeli doctor reflects on saving Palestinian baby

Film tells of 4-month-old born without immune system

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Dr. Raz Somech, a pediatric immunology specialist at the Tel Hashomer Hospital in Tel Aviv and a subject in the 2010 Israeli documentary Precious Life, was in Toronto last week to screen the film for local doctors.

Set against the backdrop of the 2007 conflict between Hamas and Fatah, which resulted in hundreds of Qassam rockets being fired at Israeli towns, Precious Life, directed by Israeli television reporter Shlomi Eldar, follows the quest to save Mohammed Abu Mustafa, a four-month-old Palestinian boy from Gaza who was born without an immune system.

When Eldar, a Channel 10 Gaza correspondent, received an urgent phone call from Somech asking him to broadcast a plea to Israelis that Mohammed will die unless he was able to fund a $55,000 bone marrow transplant, Eldar jumped at the story.

His news report resonated with an anonymous Israeli man whose son, a soldier, had been killed in the line of duty. He donated the entire amount.

On Oct 26, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies invited Somech, who completed his fellowship at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto, to present the film to Doctors4Wiesenthal, a group of health professionals concerned about the rise of antisemitism and anti-Israel sentiments.

While Somech has become one of the most recognized doctors in Israel, acting as one of the ambassadors for the film that has been screened all over the world, he still hasn't lost his humble charm, answering questions barely above a whisper.

Although the documentary was filmed during a volatile period between Israelis and Palestinians – when, at one point Somech is seen doing everything in his power to save a Palestinian baby's life, and at another point, he's seen in an army uniform having returned from his reserve duty in Gaza – Somech insists it's a simple story.

"It shows humanity, it shows compassion and it also shows professional success. Shlomi… didn't make Israeli propaganda. That's the reason the film is so accepted. It's balanced and it shows real things."

Somech emphasized that although the film only shows the treatment of one patient, "this is not an isolated incident. We have many patients from the Palestinian Authority."

Having viewed the film last week for the first time in several months, Somech said he tried to think about how Mohammed's mother, Raida Mustafa, felt when she met the Israelis at the hospital for the first time.

Dr. Raz Somech

"We have to understand how her world was shaken by the things that we did. She could never have imagined that Israelis could behave like that," Somech said, adding that the situation put her under tremendous pressure.

Mustafa revealed in the film that Gazans had been accusing her of collaborating with Israel.

Still, no one, Eldar included, is prepared for a conversation he had with Mustafa during Mohammed's hospital stay.

"For you life is precious, but not for us… After Mohammed gets well, I will certainly want him to be a shahid [martyr]. If it's for Jerusalem, then there's no problem," she tells a dejected Eldar.

Somech, who feels her comments may have come out of her upbringing and prejudices, as well as pressure from her community, is confident that by the end of the experience, Mustafa felt differently about Israelis.

"Whenever they think about Israelis, they'll see a physician or a nurse that took care of Mohammed during his sick days, and they won't think about a solider that is coming to beat them."

Somech said he's maintained a relationship with the family and continues to follow up with Mohammed, who is now three years old and "completely well."

Somech recalled watching the film with the Mustafas last year during the Jerusalem Film Festival during a private screening.

Following the screening, "They hugged me and said, 'I thought we were just friends. Now we understand that we are family,'" Somech recalled.

Reform ties with Israel seen as essential

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Reform Jews need Israel more than others "because we are not yet firmly established on Israeli soil," said Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union for Reform Judaism, last week.

Speaking at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, Rabbi Yoffie said Israel also needs the support of Diaspora Jewry. "Israel needs us now as never before. It still requires our activism, our financial support and our frequent visits."

Rabbi Eric Yoffie

However, he noted, "we need Israel as much as Israel needs us, because it's a place that inspires us and pumps the dynamism of Jewish life to our veins."

For Reform Jews, the stakes are very high, he said. "If we don't become a force in Israel in the next generation, we will have consigned ourselves to the margins of Jewish history. I say this with concern, but also with hope. Reform successes in Israel give us every confidence this will not happen."

The rabbi was the first of three speakers to be featured on the topic of "What Must Israel Do To Survive... And Thrive?" His lecture was a program of Holy Blossom's Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning, and will be followed by author Yossi Klein Halevi on Nov. 10 and Ben-Gurion University professor Benny Morris Nov. 17.

Rabbi Yoffie said the past year has been "momentous" for Israel. "Even by Middle East standards, it was a year filled with surprises."

He cited the Arab Spring uprisings, "shaky" relations between Egypt and Israel, and between Israel and Turkey, and the Palestinian bid for statehood at the United Nations.

"In addition to all of this, other problems have not gone away. The Iranians are still trying to build nuclear weapons. Hamas remains in charge in Gaza, as thousands of rockets are aimed at Israel's civilian centres." As well, he added, incidents like recent attacks on mosques in Israel are "contrary to everything we believe about Israeli values."

Israel has given the Jewish people control over its destiny, the rabbi said. "We're not always comfortable talking about power, but achieving power is important... In the absence of power, all other Jewish values can be turned to dust."

Any dissatisfaction with Israeli politics has nothing to do with Zionism, which is "rooted in a dream of what Israel can become," Rabbi Yoffie said. "Israel needs us now as never before. It still requires our activism, our financial support and our frequent visits.

"This or that action of any Israeli government has nothing to do with our connection to the Zionist idea. Our connection to Israel is rooted in a religious vision."

Terror is a danger, Rabbi Yoffie said. "But so is an ideological vacuum."

While the Mustafas received the film enthusiastically, Somech said he was worried about the family after it aired on Israeli TV, as Israeli TV channels reach the Palestinian Authority.

"The day it aired, I called the family to make sure they are safe and nothing happened to them," he said, referring to the fact that they could be perceived as traitors for having said favourable things about Israelis.

"She told me their neighbours treat them like movie stars. They are very proud of the film and the achievement, and I think they agree with the message that the film has to say."

Although he isn't sure whether the film will improve Israeli-Palestinian relations, the film has helped Somech professionally.

This month, the Jeffrey Modell Foundation, an international organization that supports centers in the field of primary immunodeficiencies, will recognize the Sheba Medical Center at his hospital, which treats both Israelis and Palestinians.

When propaganda mocks truth

So often is UN opprobrium directed at Israel that it is generally not newsworthy. But occasionally the stream of vituperative sanctimony is so thick that it stuns the mind even as it offends the conscience. Such was the case last weekend with the self-righteous preaching by Robert Serry, the United Nations special co-ordinator for the Middle East peace process and personal representative of the secretary general to the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Palestinian Authority.

Serry was warning Israel that there is a growing call among the Palestinian leaders to disband the Palestinian Authority. He also warned that Abbas is threatening to resign in a few months if no progress is made in the negotiations.

"The Palestinians feel growing alienation towards the Oslo process," he said in an interview with Ha'aretz last Friday in his office at the UN's headquarters in Jerusalem. "I don't want to sound apocalyptic, but if things go wrong don't expect the international community to bail you out. We will not pay the bill."

Seldom has propaganda ever stood truth on its ear as grotesquely as Serry did with his preposterous statements.

"Alienation towards the Oslo process?" The Palestinians long ago effectively abrogated the Oslo process when Yasser Arafat launched a war of terror in violation of the very heart and core of the agreement he signed; when Mahmoud Abbas two years ago stopped all negotiations with Israel in violation of those same agreements, and, most recently, when he sought unilateral recognition of an independent Palestinian state at the UN, again, in violation of the Oslo accords.

"Don't expect the international community to bail you out." Unless Serry is referring to the partition vote on Nov. 29, 1947 – and that hardly qualifies as a bailout – when has the international community ever bailed Israel out? Indeed, the more fitting question is why, more than six decades after the first egregious blunder by the Palestinian leaders, does the international community continue to bail them out?

From the very first days after Israel refused to surrender its life to the Arab armies that tried to destroy it at birth in 1948, the international community – through the creation of UNRWA (the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees), the countless anti-Israel measures in the UN and its various committees and the constant hand-holding of the PA by Serry and his colleagues – has encouraged the intransigence of the Palestinian leaders and thus contributed to the failed aspirations of the Palestinian people.

Instead of hectoring Israel, Serry should tell the PA leader that to achieve progress in negotiations, one must actually negotiate. It is Abbas, not Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who refuses to do so.

A sad spectacle

What a sad spectacle the world has witnessed recently. One emaciated, sunlight-deprived Israeli soldier, held in mind-numbing isolation for five years and four months, was traded for 1,027 well-fed, humanely treated Palestinian convicts.

Gilad Schalit was kidnapped by Hamas terrorists in a cross-border raid when he was 19 years old. He is now 25. The Red Cross, Doctors without Borders and the other NGOs who continued to work in Gaza, while being barred from access to Schalit, should hang their heads in shame.

The Palestinian prisoners had all the access they needed to food, Qur'ans, exercise and the essentials that civility demands, watched over by these same NGOs. The prisoners include terrorists who murdered Israeli, American and other civilians in restaurants, clubs, hotels, universities, and on buses. There were also likely common criminals and fathers and brothers who murdered their daughters and sisters in honour killings. All returned home as heroes. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas even referred to them as "freedom fighters."

CBC bias (1)

Noticing a pattern of bias concerning the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the radio program The Current, I finally took the issue to the CBC ombudsman, Kirk LaPointe ("Et tu CBC!" Oct. 12). I cited a program from this year and several from last year. The ombudsman discounted all but one example of biased work, saying that he deals only with complaints regarding the current year. He admitted that the one show left from my list was not ideal, but did not violate CBC's journalistic standards. The excuse that CBC uses is that if you look at the overall picture of their coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, there is balance. However, fewer and fewer editions of The Current have balance within the show. So if you do not listen to CBC Radio every day, you would never hear the so-called balance they refer to. The CBC's journalistic guidelines are too open to interpretation to be effective. This is not a good time for Israel in the media, and while Israel is not managing its public relations very well, it is being beaten on more than is fair, and CBC is helping with the beating. CBC has access to our tax dollars without any real accountability in place. It's time to sell CBC Radio to a private group.

CBC bias (2)

The CJN's editorial and Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, vigorously attacked CBC's airing of the radio program The Current on the one-state solution ("Et tu CBC!" Oct. 12; "CBC program accused of 'journalistic malpractice,'" Oct. 12). A major consideration for them was that both of the invited guests endorsed the one-state view. I listened to the program, and although I disagreed with the guests, I found that both the interviewer and guests left no doubt that the one-state position is held by only a small minority on either side. Moreover, the tone of the discussion was tame and sober. Recent events – and not misguided or malicious CBC editors – are what has given new life to the one-state proposition. As hopes for peace decline, this terrible option comes into prominence again. Given the expansion of settlements, the boost given to Hamas by the Schalit deal, growing Palestinian frustration over lack of progress and frustration with their own corrupt leaders, more Palestinians and their allies may be tempted by the option. Little wonder then that the CBC would consider this a legitimate issue to explore.

Transnistria victims honoured

With great respect for Felicia Carmelly's devotion to making known the tragedy of the Transnistria, I wish to inform her and all Transnistria survivors that I hold an annual commemoration in Montreal for those murdered in Romania and on the killing fields of Transnistria ("Transnistria tragedy largely unknown," letters, Oct. 19). Memory of the Transnistria vicitims will live on in the hearts and minds of the many students and community members who attend the event each year. High school teachers confront the Holocaust

Adam Fuerstenberg

When Rich Hitchins, president of the Centre for Genocide Education in London, Ont., invited me to accompany him and 20 high school teachers on a two-week trip last summer to visit Holocaust sites in Germany, Poland and Ukraine, I readily accepted. A child survivor and a refugee, I was only a boy when my family left Germany for Canada in 1951.

Before we left, Rich arranged orientation meetings, where I began my role as a resource person by lecturing on Judaism, antisemitism and Nazism. It was my first opportunity to meet the teachers. Sixteen of the 20 teachers were not Jewish. They ranged in age from their mid-20s to almost 60, and hailed from across Canada, including a young woman from Gander, Nfld., a French-Canadian from Montreal, a number of teachers from Toronto and southwest Ontario, the Prairie provinces, Alberta and British Columbia, and even a principal from Sooke on Vancouver Island. While their motivations for coming on this trip were varied, they all seemed to share not only the desire to know more about the Holocaust than they had already learned from books and films, but also an admirably idealistic ambition to apply what they would learn to inspire their students to be better citizens and human beings. Graham Arts, the principal from Sooke, said: "Although I don't have any Jewish ancestry, as an educator I believe that I have a responsibility to teach students about events such as the Holocaust. If we are raising our children to be responsible adults in a democratic society, then they must be able to think critically... I believe that a society where the concepts of democratic and collective responsibility are taught, coupled with a spirit of critical inquiry, is one that is much more resistant to the forces that might bring about horrific events."

After orientation, we flew to Paris and then to Berlin. During the almost four days we spent there, we visited most of the well-known prewar Jewish areas of the city and the Holocaust sites and museums that show Germany's genuine willingness to confront its Nazi past. They have created a monument out of Grunwald Station, the suburban railway station from where the Nazis shipped more than 200,000 Jews to the concentration and death camps. The bombed-out site of the huge Gestapo headquarters in central Berlin has been turned into a museum that records the methodology and atrocities the Gestapo used to fullfil Hitler's dream of world domination and the annihilation of European Jewry. We also visited the park on Rosenstrasse, with its sculptures in tribute to the hundreds of German wives of Jews who successfully demonstrated and protested their husbands' incarceration by the Gestapo, eventually resulting in the men being freed. That story became a celebrated film.

Most imposing, in central Berlin near the Brandenburg Gate, is the recently completed Holocaust memorial to the murdered Jews of Europe. Its 2,711 larger than life-size unmarked concrete blocks spread over an area of 19,000 square metres present a constant brooding reminder to Berliners of the horror their Nazi forbears committed.

In some ways the most chilling Holocaust site in Berlin was a leafy villa in Wannsee, a neighbourhood that had been a summer retreat for Berlin's wealthy elite. Here in January 1941, Reinhard Heydrich, Himmler's deputy, arranged the meeting of 15 top Nazi bureaucrats to co-ordinate the murder of European Jewry. The main floor boardroom with its long dark table and walnut chairs where Eichman recorded the minutes forms the centre of the museum. The contrast between this villa surrounded by flower gardens along a peaceful lake, and the mass murder of six million Jews organized in this building, is almost too difficult to comprehend. Exiting the villa, one of the teachers, exclaimed: "How could human beings think in this casual way about killing millions of fellow human beings!"

Our next stop was Warsaw. As our bus crossed the border between Germany and Poland, I couldn't help remembering the nighttime train when, as a boy of seven in 1946, my parents and I illegally smuggled across East Germany with other survivors to reach Allied occupied West Germany. Through bribery the "Alya Bet," the Jewish Agency's illegal emigration office, had organized a "kibbutz" in Stetin to move Jews from Poland to the West in preparation for eventual emigration to Palestine.

Using Warsaw as our base, we visited Treblinka and Auschwitz-Birkenau, as well as Holocaust sites in Warsaw itself. We were graciously received in the Nozyk Synagogue by Piotr Kadlcik, a computer professional in his 40s who is the president of the Warsaw Jewish community. The synagogue is the only one to survive the Holocaust. Located on Twarda Street in what had been part of the Warsaw Ghetto (the smaller ghetto) during German occupation, it was partially destroyed but was rebuilt and reopened in 1983. It now serves as both a place of worship as well as the centre of the community. We also visited the site of the Museum of the History of Polish Jews, across from the Rappaport Monument to the Heroes of the Ghetto Uprising. The museum is a vast structure still under construction. We paid our respects at Mila 18, the site of the bunker from which the Warsaw Ghetto fighters directed the battle and in which the surviving fighters committed suicide as their location was attacked by the German troops. We even managed to find a preserved segment of the original Ghetto wall.

A group of Canadian high school teachers visited Holocaust sites in Germany, Poland and Ukraine last summer. They hope to use what they learned to inspire their students to become better citizens. The author, Adam Fuerstenberg, is at the far right.

As we were leaving the great Jewish cemetery in Warsaw, which had miraculously survived, Rich – the organizer of our trip – recognized an older man who had just entered. Rich asked me to go over and ask the spry elderly man, in Polish, if he was Samuel Willenberg. "Indeed I am," answered the man, curiosity on his face.

Willenberg, a noted Israeli sculptor, is one of only two survivors from among the 875,000 souls who perished in Treblinka. He was in the last Sonderkommando (a work unit of Nazi death camp prisoners), the one that revolted. The teachers had read about Willenberg before the trip and were astounded to meet him. However, when I asked him if he would join some of us in reciting Kaddish, he turned visibly angry and pointing a finger at the clear blue sky, exclaimed loudly in Polish: "Where was he? He was not here. I will not say the Kaddish." Like many Holocaust survivors, he had lost his faith. Back on the bus, I sat down next to Louis Laroche, the teacher from Montreal, who showed me the book he was reading with Willenberg's story in it. "Think of the incredible odds of meeting him here where the Warsaw Ghetto was."

The next day we visited Treblinka. The site features a large memorial monument surrounded by various sized boulders inscribed with the names of all the European communities from which death camp victims came. My hometown, Radom, has two separate boulders because there were two ghettos, the larger eliminated in July-August 1942; the smaller, in the Glinice suburb, remained as a work camp until 1944. The isolation, the trace of an abandoned railway track and the utter loneliness of the place seems to emphasize the final abandonment of the Jews murdered there. In the middle of green fields and dense forests, it is still a place of ultimate horror.

But our next stop, much lesser in historical significance, presented us with just as horrifying an example of man's capacity for evil. Some 65 miles northeast of Warsaw, along a winding country road, lies the quiet hamlet of Jedwabne. Until about 10 years ago, its bloody Holocaust crime was unknown to even the rest of Poland. Then the respected Polish historian Jan Gross published the results of his research in a slim volume, Neighbours. It created an upheaval in the way Poles regard their conduct toward Jews during the German occupation. On July 10, 1941, only days after the Germans invaded Russia, the Polish population of Jedwabne murdered all their Jewish neighbours, more than 1,600 men, women and children, by marching them to a large barn and setting the barn on fire. Under the Communist regime, a small monument was erected, alleging that the murder was perpetrated by the Germans. A few years ago, only after the true story emerged, a monument was erected on the site, acknowledging the truth.

As we walked on the cobblestone street toward the murder site, we encountered hostile stares from the villagers. Returning to our bus, we passed some newer houses and and saw villagers driving expensive new cars. I couldn't help wondering how much of this prosperity was an inheritance from the murder and robbery committed on the Jews. About two weeks after our visit, newspapers reported that the new monument at the site of the barn had been desecrated with Nazi and anti-Jewish slogans.

Although the last part of our sojourn included a stay in Krakow, a visit to Lviv and three nights in Kiev, both now part of Ukraine, for me the most memorable was the visit to my birthplace, Radom. There I found the two-storey apartment building, erected by my great-grandmother, where I was born. At the city hall, we were received by Radom's mayor, Andrzjej Kosztowniak, at 35 the youngest mayor of a major Polish city. In 1939, the city had a Jewish population of 30,000, but he said that regrettably, there are no known Jews living in Radom now.

Preserving the future of the past

When did you first learn of the Holocaust? The question comes up naturally, sometimes in the classroom, sometimes at scholarly meetings, sometimes around a table, and especially now, when Toronto's impressive Holocaust Education Week offers a rich array of informative and moving educational events.

To different people, the question means different things, pointing to different kinds of answers. For those who lived through the Nazi genocide, the question means: when did you know? When did you understand what was happening – to you, your family, your community? When did you believe that the unbelievable, the unthinkable, was taking place?

Emanuel Ringelblum, the social historian who spearheaded a massive documentation project in the Warsaw Ghetto to ensure that its inhabitants would leave behind a record of their lives, records a point of awful comprehension in his famous diary. Like others in the grip of the radical changes wrought by Nazi persecution, Ringelblum at first compared the plight of Jews in the 1940s to Jewish life in the Middle Age – a loss of the rights accorded Jews in modernity, an increase in hardship, but ultimately bearable.

But in June of 1942, his Notes from the Warsaw Ghetto record his stunning realization: that the goal of Nazism was the total annihilation of the Jewish people. As he wrote, "all this search for historical analogy is beside the point. History does not repeat itself." In retrospect, he regrets any attempt to co-operate with the German authorities in order to buy time. "We should have run out into the street, have set fire to everything in sight, have torn down the walls, and escaped."

To descendants of Holocaust survivors, the question means: when did I learn about what happened to my parents, grandparents and relatives? When did I know that my family story was part of a much larger history? Often, the response is: I always knew, I don't remember not knowing. And sometimes, also: at the same time, I never knew, I still don't know.

In the Israeli author David Grossman's See Under Love, a fictional account of a young boy trying to piece together his parents' story, little Momik tries to understand snatches of overheard conversation – phrases such as "over there," or "the Nazi beast," and the infinitely sad and terror-filled expression on his parents' faces. Artist and graphic novelist Art Spiegelman, who retold his father's wartime story in cartoon format in Maus, has commented that even after growing up with parents who survived the war, even after interviewing his father at length and researching the war, he knows so little of what actually happened.

To people who lived through the war years in a safer place, the question means: what did you know of what was going on in Europe? What did you read in newspapers?

To people who came later, especially those with family connection, the question means: how did you come to know that such a thing happened? Did you want to learn more?

Sara R. Horowitz

in Toronto

The responses vary. Some people learned about the Holocaust in elementary or high school, as part of the curriculum.

They may have spent as much as a month studying it, or as little as one lesson. Some happened upon Anne Frank's diary, and were riveted by the story of a young girl's life and struggles. Some saw a popular movie that told a wartime story – Schindler's List, for example, or The Devil's Arithmetic or, more recently, Sarah's Key. Recently, a young man told me he first learned of Nazis when he saw Raiders of the Lost Ark as a child. Sometimes people are satisfied with that initial encounter. They have some general knowledge of the era, and it suffices for them. Other times, they feel pushed to probe further, to learn more, to seek out a deeper understanding.

People sometimes tell me they fear that the Holocaust will soon be forgotten. I don't share that fear. Programs such as Holocaust Education Week, the availability of courses on the Holocaust, the establishment and development of museums and memorial sites, and research centres help anchor memory and give it a future.

But, increasingly, I fear the proliferation of interpretations and misinterpretation of the past, inappropriate and unethical analogies – phenomena that I see as more dangerous than outright denial, because they are more insidious. Analyzing, criticizing, exposing, and deflecting these will be the challenge of the next generation.

A letter to Gaby

My Israeli granddaughter Gaby travelled recently to Poland with her Grade 12 class. Her parents and grandparents were encouraged to write letters that she would read at some point during the trip. My wife and I included this:

Prof. Antony Polonsky, the distinguished historian of Polish Jewry, has just published a three-volume work on the history of the Jews in Poland and Russia. It tells the story of 1,000 years of rich and productive Jewish life in the region. Most of the time, Jews lived there in relative prosperity and security, especially when compared with the persecution and exile others endured at the time in Europe.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

Some even chose to interpret "Polin," the Hebrew name for Poland, as being a combination of the words "po lin," which they would translate as, "Stay here!"

Of course, this adds wrenching poignancy to the tragedy of the Holocaust. Nevertheless, the rich history of our people in Poland must not be forgotten, nor should the modest Jewish revival there in recent years. Although present numbers are miniscule in comparison, the fact that, after all that has happened, there are still Jews there willing to form schools, congregations and other Jewish institutions is a moving testimony to the spirit of Judaism.

There's still much antisemitism in Poland, but there's also great interest in and understanding of things Jewish, especially among the better educated people, most of whom live in cities.

If your itinerary will allow for contact with locals, your non-Jewish peers will tell you that their parents and grandparents also see themselves as victims of Nazism (and later, for some four decades, of Communism). They'll be anxious to point out that the concentration camps were German camps in Poland, because most European Jews lived there, not Polish camps.

One of the many side effects of victimhood is being deaf and blind to the pain of other victims. The inability of Poles to sufficiently appreciate Jewish suffering and the corresponding failure by Jews to understand the Poles has made it very difficult for both sides to speak to each other openly.

Poles who saved Jews from the Nazis during World War II constantly risked their lives. Yet, although some did it for money, others acted out of conviction. While we all regret that there weren't many more rescuers, let's bear in mind that the situation wasn't much better in most European countries. And we may also ask ourselves how would we have acted under similar circumstances? Would we have risked our lives to save strangers, or even neighbours?

At present, Poland's government, together with the current government of Germany, are the staunchest European allies of the State of Israel. Many other countries in Europe we once assumed to be friendly – Sweden, for example, which took us in when we were children and is where we grew up – nowadays show a lot of hostility to Israel, and thus, by inference, to the Jewish people.

Because many Ashkenazi Jews in Israel and in countries such as Canada come from Poland, they're much more hostile to Poles than, for example, Germans, even though it was in Germany that Nazism was born and it was there that the so-called Final Solution aimed at destroying the Jewish people was planned and enacted. This prejudice is subtly reflected in the programming of most visits to Poland. We hope that yours is different.

Though we don't share the anti-Polish bias of many Jews, we understand it well. Having been born there and as Holocaust survivors, we have no good memories of the country. However, we believe that the best way to benefit from a visit like yours is by being fair and open to a whole range of views.

We hope that your trip won't try to show that Poland is a typical model of Galut, the despised Diaspora, with the implied message that even though other countries seem to be good to the Jews now, things may change here as they did there, hence the imperative of Israel.

We believe that the reason for having a Jewish state is sufficiently compelling without having to distort life in the Diaspora to justify the existence of the State of Israel. Wherever Jews live, we should seek to support them and relate to them, even those who camp in the ruins of what once was vibrant Polish Jewry.

The Holocaust from the view of the perpetrators

The Wannsee villa (Sheldon Kirshner photos)

Sheldon Kirshner in Berlin

It took all of 90 minutes to decide the fate of millions of people.

On Jan. 20, 1942, in an elegant, lakeside villa in the posh western Berlin suburb of Wannsee, 15 high-ranking Nazi officials decided to exterminate the Jews of Europe in systematic fashion.

The meeting, a radical turning point in the annals of Adolf Hitler's ruthless anti-Jewish campaign, was chaired by Reinhard Heydrich, who was tasked with the mission of resolving the "Jewish question" in a "final solution."

The Jews of Europe, he said euphemistically, would "be eliminated by natural causes." The remainder would be "treated accordingly."

Everyone in the room understood exactly what he meant. The twisted racial fantasies of the Nazis would at last be fulfilled.

Heydrich's comments are found in the Wannsee Protocol, which was discovered in the files of Germany's foreign ministry in 1947, two years after Hitler committed suicide in his bunker in Berlin.

A copy of this infamous document – which accelerated the Holocaust and officially put the Nazi's imprimatur on it – is exhibited in a polished glass case in the House of the Wannsee Conference, which has been a memorial and educational centre since 1992, the 50th anniversary of this seminal event in World War II.

The villa in which the conference took place is situated in a wooded and idyllic corner of Germany's capital city. Built in 1914 by Ernst Marlier, a toothpaste manufacturer, it was sold to Friedrich Minoux, an industrialist, in 1921. Minoux resold it to a foundation administered by Heydrich in 1940.

After the war, the villa was alternatively used as an officers' club by the Red Army and the U.S. armed forces. The Social Democratic party, which was outlawed by the Nazis, rented it for a while before it was converted into a youth hostel.

Joseph Wulf, a historian and a Holocaust survivor, launched a campaign to transform the villa into a memorial, but all his efforts came to naught. Years after his death, the Berlin Senate finally acted on his far-sighted recommendation.

To a visitor, the villa, gently wreathed by the branches of mature trees, elicits a whole range of contradictory emotions. Its exterior is so beautiful and serene that one struggles to associate it with the Holocaust.

The ground floor of the villa – whose windows offer a clear view of a peaceful lake and a sandy beach – is the site of the permanent exhibition on the Wannsee conference. When the weather is warm and the sun is shining brightly, legions of Berliners flock to the lake. Do they ever think about what transpired here almost seven decades ago?

In the former dining room, under glass, is a chilling one-page document drafted by Adolf Eichmann, a top Gestapo official. The neatly typed document lists "A" and "B" countries in Europe.

"A" refers to nations or districts under Germany's direct control or occupation. "A" countries include Poland, France, Greece, Norway and the Netherlands. "B" is a reference to allies, client states, neutrals or enemies at war with Germany: Bulgaria, Romania, Italy, Sweden, Hungary, Switzerland, Spain and the Soviet Union.

All in all, 11 million Jews are on the list.

If Germany had won the war, 11 million rather than six million Jews may well have been killed by the Nazis and their collaborators throughout Europe.

Wolf Kaiser

Wolf Kaiser, the deputy director of the memorial, describes the Wannsee conference as "an important step" in the gradual process to uproot and murder Jews.

Germany, having ended the emigration of German Jews in October 1941, was now hell-bent on deporting and killing them.

German Jews were deported from Berlin's Grunewald station, a few kilometres, ironically, from Israel's embassy. On the first deportation train, 1,251 Jews were dispatched to the Lodz ghetto. From this memorial site, known as Track 17 today, 50,000 Jews were deported to Lodz, Warsaw, Lublin, Kovno, Minsk, Riga, Thererienstadt, Raasiku/Jagola, Aushwitz, Sachsenhausen, Ravensbruck and Bergen-Belsen.

The last deportation train, with 18 Jews aboard, pulled out of the station on March 27, 1945, less than two months before the war in Europe ended.

Mobile killing squads, Einsatzgruppen, shot about one million Jews following Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941.

Although Hitler never issued a written extermination order, he discussed the issue with his closest associates, Hermann Goring and Heinrich Himmler. They understood what he wanted and carried out his tacit orders ruthlessly.

On Dec. 13, 1941, just days after Germany declared war on the United States, Hitler made a reference to a fiery speech he had delivered in January 1939 in which he predicted the demise of European Jewry.

According to Kaiser, the Holocaust did not interfere with Germany's war effort. By his rough estimate, the Holocaust was implemented by 30,000 to 40,000 perpetrators.

Due to eyewitness accounts, many German civilians were aware that Germany was committing atrocities.

"They knew that horrible things were happening, that great crimes were being committed," said Kaiser during a tour of the memorial.

Beyond the Wannsee Protocol, doubtlessly the showpiece of the House of the Wannsee Conference, there are vivid exhibits on Nazi Germany's racist policy, the persecution of German Jews, the deportations, the ghettos and the concentration and death camps.

The reference library, named in honour of Wulf, contains historical and literary works, memoirs of survivors, memorial books, research literature, journals, microfilmed documents, as well as audio-visual material.

The education department, of which Kaiser is the director, offers a wide range of seminars to civil servants, teachers, municipal employees, army officers, police and students.

"Our goal is to teach, not to preach," explained Kaiser, a former high school teacher. "We think this is a productive approach for democratic thinking and historical learning."

He added, "Our main focus is to examine the Holocaust through the perspective of the perpetrators."

By this yardstick, the House of the Wannsee Conference performs its important mission in exemplary style.

Rabbi marks bar mitzvah year at Beth Torah

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

After 13 years at Toronto's Beth Torah Congregation, Rabbi Yossi Sapirman will celebrate what he sees as a "trajectory" with a gala fundraising "bar mitzvah" dinner Nov. 6.

Rabbi Sapirman, 43, will be roasted by Michael Wex, author of Born to Kvetch. The weekend will also include a celebratory Friday night service Nov. 4.

"Some days it's difficult to believe how far things have come," Rabbi Sapirman said in an interview last week in his shul office, a spacious room bisected by an aquarium with large fish and turtles and capped with a piece of suspended dried wood that reaches almost to the ceiling, reflecting his affinity for the outdoors. An accomplished nature photographer, he also enjoys fly-fishing.

Under the leadership of Rabbi Yossi, as he's known to congregants, the congregation – which is affiliated with the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues but not the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism – has more than doubled from 180 families to about 500.

The synagogue, built in 1964, has been renovated and expanded (the $8-million project was completed two years ago), and the congregation started its own Hebrew school – called Hebrew's Cool – that has more than 150 students. It averages 60 to 65 b'nai mitzvah a year. Rabbi Sapirman said there were two the year before he became spiritual leader.

Among the changes he instituted was a program for b'nai mitzvah called "A Year of Living Jewishly" – a name that is now trademarked – to focus on putting Jewish values into practice.

As well, Rabbi Sapirman decided that every bar or bat mitzvah child should have his or her own service. He aimed to set a tone that was "warm, friendly, comfortable and meaningful."

A case in point: in a 2004 CJN column, Avrum Rosensweig wrote that Rabbi Sapirman and the shul's cantor, David Young, greet every attendee while they walk the Torahs around the shul.

On a busy Shabbat, it can take up to 15 minutes, the rabbi said.

Also, he has allowed his personal experiences "to be part of the conversation," discussing the challenges he faced in leaving his ultra-Orthodox home as a teenager and finding his own Jewish path.

He credits in particular his father's love of text and, in a more general sense, the Orthodox community's "general sense of magic in Yiddishkeit" as well as its warmth and sense of community for influencing his approach as a rabbi.

Last year, his commitment to inclusiveness was recognized with two awards: Reena presented the rabbi with a humanitarian award, and the shul received an inclusion award from Itanu Toronto, an initiative of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Beth Torah's new sanctuary has a ramp to the bimah, and Reena clients with developmental disabilities have become regulars at Beth Torah's Shabbat services.

Rabbi Sapirman, who received smichah from a rabbi in Israel at age 18, undertook further studies in his twenties to qualify as a rabbinic leader of a community. Currently, he is halfway through a four-year fellowship at Israel's Shalom Hartman Institute.

Thirteen years ago, he told The CJN he saw himself as a modern Orthodox rabbi in a traditional Conservative shul.

The shul is still traditional Conservative, he said last week. And he feels that "the most modern thing a rabbi can do is make tradition relevant."

Delmanor residents and veterans

They proudly served Canada
We're proud to serve them

Across the GTA, at every Delmanor residence, we're constantly reminded of the contribution our residents made to building and protecting this country. They sacrificed to make our lives better. It's our responsibility to make theirs easier. That's why we're always mindful that it's our turn to serve them. We know that they don't live in our building; we work in their home.

Join us this month in saluting our veterans, past, present and future. Be ever grateful for your freedom and those that served to protect it. We are, every day.

Righteous Gentile returns wedding rings to survivor

Rhonda Spivak
Special to The CJN

Feature

Anje van Tongeren

Anje van Tongeren, a Dutch Christian woman who survived the Holocaust despite her father betraying her to the Nazis for helping Jews, has been searching for the Jewish owners of two wedding rings ever since.

For safekeeping, the two gold bands were left with a friend of van Tongeren's family by Hermann and Janette Wolff, before they and their sons were sent to concentration camps.

After nearly 70 years of searching, van Tongeren, now 83, miraculously found Earnest Wolff, the couple's nephew, and the only surviving member of the Wolff family, who now lives in Haifa.

"I knew Earnest when he was about 17 years old, before he was sent to a concentration camp," said van Tongeren, who is a member of the Righteous Among the Nations.

Last month, she went to Israel for "such an emotional meeting" to return the rings to Earnest Wolff, now 87. "I opened my wallet and said, 'Would you like these [the rings]?'"

Van Tongeren was a teenager in the Netherlands during World War II, when she and her mother helped Jews to safety as part of the Dutch underground.

From 1942 to 1944, van Tongeren and her mother helped escaping Jews as they passed through Groningren, a city in northern Holland, providing them with clothing, food and forged documents. "The papers were stolen, and I forged the signatures of the Nazi officials," she said.

Van Tongeren's work ended in 1944 when she and her mother were betrayed by her father to the Nazis and were imprisoned. "I was 15 when I was arrested. I didn't know then that it was my father who had ratted on us. He was on the Nazis' side. He got money [from the Nazis] for betraying me and my mother. His sister and her husband were Nazis."

The two gold wedding rings had been deposited for safekeeping with a friend of van Tongeren's family, a bachelor, Hank Vanderveen. "But he was shot at age 42 after he got caught for being involved in the Dutch underground," she said. Her mother died in Ravensbruch concentration camp in 1945. When van Tongeren, an only child, was released from prison, she had no money and was forced to live with her father because she was a minor and he was her only parent. "Until this day, I don't know why they released me," she said.

Van Tongeren added that her father "did everything to get rid of me. It's a very difficult story. He ratted on me again to the police and they followed me... It was another miracle I survived."

After the war, van Tongeren went through Vanderveen's belongings and found the wedding bands. "I knew the rings belonged to the Wolffs. I didn't know if any of them had survived... I suspected that Hermann and Janet [Wolff] and their five sons had died... I didn't know if there was a way of finding that information out or not... so all these years I kept the rings."

Then, about a year ago, van Tongeren's daughter, Joanne, found a man named Jair Wolff on Facebook. "She asked him if he knew of an Earnest Wolff. He said that Earnest was his father."

To van Tongeren's surprise and delight, she learned that both Earnest and his wife were alive and living in Haifa. Then, in September, van Tongeren went to Israel on a Christian tour.

"It was so emotional to meet Earnest We were hugging and crying," she said.

As a token of appreciation for returning the rings, Israel's Tourism Ministry presented van Tongeren with a silver plaque with a Hamsa on it.

"Last Oct. 1, 2010, I had to have surgery for thyroid cancer. I was told by the doctor that my heart is no good and I have diabetes, and I probably wouldn't live through it," she said.

"I never thought I'd live to see the day when I would be able to return the rings to a member of the Wolff family."

Bringing magic to math studies

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Mathematics suffers from "bad PR," according to Yossi Elran of Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science. But his presentations to students counteract some of the negative reactions they may have.

"We're here to talk about math and magic," Elran told a group of middle school and grade 3, 4 and 5 students at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School last week. "Some of the most famous magic tricks are done using mathematics."

Elran, a father of five children ranging in age from eight to 20, is the director of the "unit of technology in education" of the Weizmann's Davidson Institute of Science Education. Among its programs is a math enrichment program called Math By Mail, headed by Elran's wife, Michal.

The program was established 30 years ago in Israel and is now available in four languages: Arabic, English, Hebrew and Spanish. Weizmann Canada introduced it here eight years ago.

Elran visited two other Toronto Jewish day schools last week – Leo Baeck and Eitz Chaim, and he also visited three schools in Montreal before heading to Calgary to meet with parents at the local JCC.

A physicist who spent two years in Toronto doing post-doctoral research, Elran became involved with Weizmann, which is based in Rehovot, after taking over a session of a math and computers club that his wife was running on a day she couldn't attend.

He began his presentation at Paul Penna by drawing a 16-box "magic square" in which each horizontal, vertical and diagonal row (as well as different segments of the square) added up to the same two-digit number suggested by one of the students.

"I did this very quickly, no?" he asked. "I think I deserve a round of applause." The students – some of whom participate in Math By Mail – complied readily.

"The question is, how did I do this?" Elran asked. "Is it easy? Any ideas?'

The kids, quiet and focused during his presentation, had noticed details such as which numbers he wrote first, and which squares he initially left blank.

"I'm going to give you a round of applause, because you've been very good – you've been thinking!" he said.

Teaching kids to think is more difficult nowadays because they have shorter attention spans, he told The CJN after the presentation. It's also more important than getting the answers right.

He added that the use of calculators and other technologies has affected the way kids do math. Elran said he's in favour of using technology, "but you can't replace the mind."

Although other subjects also involve thinking, math is important because it is "the mother of all sciences," Elran said. "All the sciences, at a fundamental level, use math.

Also, math is important to politicians who make decisions about issues that affect the world, including the economy, global warming, and the energy crisis.

"Even traffic flow," he added, "which I know is a problem here in Toronto."

But for Elran, one of his most satisfying moments occurred when he was doing a presentation in Israel to a mixed group of Arab and Jewish students, including some from Jewish settlements.

"That's how math can bring kids of different cultures together, and that's important."

Structure, routine called essential

"We don't really know what the problem is until we apply the holistic approach and perhaps see that there's some sort of family dynamic that isn't so helpful to the child."

Quattrocci firmly believes that structure and routine are imperative in creating a secure and happy environment for the children.

"Kids respond so well to routines. Children find it comforting to live in this kind of predictable setting, as most of their family life has been extremely unpredictable."

Although a child psychiatrist meets regularly with the children and consults to the treatment team, it's also the ongoing informal treatment that occurs daily – developing a trusting relationship with staff and doing the household chores – that helps the children heal during their one- to five-year stay. For many children at Youthdale, routine also includes attending school at the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre, a day treatment centre run by JF&CS, or going to a public school that offers appropriate programs suited to their special needs.

Steve Gregory, residential director at Youthdale, credits the successes that the children experience at school and back at the home to the "ethical framework that Youthdale follows.

"Youthdale is a milieu treatment house. We work hard at bringing both the family and the individual child together. It's often the first time the child is able to speak with their family."

Gregory also knows that having the support of the Jewish community allows for an easier and quicker transition for the residents and their parents. "Parents are happy that traditions are in place, and the Jewish community really cares about what happens at the home."

Rabbi Shmuel Spero of Anshei Minsk Synagogue has been very supportive of the Youthdale staff, as well as the children and their parents. With open arms, he welcomes these young people to his synagogue every Shabbat. The Jewish holidays and traditions observed in the house and at synagogue provide focus, learning and excitement.

The children I interviewed were eager to share their feelings about life at Youthdale. Danny, 12, likes to cook and loves to celebrate Chanukah at the house, while 16-year-old Shaina enjoys bowling, museum visits and building relationships with the staff. Ari, 17, who lacks a father figure in his life, said he appreciates the kindness and guidance of the staff.

Gregory proudly recounted the success stories of former residents who often go on to attend university or college. Many stay connected to the devoted staff at Youthdale and this welcoming old house that was once their home.

Teen lends a helping hand in volunteer program

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

For some young people, one summer can make all the difference. Nearly three months after returning from the American Jewish Society for Service's summer program, 16-year-old Kayla Esser still feels energized and motivated to help in her community.

This summer, Esser and 15 other Jewish students travelled to Springfield, Ill., to volunteer with local charities and community service groups.

"It was very eye-opening," Esser said. "You hear about poverty at school and on the news, but it never really registers until you actually see communities where there's need."

After every activity, they would discuss how it related to Judaism and what it meant to do volunteer work, she said.

As part of the program, which ran June 26 to Aug. 7, Esser and her peers travelled across the United States to engage in a wide range of volunteer activities, including working with the United Cerebral Palsy camp, the Boys and Girls Club of Springfield, Habitat for Humanity, Edge Outreach and the Springfield Community Gardens.

Among their tasks was "mitzvah clowning," where the group learned to dress as clowns to entertain and cheer up patients at children's hospitals and retirement homes.

Kayla Esser and other volunteers dig up a driveway at a Habitat for Humanity house.

"That was a first for me," Esser recalled. "For kids, we got to make balloon animals and tell jokes. With the older people, 'clowning' was mostly talking to them about their life experiences. They had really interesting stories."

Esser now hopes to start a mitzvah clowning group with her friends in Toronto so that they can volunteer at children's hospitals.

A student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Esser said the six-week volunteering trip gave her an opportunity to experience a real-life application of the Jewish values she learned in school.

"It was very rewarding to get out of my comfort zone," she said. "It helped me build a stronger Jewish identity and learn about myself and the world around me."

When they were volunteering, the group also travelled across the United States, visiting Louisville, Chicago, Missouri and Memphis to meet with local leaders and spend Shabbat at different synagogues.

One weekend, they taught members of a church community about Passover and what it meant to be Jewish.

"For some of the people there, we were the first Jews they met. It was really cool to teach them about our faith, and to learn from them too," she said.

"One child from the Boys and Girls Club thanked us for teaching him to be a better person and said he was proud to call us his friends. It was really touching that we'd made a difference for him," she said.

Now that she's back, Esser is ready to continue volunteering, and said she feels inspired by the people she met and wants to bring back that dedication to her community. In addition to volunteering at Out of Cold and at Toronto's Beth Torah synagogue, Esser and her father will be working with Habitat for Humanity.

The American Jewish Society for Service, now celebrating its 60th anniversary, runs volunteer programs in different locations every year. For more information on their programs, visit www.ajss.org.

Thanks to Disabled Veterans like Ron, there is an Israel for all of us.

During the 2nd Lebanon War in 2006, 20-year-old Armoured Corps Commander of the 401st regiment, Ron Weinreich, was severely wounded.

Ron was a Commander in the Armoured Corps. His tank was crushed which left him unable to walk.

While performing a maneuver on a dark and narrow village road in Lebanon, Ron's tank crashed into a huge concrete building.

Tons of debris and metal collapsed onto his tank. One of the boulders crushed Ron's spine. Weeks later, after many operations, Ron was forced to confront the grim realization that he would be confined to a wheelchair.

"I remember lying on my bed, alone, thinking about my soldiers who had been killed and about my own personal mess. I covered my head and began to cry, like I'd never cried before. I said: 'Get a grip on yourself, you're 20 years old and you're a fighter.' I decided I had to pick up the pieces and start my life over again."

Five years have passed and Ron has realized a dream that many wish for ... he performed in the show A Star is Born, the Israeli version of American Idol. He triumphantly went on to be one of eight finalists.

Ron is proud of his achievements and continues to nurture his creative talents by performing in his band, Siren. He also studies Business Administration and Entrepreneurship. Ron receives therapy and works out regularly at Beit Halochem Tel Aviv.

Beit Halochem Centres in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem, Nahariya and Beer Sheva offer a broad array of specialized therapies, sports programs, cultural and social activities enabling our 51,000 Wounded Heroes to return to meaningful and productive lives.

U of T urged to cancel seminar by Islamic scholar

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The University of Toronto is being urged to cancel an 18-week course led by Toronto-based Islamic scholar Abdullah Hakim Quick because of his public homophobic and antisemitic statements.

The controversy began last month when the Islamic Education and Research Academy (IERA), a British organization seeking to establish itself in Canada, began publicizing its "Calling the World Back to Allah" conferences in Toronto and Montreal.

Four of the speakers who were scheduled to speak at the conferences – Hamza Andreas Tzortzis, Abdur Raheem Green, Hussain Yee and Quick – have made homophobic and/or antisemitic remarks either in lectures or in writing.

Tzortzis has argued that open displays of homosexuality should be criminalized.

In 2006, Yee, a Malaysian convert, said Jews are "the most extremist nation in this world" and Quick, an American convert who received his history PhD from U of T, said in a lecture that the Islamic position on homosexuality is that it's punishable by death.

Quick also made a comment about purifying Islam's "third-holiest shrine from the filth of Christians and Jews."

Jewish groups, such as Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), as well as Christian and gay advocacy groups, have denounced the speakers' messages and some demanded that the events be cancelled.

Although some venues, including the Sheraton Toronto Hotel, responded to the outcry by refusing to host the event, IERA was able to pull off last-minute venue changes to accommodate the conferences.

The Muslim Student Association (MSA) at Concordia University was scheduled to host a lecture by Green on Oct. 21, but the MSA decided to cancel the event in light of the negative media attention.

MSA president Musab Abu-Thuraia said, "We found that it wasn't in the best interest of the association to hold such an event," CTV Montreal reported.

FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo received a letter from Concordia president Frederick Lowy that said the school "does not espouse or support the attitudes ascribed to the speakers slated for that event," FSWC spokesperson Stacey Starkman confirmed.

FSWC has called on U of T to follow Concordia's lead in distancing itself "from the bigotry expressed by Mr. Quick," by cancelling the seminar organized by U of T's MSA.

CIJA senior vice-president Howard English said his organization is concerned with "the appearance on university campuses of people who consider themselves educators and have expressed views that are derogatory to identifiable groups and inconsistent with the values held by the majority of Canadians."

He added that Hillel of Greater Toronto has been in touch with U of T administrators and is continuing to draw attention to the matter.

U of T spokesperson April Kemick said that the "event is a booking by a campus group – one of hundreds that happen over the course of the year – and there is no connection to the university."

When asked to address concerns some have with the decision to have Quick lead the seminar, which will run until the end of this semester, Rameez Mahmood, president of the MSA at U of T, issued a statement that said "Dr. Quick is a qualified historian, having graduated from the University of Toronto history department. He is teaching a history course on the life of the Prophet."

Saleem Chagtai, an IERA spokesperson and lecturer from the United Kingdom, said in a phone interview while he was in Toronto that, based on the media reports, he can understand why people were alarmed by the speakers.

"When I read it, even I cringed. I thought, 'Oh my God, not again... it set relations back so many years."

Chagtai said he personally investigated each of the allegations and "saw exactly what was said and what was not said."

Chagtai said Tzortzis "was misquoted very badly," adding that Tzortzis and any other IERA speaker have only ever classified homosexuality as a moral sin, and he condemns any physical or verbal abuse against the gay community.

Referring to statements made by Yee –who accused Jews of being "extremists" who "kill Palestinians every day," and of celebrating the 9/11 attacks – Chagtai said, "I didn't know about that until I got [to Canada]. I investigated that. That statement wasn't made at an IERA conference and that speaker is not an IERA affiliate. We merely invited him."

He added that in the end, Yee wasn't able to attend the conference because of another commitment.

"The comments that were made by Hussein Yee, they were factually inaccurate and I was disappointed by that," Chagtai said. "We would never knowingly invite somebody who has said something like that unless they clarify or retract that position."

Quick wrote a blog post on Oct. 23 that defended the two statements he made that were singled out by the media as being antisemitic and homophobic.

Israel faces new dangers in Mideast, speakers say

Michelle Bitran
CJN Intern

The Arab Spring could have ominous implications for Israel, audiences at Ryerson and York universities heard last week.

Hillel and five other groups invited Gil Hoffman, the Jerusalem Post's chief political correspondent, to speak at Ryerson on Oct. 25, while Hasbara at York and B'nai Brith on Campus invited Daniel Pipes, a controversial, right-wing Mideast scholar, to speak a day earlier at York.

Gil Hoffman

Both were wary of security threats to Israel posed by the Arab uprisings.

"The hope in Israel is not that these countries will suddenly become Zionist, but that they will become more pro-America and less pro-Iran," said Hoffman, whose speech focused on the nuclear threat from Iran's Islamist regime.

Pipes urged students to look to the new Middle East with caution, worried about the possibility of new Islamist governments emerging from amid the turmoil.

"People who reject the modern world, reject the West, reject non-Muslims" could become leaders in the region, he said, also pointing to Iran, and more recently Turkey, as examples of threatening Islamism.

With the possibility of Iran's nuclear capability on the horizon and immense upheaval in the region, Israel not only has to keep an eye on Iranian developments, but also on the changes even closer to its borders, Hoffman said.

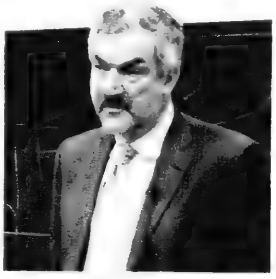
In Egypt, a long-time ally of Israel, the first round of elections since president Hosni Mubarak was ousted is set to happen late this month. If the popular Muslim Brotherhood wins, it would "lead to there being immediate security concerns for Israel," he said.

Pipes shared a similar sentiment. "Overall, it's dangerous for Israel," he said of the Arab Spring and the new governments that may form as a result.

The last time Pipes, who is outspoken about the dangers of militant Islam, visited York, there were protests by students who called him anti-Muslim.

This time, "[York was] on high alert right from the beginning," said Oriyah Barzilay, president of Hasbara at York, one of the groups who brought Pipes to campus.

She added that B'nai Brith covered the $1,800 cost for police and security for the lecture, which were determined by the university. However, in the end, no protesters showed up.



Daniel Pipes

Despite the difficulty in bringing speakers to talk about the Mideast conflict, Barzilay thinks that it's crucial.

"With all of the changes that are going on in the Middle East right now, it was really important to bring in someone like Daniel Pipes now, with his perspective," she said.

At Ryerson, although security was not present, Hillel event organizers read a "statement of understanding" from the Ryerson Students' Union, reminding audience members to be respectful and tolerant during Hoffman's lecture.

"Israel is fighting three battles for its existence," Hoffman told The CJN, "one on the military battlefield, where Israel has an obvious advantage, one on the airwaves, where it's pretty even, and one on college campuses, where Israel is at a great disadvantage."

Hoffman spent part of his lecture discussing Israel's history with the Palestinians, as well as the recent prisoner exchange for Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit to bring audience members up to speed on the current political and security climate in Israel.

He said Israel will need to be on alert because of shifting ground in the Middle East, but he's optimistic that, together with the international community, Israel will be able to thwart the Iranian nuclear threat.

"Being Israeli is about hoping for the best and preparing for the worst," he said.

Encountering intimidation on campus

Comment

Michelle Bitran
CJN Intern

As a freelance journalist, I have been writing about topics related to Israel and Judaism for nearly two years without reproach from readers. But when an article I originally wrote for The CJN was published in Ryerson University's campus newspaper, the Ryersonian, readers responded with venom.

On Sept. 21, the Ryersonian published my story – about my time volunteering with the Israel Defence Forces – in its Voices section, a page reserved for students writing from a personal perspective.

I revised the piece "Sar-el: My Way To Thank Israel's Soldiers" for the campus paper, where it was published under the headline "From Beaches to Bunkers: Volunteering with the IDF." I treaded carefully when making changes, avoiding political comment in anticipation of a less-than-receptive audience. My editors published what I gave them.

When I told my parents I had rewritten the story for my campus paper, they were concerned about the response I would get. I shrugged off their worries, sure that they were overreacting.

Boy, was I wrong. I was just about to learn the meaning of overreacting.

Within a day of the article coming out, my managing editor told me a very upset Palestinian student had contacted her and was planning to write me a letter. Days later, that student self-published her letter online and spread the link through Facebook.

Referring to a line in my article that spoke about my experience packing clothing for my trip, the student wrote, "Is there really any colour that would go well with blood splatter?" She accused me of having silenced the Palestinian people and their cause, and went on to tell her parents' story as refugees fleeing in 1948.

I was left wondering when being a Zionist became tantamount to being anti-Palestinian and trying to figure out where the blood-splattered uniforms she spoke of fit into my story of a summer spent fixing camouflage netting on a base in the north of Israel.

I also wondered if once, while writing her parents' story, she had considered the possibility that my family, too, was kicked out from their home, forced to leave Iraq and sent fleeing to the one safe house for Jewish people at the time: Israel.

Thinking the worst was over, I returned to the school's newsroom on Monday, only to receive another hateful letter, this time from a campus group called Students Against Racism. They accused me of "glorifying war and occupation based on racist ideologies and beliefs," and through that "glorifying racism itself."

The irony was almost too great to be believed. Here I was, a member of one of the smallest minority groups in the world, expressing support for the one tiny Jewish state that struggles to exist, and being called racist for it. What then, I wondered, would Students Against Racism call a campus environment where a Jewish student and Israeli citizen could not openly express a connection to her home country without being viciously and unfairly criticized for it?

Though this letter was intended as a letter to the editor, the instructor who managed the paper chose, rightly, not to publish it, as not a single point the group made addressed my article directly, but rather promoted a political agenda.

Instead, a third and final letter the Ryersonian received was published. It was from Students for Palestinian Human Rights. Though it was the least hateful and most relevant of the letters, it was still used as a platform to spread political propaganda about the Mideast conflict, calling the IDF systematically racist. Nonetheless, as a journalist, I respect the importance of a free and balanced press, and am glad that the least inflammatory of the upset students were able to express their viewpoint.

Unlike what was suggested by the letter-writers, I do believe open discourse is an important route toward coexistence and peace. However, until this kind of intimidation on campus stops, open discourse hardly stands a chance.

שבוע מותו של קדאפי יצר אבסורדים שאפילו תסריטאי הליבחדי לא היה יכול להמציא.
רק מה- אשתו של קדאפי "דורשת" חקירה כדי למצוא את האשמים ב"רצח" שלו. לא פחות ולא יותר. פתאום מתאים למפלצות האלה להיעזר בשיטה הדמוקרטית של זכויות אזרח. זה יכול היה להיות מצחיק אם זה לא היה כל כך מגעיל.
אחר כך מראים את גופתו על ריצפת בית קירור בבית המטבחיים של עיר מולדתו ותור ארוך משתרך כדי לזכות בצילום של הרחן המת. לכולם יש טלפונים סלולאריים וכובעים של ניו יורק יאנקיס.
איזה עולם אבסורדי.
דווקא באזור הזה מצא משה רבינו לנכון למקם את ארץ היהודים.

תורכיה

אחרי יומיים של זוועות מתרצה המנהיג התורכי ומסכים לקבל מישראל קרווילות- מבנים לאכסון זמני של אנשים, אבל לא צוותי הצלה. ארדואן רואה בעיני רוחו תמונת טלביזיה אפשרית שבה יראו צוותי חילוץ ישראלים מצילים, רחמנא לצלן, תינוק תורכי. זו תהיה בושה שהוא לא יוכל לעמוד בפניה....
כל כך עצוב שישראל תקועה באזור עולם כזה. איזה סיכוי יש להידבר עם אנשים כאלה, ומה תהיה משמעותה של הידברות שכזו?
אבל שישאר בינינו.

פרס נובל ישראלי

HILLEL CELEBRATES SCHALIT'S RELEASE

Hillel @ York's Israel affairs committee celebrated the release of kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit on Oct 24 by inviting students to gather in York University's Central Square. Wearing blue and white, they presented information about the prisoner exchange, details about Schalit's five-year captivity and displayed a banner that translates as, "How good it is that you're home!" The event attracted 75 students, some of whom signed a card that will be sent to Schalit to welcome him home.

Canadian Jewish war veterans

On Nov. 11, millions of people around the world will pause to remember the men and women who have served their country and given their lives over the past century. This week and next I devote my columns to our Jewish veterans and to the Jewish soldiers who made the ultimate sacrifice.

Almost 17,000 Canadian Jews volunteered for service in World War II with 420 killed, died, or missing and presumed dead. "An additional 2,000 Jews who enlisted, but who did not declare their Jewish identity in order to avert danger if captured by the Nazi forces." [http://bit.ly/jwar01]

The Canadian Jewish Congress has created an important database, Canadian Casualties in the Armed Forces, which includes the names of those who died while serving in World War I, World War II and the Korean War. [http://bit.ly/jwar02]

Among the 574 who gave their lives, you can read about:

• Private Samuel Hackman who emigrated from Russia with his parents, first living in Rumsey, Alta., and then in Calgary. He enlisted in the 32nd Battalion in May 1916 and was killed on Sept. 24, 1916. Samuel is buried in Somme, France. [http://bit.ly/jwar03]

• Pilot Officer Jacob Feldman of Toronto who enlisted in the air force in 1941 and won his wings in London, England, in July 1944. He was on his 16th air operation when he failed to return from a flight over Gelsenkirchen-Buer, Germany, and was presumed dead on Dec. 29, 1944. He was 21. [http://bit.ly/jwar04]

• Warrant Officer Ira Kliman of Regina, who was killed in action overseas on May 7, 1943. After several bombing missions over Germany, he flew planes and personnel to Africa and Egypt while stationed at Gibraltar. Later, he was transferred to a bombing squadron with headquarters in Libya. In 1951, the province of Saskatchewan named Kliman Lake in his memory. [http://bit.ly/jwar05]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Again, to put a human face on war, don't miss a lovely feature on the Toronto Star's website, titled Remembrance Day: The boys of Major Street. Joe Greenberg remembers Chucky and Porky, Solly and Harold, and the other Jewish immigrant kids from his neighbourhood who died in World War II. [http://bit.ly/jwar06]

As reported recently in The CJN, the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Toronto Post, have broken ground for a long overdue memorial to the fallen that is slated to be unveiled on Nov. 11. "It's the culmination of something that should have been done many years ago," said Norm Gardner, who served in the Canadian Armed Forces. "When I hear people say Jews never fought in the war, they're being ignorant only because they don't know. This will help change that." [http://bit.ly/jwar07]

In Montreal, a monument to Jewish war veterans can be found in the city's Jewish community campus. It reads in French, Hebrew and English, "In tribute to the thousands of Jewish war veterans who fought in Canada's wars and in memory of the hundreds who lost their lives in service to their country." [http://bit.ly/jwar08]

It is followed by Psalm 23:4, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil for Thou are with me."

Learning from Catholic schools

I recently visited a Catholic school in New York. Barred from public funding because of separation of church and state, struggling to refine its target audience and core mission, and concerned with the relevance of religious instruction in secular society, it showed me that there are surprising similarities between the concerns of Jewish and American Catholic schools.

Since 1990, more than 1,300 Catholic schools have closed in the United States, and enrolment has dropped by more than 300,000 students. While some attrition can be attributed to public school reform and scandals that continue to rock the Church, a report by the Fordham Institute attributes much of the loss to economics and shrinking demographics. As Catholics flee urban centres and move to the suburbs, they leave behind weakened schools that face steeply rising operating costs. Like Jewish day schools, increased costs lead to increases in tuition that force low and middle-income families out of the system.

Responses to the Catholic tuition crisis vary. Some, such as cultivating a broader donor base, mobilizing top religious and lay leadership, lobbying government for funding, and gaining tuition support from umbrella organizations, mirror efforts in the Jewish community.

Other Catholic schools have developed innovative solutions. In Wichita, Kan., under the leadership of the local bishop, churches took up the cause of their schools. In 2006-2007, local parishes raised $32 million from Sunday collections. The astounding grassroots support dramatically lowered tuition and increased enrolment.

Similarly, the last decade has seen the establishment of networks of Catholic schools independent of the Church. Unencumbered by the Church hierarchy, networked schools share resources and reduce costs in a collaborative effort yet untapped by Jewish schools. Some schools have created innovative corporate partnerships providing new revenue streams.

Class Act

Daniel Held

Students at Cristo Rey high schools, for example, are clustered in groups of five for corporate internships wherein each student spends one day a week working in the private sector. For the student, it's on-the-job training while the company pays the school for the work hours, subventing the cost of tuition.

Beyond finances, Jewish and Catholic schools face other common struggles. Most prevalent on my visit was the structure and function of religious instruction.

Like day schools, Catholic schools take a wide variety of approaches to teaching religion. The school I visited has only 40 minutes of daily religious instruction. Religion, however, is woven into the underlying fabric of the school's culture. Assemblies and school events focus on Catholic themes, sports teams pray together before a game, the walls of the school imbue religious values, and even fundraising and discipline speak to the religious nature of the school. In this sense, religious education in the school isn't relegated to particular classes or times of instruction. Rather, it's taught as a way of life and a set of values for every aspect of living.

Other than election day, when a Catholic school housed my polling station, this was my fist visit to another religious school. Jewish, Christian, Muslim and other independent schools share many the same fiscal and pedagogical challenges. While we usually turn inward for support, models of innovation and change might be found by looking outward as well.

The tuition crisis has arrived

Simcha Katz
JTA

Guest Voice

One of the most daunting challenges facing Jewish communities in North America is the high cost of living a Jewish lifestyle. Particularly in these difficult economic times, when so many are either unemployed or underemployed, the financial demands seem overwhelming.

The No. 1 expense for most traditionally observant families is, of course, tuition. The day school tuition crisis is no longer something that looms on the distant horizon. It has arrived. The Avi Chai Foundation's most recent census indicates an across-the-board enrolment drop of three per cent.

Consider a family with four children earning $200,000 a year. Only 3.5 per cent of Americans earn more, yet such families are having difficulty paying tuition bills that typically exceed their mortgage obligations.

Our schools are under enormous pressure as they struggle to deliver high-quality education to our children. The stress factor is filtering down to families. It deteriorates simchat hachayim (joy of living) and erodes shalom bayit (domestic tranquility).

It is of critical necessity that the Jewish community demonstrate creativity in dealing with the complex and multifaceted issues and challenges surrounding this crisis. At the outset, we should be honest: generations of Jews have sacrificed in order to educate their children, and we must be willing to follow suit. This is particularly difficult for our generation. Many of us have been blessed with prosperity and grown accustomed to living an upper-middle-class lifestyle.

Our grandparents and parents paid tuition, but they rarely if ever took vacations or purchased new vehicles on a regular basis. They lived in small residences that were more modest than those we live in today. The economic downturn has created a new financial reality for many of us. As such, we need to rethink our lifestyles and reassess our spending habits.

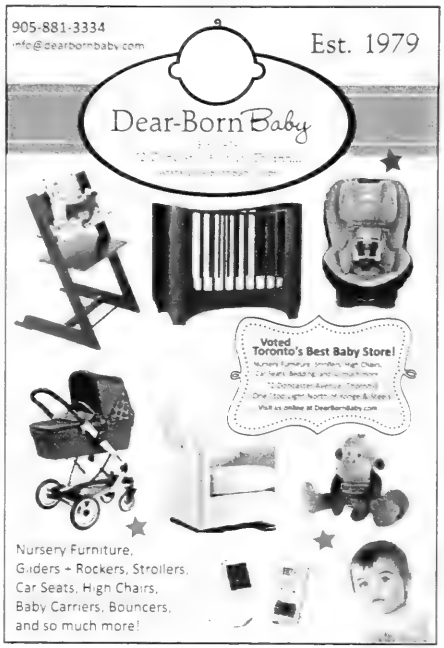
Beyond this, however, we need additional honesty to face the multifaceted and complex issues of this crisis that have been avoided in attempting to maintain the status quo. Any call to arms also must include the general community, lay leaders, rabbinate and even the schools themselves.

Schools can and should be held accountable for out-of-control spending and quality of education.

How do we ensure that sustaining our schools becomes a communal responsibility? For starters, we should strongly urge that the majority of one's charitable giving be kept in the local community and that the majority of those funds be allocated to local schools. Additionally, we should develop a system of communal educational endowment funds in which people leave a small portion of their estates to the local community to assure its viability beyond their lifetimes.

The Orthodox Union recently expanded its efforts to address the tuition challenge by creating a task force on Jewish education affordability meant to interface with community leaders, institutions, federations and local schools. The need to partner with Jewish federations and philanthropic organizations is obvious. The OU will continue to urge their leadership to recognize that Jewish continuity can only be assured through Jewish education.

Simcha Katz is president of the Orthodox Union.



Remembering to be happy

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

A rabbi once said that, when God gave Shabbat to the Jewish people, congregational rabbis were excluded.

Shabbatot and Jewish holidays find rabbis preparing for, in addition to the usual obligations, holiday classes and divrei torah, advising congregants on how to prepare themselves and their homes, visiting the sick (on Shabbat, a hospital visit can mean traipsing up 14 stories – and back down!), facilitating shalom bayit in these stressful times, arranging for holiday synagogue observances, helping the rabbanit prepare for the many guests who will share a meal at the house, and always, of course, making time for his own children. The list goes on…

Be that as it may, this extra work provides its own reward: the satisfaction of congregants making the most of these special times, with God's help, of course.

Strangely, perhaps, I didn't feel that exhausted during this year's chagim, but when they were over, I felt a great fatigue, along with a special happiness.

The theme of Sukkot and Simchat Torah is happiness. The Torah commands us in Leviticus "and you shall rejoice before Hashem your God for seven days," and again in the book of Deuteronomy, "And you shall rejoice in your feast [Sukkot]… and you shall be altogether happy."

This year, I felt even happier than usual, as there was a sense of contentment, love and kindness in the air. My son, Nissim, 6, read a Torah portion for the first time, as did other children in our synagogue. And, of course, Gilad Schalit returned home after five years in captivity!

I followed closely the news of Schalit's imminent release and was overjoyed, as was the rest of our community, that our prayers were finally answered with his return home. Nevertheless, this episode signalled many questions, primarily, is trading 1,000 terrorists for one of our children an acceptable deal?

As I was struggling with this question, the Torah commandment to be happy came to mind. Just as we put aside the six days of worldly toil to celebrate Shabbat, so, too, do we make a concerted effort to put aside concerns that may diminish the happiness of Sukkot and Simchat Torah. This year, a difficult challenge before us was to suspend our valid objections to this deal by living in a moment of happiness and joy at Schalit's release – and, make no mistake, it was a terrible struggle.

The Torah states that the curses that God would mete out to the Jews just before their entry into the Land of Israel would happen "because you did not serve Hashem your God amid gladness and goodness of heart, when everything was abundant."

Thus, the Torah teaches us that happiness is the key to all good things.

Rabbi Nachman of Breslev affirms that it's a great mitzvah to be happy always, and, furthermore, that the cause of all evil is a lack of happiness.

Let us all strive to put our differences aside and be happy – happy for life, happy for our Torah, happy for all of our blessings, and happy for the return of Gilad Shalit.

TORAH CELEBRATION

Students at Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill campus gathered to celebrate Simchat Torah, with the oldest students unrolling a Sefer Torah for other students and staff. Rabbi Noam Katz, the school's dean of Jewish living, highlighted some famous passages and unique formatting, while volunteers read out the last verses of Dvarim and the first verses of Bereshit.

More Jewish teens, more meaningful Jewish experiences

"Because of my involvement in BBYO, I am more confident to enter university as an advocate for change, a supporter of Israel, a voice for what I believe in, and a young Jewish adult. It is true when they say that BBYO has the power to change lives."

Gabbi Baker, BBYO Alumna

Since 1924 BBYO has offered fun, meaningful and affordable experiences to Jewish teens, shaping the lives of over 250,000 alumni. Rooted in the traditions of AZA and BBG, more than 600 chapters operate worldwide with a focus on leadership and community service.

Today, with a new logo and a renewed vision, BBYO offers an expanded menu of experiences open to all Jewish teens with added focus on premium service learning and advocacy, world travel, and programs tailored to middle school students.

As always, BBYO provides a place for Jewish teens to build a movement capable of creating positive change in the world, and all while developing Jewish identities and long lasting friendships.

Read more about how BBYO shapes lives through the recently released BBYO Impact Study at bbyo.org/impact.

ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES

Grade 3 students Shayne, left, and Rony of the Toronto Heschel School are studying habitats and what species need to survive. They've chosen to research Ein Gedi and have started decorating their classroom to resemble the Israeli oasis.

KIDS HELP SICKKIDS: Zachary and Maya Winkler hold their 5th annual Do Something Sweet fundraiser in support of the Hospital for Sick Children, Nov. 6, 2-4 p.m. at 81 Ramblewood Lane, Thornhill, Ont. Last year, they raised more than $5,200. They will make and hand out candy floss and ask people to donate what they can. There will be face painting, balloon animals, games and a silent auction. Participants will receive a Do Something Sweet 2010 T-shirt with a minimum $20 donation. Tax receipts are available.

Pickle king was committed to Jewish causes

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

It was one of those rare moments when a choice that seemed arbitrary turned out to be a life-changing event that affects generations.

When a particularly hot and humid summer in 1944 produced more cucumbers than the Bick farming family could sell, George Bick was faced with two options: bury them, or find a way to use them.

"It was my grandfather, [George Bick], who found someone in Kensington Market who knew how to make kosher pickles, and he said, 'There is no way we're plowing these under,'" said Robert Bick, whose father, Bick's Pickles co-founder Walter Bick, died last month after suffering a stroke at the age of 94.

But the story really begins with another life-changing decision Walter Bick's parents made when they were living in Berlin in the 1930s.

Following Adolf Hitler's rise to power in 1933, the Bicks moved to the Netherlands before ultimately deciding to resettle in Canada in 1939.

However, Canada's strict immigration laws regarding Jewish refugees meant that the Bick family had to pose as Christian farmers to gain entry into the country.

The Bicks managed to escape the Holocaust, but Robert said his father lost a number of family members in the war.

Robert's mother, Jeanny, whom Walter met during his time in the Netherlands, suffered the loss of nearly every member of her extended family.

"Between them, they lost a lot of family," Robert said.

Meanwhile, in Scarborough, the Bicks were raising animals and growing vegetables on their 160-acre-farm next to what is now Scarborough Town Centre.

Although they had a contract with Rose Brand pickles for their cucumber crop, the pickle company couldn't accept the surplus the Bicks harvested in 1944.

Using an old Dutch family recipe, Walter and his father packed their cucumbers into 50-gallon barrels of brine.

For years, the Bicks sold their product to restaurants, butcher shops and army camps, but by 1952, they were packing pasteurized pickles in jars.

During the shivah, held at a downtown Toronto apartment, Robert said he was greeted by a man who looked like he was in his 90s.

"He said, 'I gave your father his first order from Dominion stores in 1952.'"

Robert, who was five years old when the Bicks started jarring pickles, said he has many fond memories of growing up on the farm, which was later rebuilt into a factory.

"My older sister, Catherene, and I used to stand at the grating machine and take out the broken pieces and the crooked cucumbers," he said. "My whole youth was working afternoons, evenings, weekends and summers in the factory."

Walter Bick

He said during the shivah he met many people who had been touched by his father in some way over the years.

A man he'd never met shared his memories as a 12-year-old boy who visited the factory for a school project.

"My father took him through the whole factory… He took him into the warehouse and filled a box with various jars of pickles to take home.

"He said when the tour was over, Walter decided that it was too dark for the boy to ride home on his bike, so he drove him home, and introduced himself to his mother.

"This guy said, 'At first I had no idea that Walter Bick was going to do this, and I just wanted to come and tell you that this is a memory that I will never forget.'"

Beyond the pickle business, which the family sold in 1966 to Robin Hood Flour (it's now owned by Smucker Foods), Walter and Jeanny made a lasting impression on their community, donating time and money to to both Jewish and non-Jewish causes.

Among the many organizations the Bicks – who were married for 62 years until Jeanny died of cancer in 2001 –volunteered for were the Weizmann Institute, Baycrest Foundation, the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation (CICF) and Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) Toronto – an organization he helped establish to help Holocaust survivors find work.

"I actually discovered that he was one of the founders [of JVS Toronto]… at the shivah," Robert said.

"He put his heart and soul into that thing. Why? Because he really believed that it was so important for people to have the self-respect that comes with having a job."

CICF executive director Cheryl Wetstein said Walter Bick may have also helped to establish the CICF in 1963, "or at least joined very early on."

She said Walter Bick pushed for the CICF to support the Gur Foundation, which gives scholarships to children from lower socio-economic classes to attend the Clore Music and Dance Center in the Upper Galilee.

"He was a big supporter of Israel, always," Wetstein said.

'Moderates' must prove themselves over time

In numerous media reports last week about the results of the Oct. 23 election in Tunisia, Ennahda, the Islamist party that won about 40 per cent of the vote – the single largest share – was described straightforwardly as "moderate."

For instance, under the heading "Integrating Islam and democracy" National Post, Oct. 26 , Tom Heneghan of Reuters wrote: "The strong showing of Tunisia's moderate Islamists in Sunday's election and a promise by Libyan National Transitional Council leader Mustafa Abdel Jalil to uphold sharia have highlighted the bigger role Islamists will play after the fall of the autocrats who opposed them."

According to Reports

by PAUL MICHAELS

Whether Ennahda is actually moderate a relative term in any event remains to be seen. Still, what journalists and their editors need to be mindful of is to distinguish Ennahda's claims about being committed to upholding liberal values, especially respect for women's rights, from assuming, as fact, that this is already the case. In short, Ennahda's "moderation" is something that needs to be proved over time, not taken for granted right now.

Adhering to this more cautious approach, the Globe and Mail's Susan Sachs noted Oct. 26 that "Ennahda presents itself as a progressive party committed to an open and pluralistic society that has no interest in imposing its religious beliefs on Tunisians or in turning its back on the West... Arab Islamist parties such as the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt use similar language in their public statements for western audiences, while proclaiming that 'Islam is the solution' as their grassroots slogan. Skeptics have long argued that Islamists would not relinquish power once they had won it at the ballot box."

Rachid Ghannouchi

Still, Sachs appeared to give Ennahad's 70-year-old leader, Rachid Ghannouchi, the benefit of the doubt when it comes to his espoused commitment to a form of liberal democracy.

Citing well-known Islam scholar Olivier Roy about the "evolution" over many years of Ghannouchi's views on political Islam – from extremely conservative to moderate – Sachs stated that Ghannouchi "was one of the earliest Islamist political figures to break with the decades-old bedrock view that oppressive regimes had to be replaced by Islamic states based solely on Islamic law."

Yet Sachs also noted later in her piece that "Neither Mr. Ghannouchi nor his party has abandoned their ambition to see Islam as the [emphasis added] basis of Tunisian law."

While some argue that making Islam "the" (versus "a") basis for law still allows room for civil law, others see this as not only inconsistent but inherently contradictory. And they warn that Ghannouchi has not really changed his stripes but has learned after long episodes of repression and imprisonment (including torture) in Tunisia, followed by exile in England, how to tailor a message that is safe.

In the Oct. 27 edition of the highly regarded (and liberal) New York Review of Books, Joshua Hammer wrote: "[T]he movement's earlier uses of terror, and the uncompromising views of some of its members, have caused many to distrust Ghannouchi. In an April interview, the Ennahda spokesman, Hamadi Jebali, denied that the party wanted to implement sharia law, but during the same conversation, he confirmed his party's adherence to it. 'They have a carefully contrived image,' I was told by Ahmed Ibrahim, the secretary general of the leftist Pôle Démocratique Moderniste (PDM) coalition. 'On television they come off as soft, but in the mosques, it is completely different. Some of them are calling for jihad. It's hard to tell what it is they stand for.'"

In the meantime, as important as what will transpire politically in Tunisia and Libya is (recalling the Heneghan quote above about Jalil's adherence to sharia), the most significant development in the Arab world concerning Islam and democracy will be the outcome of Egypt's parliamentary elections scheduled for Nov. 28. With 47 parties in the running, but with the Muslim Brotherhood and ultra-conservative Salafists likely to take the largest blocs of seats, the future there may be anything but liberal.

Paul Michaels is director of research and media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Criminal charges filed against nursing home

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Marsha Palansky is bringing charges of criminal negligence against the Simkin Centre, Winnipeg's only Jewish nursing home, in the death of her mother, Lil Peck, a 93-year-old resident who died last year after being transferred to a hospital where she was found to have severe, untreated bed sores.

In a statement, Palansky's lawyer, Harvey Berkal, said the Criminal Code allows private citizens to lay criminal charges in cases where the police or government fail to do so.

It's rare for serious charges to be laid this way, said Berkal, whose father, the late Rabbi Louis Berkal, was also a resident of the Simkin Centre (also known as the Sharon Home) in his last months and received what some members of his family consider sub-par care.

"A year after her death, no charges had yet been laid in the case of Lilyan Peck," Berkal said, "despite a report in July by the Manitoba Protection of Persons in Care Office which found that she had been subject to abuse due to physical neglect, a situation for which the Sharon Home nursing home was responsible."

Palansky is also filing a charge of criminal negligence causing bodily harm against the nursing home under Section 221 of the Criminal Code. "We laid this second charge in case we have legal evidentiary problems in proving that the death of Lilyan Peck was specifically caused by the 'abuse by neglect' committed by the home," Berkal said.

The case is scheduled to go before a justice of the peace Nov. 7 to determine if there's sufficient evidence to issue the charges.

This latest development follows the release in mid-October of a provincial government review that gave the Simkin Centre a passing grade in 25 of 26 categories.

While the centre's board is pleased with the results, Palansky and Harriet Berkal Sarbit (Harvey Berkal's sister), whose lobbying led to the review, aren't impressed.

The nearly 100-year-old community institution opened its new south Winnipeg location in 2002 and completed the facility in 2008. The new building may be state-of-the-art, but Berkal Sarbit, Palansky and their supporters say it lacks a heart, leadership and care for its residents.

At the beginning of the year, Palansky, Berkal Sarbit and representatives of three other families with relatives in the home formed an informal association and demanded a government investigation of the facility.

"The administration wouldn't meet with us as a group," Berkal Sarbit said.

"They called us troublemakers," Palansky added.

In light of the administration's stonewalling, the families turned to the province. Berkal Sarbit has nothing but praise for the positive response and support from the Ministry of Health and the Winnipeg Regional Health Authority (WRHA), which oversees nursing homes in the city.

The Protection of Persons in Care Office (PPCO) review of Peck's treatment was critical of the lack of care she received.

The most recent report was a performance-standards review of the home by the WRHA. Normally, reviews of these provincial standards are held every two years and address 12 standards at a time. Never before has a personal care home asked for a full 26-standard review, and it's the first time one has been conducted in Manitoba.

Marsha Palansky

"We are very pleased with the results," said Phyllis Spigelman, co-chair of the Simkin Centre, in a statement. "Our success in the review process is a testament to our staff and our board. This review has been an important experience for us, and we look forward to addressing the recommendations as part of our quality improvement plan."

One of the concerns Berkal Sarbit and Palansky have is that the WRHA report doesn't provide many details.

"For all we know, the Simkin Centre may have only received a minimum pass in some of the categories," Berkal Sarbit said.

Palansky said the one area the Simkin Centre failed to pass – having an integrated care plan for each resident – is one of the most important. The category encompasses dietary and medical needs, as well as following up with physicians and appropriate health-care teams and updating family members on residents' conditions.

Palansky and Berkal Sarbit have been highly critical of Sandra Delorme, the Simkin Centre's president and CEO for the past nine years. They claim she rarely visits patients and doesn't know most of their names. Delorme is currently on medical leave and won't be back before the end of the year, Spigelman said. Her duties are being performed by CFO Harvey Kinsman and director of care Allana Kull.

The next report to come will be from Louis Kafka, CEO of the Louis Brier Home, Vancouver's Jewish nursing home, who has been asked by Manitoba Health to conduct a leadership review of the Simkin Centre as an outside consultant. Spigelman said Kafka was in Winnipeg just before the holidays and recently returned for a second visit.

"He will be releasing his report within the next few weeks," Spigelman said.

"The Simkin Centre administration and board are treating this WRHA review as if it's a win for them," Berkal Sarbit said. "This shouldn't be a matter of winning. It should be about what is best for the residents."

Palansky wondered why there has been no public comment on the situation at the Simkin Centre from community leaders or rabbis.

"Many of the residents at the Simkin Centre are the people who built the synagogues and our community institutions," she said. "They are being treated like they are disposable and can be easily forgotten."

While neither Palansky nor Berkal Sarbit have close relatives now in the Simkin Centre, they said they're continuing their efforts for the benefit of current and future residents.

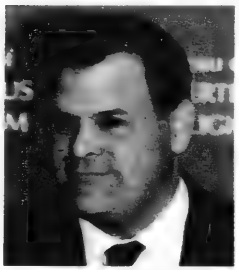
Ottawa seeks input on Holocaust memorial

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Canadian government wants your input on the planned National Holocaust Monument in Ottawa.

In a statement last week, John Baird, foreign affairs minister and minister responsible for the National Capital Commission, announced the "next step" in the process of building the National Holocaust Monument.



John Baird

The federal government is seeking public input online to help it decide where in the Ottawa area the monument will be located, his office said.

"This monument deserves a location at the heart of the capital region, befitting its importance to Canada as a whole," Baird said. "I encourage anyone who is interested to take a few minutes to go online and answer questions there about the future site of the National Holocaust Monument."

The project is the result of a private member's bill that was supported by all parties in the House of Commons. It received royal assent on March 25.

The online poll contains five questions. Three ask participants to rank their preferences for the look, placement and purpose of the monument. The remaining two questions provide blank suggestion boxes where the public can leave alternate thoughts on the subject.

The questions ask about what characteristics are most important in the choice of a site for the monument and how should the proposed monument and its site be experienced. An additional one asks what fundamental values should be communicated through the site.

The government's National Holocaust Monument website states: "The Holocaust stands alone in the annals of human history. It was not just a crime perpetrated against a specific group of people; it was a crime that challenged the fundamental values all civilized peoples hold dear: freedom, democracy, human rights and the rule of law."

David Cooper, director of government relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said his organization was pleased with the government's poll.

"We're glad the Department of Foreign Affairs is reaching out to Canadians to consult with them" on this, he said.

Cooper added: "The questionnaire was very well done in terms of determining a wide range of issues about the physical nature and setting of the monument. It's an excellent survey."

Muslims need to reach out

In his blog entry titled "How I was digitally transformed into a hate cleric," Quick wrote, "toward the end of my talk, I made a supplication for God to purify Islam's third holiest shrine from the 'filth of the Christians and the Jews.'

"I was asking God to heal the spiritual corruption that afflicts some members of religious groups, which in turn leads to injustice against innocent people."

Quick asserted that as a counsellor who has witnessed violence toward gays, he has spoken out against such violence and has "always stood against racism and ethnocentrism."

But in an audio clip from a speech delivered by Quick, he described homosexuals as "one of the most dangerous groups coming up to the surface."

He explained that he was approached by an Islamic LGBT support group to provide an interpretation of the Qur'an that is more "politically correct" on the issue of homosexuality.

"They said, 'What is the Islamic position?' And I told them, 'Put my name in the paper. The punishment is death. And I'm not going to change this religion.'"

On his blog, Quick wrote, "I understand now that [the statements] did give off the wrong impression. For that, I am sorry. I have never advocated violence, vigilantism or disregard for the rule of law."

Chagtai defended Quick's views as well, saying that the Islamic laws on sexuality are harsh because, "we see from the human experience that if we don't have harsh deterrents against public displays of sexuality… the ramifications of a lack of morality can cause lots of problems in society."

Chagtai said in light of the concerns expressed by the Jewish, Christian and gay community members, Muslims need to reach out.

"There is plenty of what to work on in terms of improving the Canadian society – how we can bring out morality and the teachings of God and the teaching of scripture – to make Canada an even better place than it already is."

'An opportunity that couldn't be lost'

Dalhousie University's vice-president of research, Martha Crago, signed a memorandum of understanding between Dalhousie and Hebrew U. strengthening their commitment to explore opportunities for collaboration on international research.

When Dexter and the educational component of the mission met with Daniel Hershkowitz, Israel's minister of science and technology, and he learned of Nova Scotia's 400 researchers and technologists in marine science, he immediately realized the chance to collaborate.

A followup meeting with the president of the University of Haifa resulted in an immediate plan. "He told us it was an opportunity that couldn't be lost, to work with our researchers, and scheduled to come to Halifax to meet with our marine research people next week."

Dexter met with a group of Palestinian-Canadian businesspeople in Ramallah. "There's a lively business community there, looking to find business partners.

One man out of Toronto, who has an olive oil business, is seeking markets, and we suggested there were links that could be established in Nova Scotia.

"Even speakers we heard in Israel had a common theme: creating an economy in the West Bank that would make life more hopeful and lead to better governance and a stable system for a better economy."

A visit to the headquarters of the large container shipping company Zim had positive results for Dexter and Karen Oldfield, president and CEO of the Halifax Port Authority. Zim has a 40-year relationship with the Halifax port, but because of recent economic times, cut its traffic to Halifax a couple of years ago.

"They know of our new $25-billion Irving contract to build frigates that will increase business in the port, and now they expect to exceed the number of their containers currently going through the port," Dexter said.

Meetings with telecom service provider Amdocs and security company Elbit Systems of Haifa were fruitful as well. Amdocs talked of bringing work to Nova Scotia. Elbit was excited about the Irving contract that could expand relationships the company already has at Halifax Shipyards.

The Nova Scotians also visited Metullah and the Canada Centre sports complex, a project supported by the Atlantic Jewish Council. "It was nice to see the support our local community provides Israel," Dexter said.

At Israel's only ice rink, Dexter presented officials with a Sydney Crosby No. 87 hockey jersey and a Nova Scotia hockey jersey with No. 27, signifying that Dexter is the 27th premier of the province.

Burka-clad protesters offer pro-Israel message

Burka-clad individuals convey an ironic pro-Israel message that "Israel is a refuge for gay Arabs."

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The appearance of three people in face-concealing burka-like costumes carrying signs reading "Mort à Israel" on St. Denis Street on a busy Saturday afternoon Oct. 22 has highlighted a difference of opinion over how best to combat the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel in Montreal.

The incident occurred outside Chaussures Naot, at 3941 St. Denis St., which has been the target of an ongoing boycott campaign initiated by Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU) because it sells footwear made in Israel.

The three, apparently all men, were, in fact, from the pro-Israel side, but they weren't from the Jewish community, said Jack Kincler, a leader of the grassroots counter-protesters since PAJU's picketing began in October 2011 outside another shoe store across the street, Boutique Le Marcheur.

They have not revealed themselves, and Kincler said he doesn't know who they were. "And if I did, I would not say. It's up to them to come forward."

While he said he was somewhat "uncomfortable" with the stunt, he added, that it "was theatre of the absurd, funny," and a legitimate means of expression in a free country. The three were using irony and a little showmanship to gain attention to counter "the lies" that are being spread unchecked by the other side week after week, he maintained.

The PAJU demonstrators display banners accusing Israel of practising apartheid and other human rights violations.

A philanthropist at 11 years of age

Holly Ginsler
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — How many 11-year-olds have raised more than $4,000 for charity and had nine inches of their hair cut to be donated as a wig?

Michael Berlin has done both. Nominated by McMaster University, he has won the 2011 Outstanding Youth in Philanthropy Award given by the Golden Horseshoe chapter of the Association of Fundraising Professionals, an international professional association that helps ensure that people and companies practise good and ethical fundraising.

The philanthropy award is a way for the association to recognize individuals, corporations and groups who have given time and effort to a cause.

In the summer of 2010, Michael, then 10, who had been growing his hair since birth, decided it was time for a haircut. He felt that "a little boy or girl who had lost their hair for medical reasons would need it more than I did. I had more hair than I needed."

He chose to donate his nine-inch-long ponytail to A Child's Voice Foundation, which makes wigs for children. At the same time and with the support of his family, he used his first haircutting experience as a fundraiser to help purchase equipment for McMaster Children's Hospital. His goal was to raise between $3,000 and $5,000.

He asked for a gift at each house on his newspaper route and delivered a rehearsed speech explaining exactly where the donation would be going and how it would be used. Michael said he was nervous at first, but quickly got used to it.

He also put Styrofoam cups in each classroom in his school to help raise money. "One little girl in a first-grade classroom took the empty cup home and emptied her piggybank into it," he said.

He then canvassed door to door in the Ancaster Meadowlands area during his entire summer holidays. He was impressed by a man who handed over $50 at the door when he heard what Michael was doing.

"Some people would run out to their car and empty out all their change from their coin tray," Michael said.

Michael Berlin

He raised about $1,000 every two weeks for two months. The money will be used to purchase equipment at McMaster Children's Hospital. "One wheelchair costs over $800, so now they can buy a couple of them."

Michael's future plans include another fundraiser for McMaster Children's hospital. In addition, his hair must be at least nine inches long for him to donate it, and as it has already reached the six-inch mark, he is well on his way. This time, he is determined to reach a goal of $5,000.

The International Outstanding Youth in Philanthropy Award is given in Canada, the United States and Mexico.

Name change reflects JWI's mandate

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

In an attempt to better reflect its mandate, Jewish Women International Canada has changed its name to Act to End Violence Against Women.

Penny Krowitz

Penny Krowitz, executive director, said that the organization is still the same, with the same mission, vision, programs and services it has offered in the past.

"The only thing that has changed is our name, to more clearly reflect the important work that we do, and to position ourselves to bring these programs and services to a wider audience."

About two years ago, she said, the organization changed its governance model from an internal board to a board made up of women across Canada who have an interest and passion in helping to end violence against women.

"[A little later], we began a discussion about how to advance our mission. In a world of instant connection, we wanted a name that reflects what we do."

The board voted to embark on a process to change its name, which it thought would take three or four months, she said. "We hired a firm to lead us, and we learned that it is an intense process. It requires strategy and an understanding of the market. After a full year, we're proud to announce our new name."

The name clearly reflects the nature of the group, she said. "It is an organization of Jewish women passionate about ending violence against all women, and it is the only community organization that offers education, action and advocacy about the issue."

Krowitz said that Act to End Violence Against Women is the only provider of culturally sensitive, kosher housing for Jewish women who have experienced violence, and it is a strong Jewish voice at community partner tables in the violence against women sector.

"Our deep resolve to make the world a better place for women and their children in Canada and in Israel drove this bold step. Our new name positions us to continue our work with increased strength and wider support," she said.

Visit Act to End Violence Against Women at www.act-toendvaw.org.

Painting returned to Stern estate

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — A German casino has returned a Nazi-looted painting to the university heirs of the estate of the German-Jewish Montreal art dealer Max Stern.

Representatives of Concordia University, acting on behalf of the executors of the estate and its two other main beneficiaries, McGill University and Hebrew University of Jerusalem, were in the Netherlands Oct. 25 for the unveiling of the Dutch Old Master oil that has been restituted by the unidentified German company.

The return of The Masters of the Goldsmith Guild in Amsterdam in 1701 by Juriaen Pool II (1665-1745) took place at the Amsterdam Museum. The work is valued at close to $1 million.

The Pool painting is the ninth work that Stern was forced to sell by the Nazis to be returned to the university heirs. It's the first recovered from a German owner.

Stern (1904-1987) was forced to dissolve his Düsseldorf art gallery during the Nazi period. In the early 1940s, he settled in Montreal, where, as owner of the Dominion Gallery, he became one of the country's most important art dealers and collectors.

The location for the Oct. 25 ceremony was significant, as the Dutch museum just opened a children's wing in a space that was once occupied by the orphanage in which Pool, a leading figure in what is known as the Dutch Golden Age, was raised.

Family works to remove stigma of mental illness

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

On the one-year anniversary of her 28-year-old son's suicide, Bobbi Lewin is determined to help others afflicted by mental illness.

In memory of her son, Ryan "Duke" Lewin, who took his own life on Nov. 17, 2010, she and her husband, Harv, are co-chairing a fundraising event, Put up your Dukes, to be held at The Fifth Social Club, 225 Richmond St. W.

Ryan Lewin

Proceeds from the event will go toward creating Duke's Place, a new lounge in the Intergenerational Wellness Centre at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health (CAMH).

It will be one of the first centres in Canada dedicated to providing in-patient care for adolescents ages 14 to 18 suffering from concurrent disorders (both mental illness and addictions).

She said after the money is raised for the lounge, they will support other programs.

Throughout her son's illness – he was diagnosed with schizophrenia when he was 26 – the family never gave up on him, Lewin said.

"He always knew he had our love. The minute he died, we said that we couldn't help him, but there were lots of other people to help. This is his legacy. It is also something I have to do to get by for the rest of my life. I'll never be the same person. I'm more tuned into life, and anxious to give back."

We must continue to talk about mental health and suicide, she said. "We must break the stigma. We are not ashamed that Ryan took his own life. He couldn't take the pain any more, and he couldn't go on."

Lewin said Put up your Dukes is not a charity. "It's an event, and all the money is in support of CAMH. Ryan received help there when he was ill, and we're doing it for them.

"We're working together to remove the stigma from mental illness and suicide."

For information or to purchase tickets for the Nov. 17 event, which includes a cocktail party, dinner, entertainment and auction, visit www.putupyourdukes.ca.

Azrieli gift to benefit biological research

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

A $7-million donation from the Azrieli Foundation to the Weizmann Institute of Science will enable the Israeli university to advance its research in the burgeoning study of human cells from an evolutionary perspective.

The foundation's gift will establish the Azrieli Institute for Systems Biology at Weizmann in Rehovot, named for Montreal-based developer and architect David Azrieli.

Azrieli, best known for building shopping malls in Israel and the triple-tower Azrieli Centre in downtown Tel Aviv, was honoured by Weizmann Canada as "a man of vision" on Oct. 25 at the Loft Hotel.

Weizmann professor Yitzhak Pilpel explained that systems biology is the reverse of the traditional approach to understanding the body. Science has focused on reducing the body down to its small components, from cells to molecules to atoms.

In systems biology, researchers are taking into account that human beings are still evolving, that the microscopic particles of which they are made continue to change in reaction to the environment, Pilpel said.

Greater knowledge of these processes could lead to a better understanding of antibiotic resistance, how new viruses arise, the immune system and why chemotherapy is sometimes ineffective, he said.

Weizmann scientists think cells are able to change their genetic material to adapt to new conditions, including growing rapidly and uncontrollably.

"Cancer is a disease of the genome," he said.

Cells, under some kind of stress, may be picking up foreign DNA and putting them into their own genome as a defence, he said.

It is known that cancer cells are able to incorporate the genes of viruses to facilitate their characteristic proliferation.

"We excel in the sciences – it's not a secret," Azrieli said. "Out of seven Nobel Prize winners in science this year, five are Jewish.

"My association with the Weizmann Institute gives me much more than I and the foundation are giving. It's truly a privilege to be associated with a great institution. It's mind-boggling what's going on there. They already have one Nobel winner. I'm sure there will be more."

The Montreal chapter of Weizmann Canada wants to raise an additional $3 million for the Azrieli Institute, said national executive vice-president Susan Stern.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper, in a videotaped message, congratulated Azrieli.

"For 90 years, your life has been one of stellar achievement, from escaping Nazi-occupied Poland to studying in Haifa [at the Technion], from building duplexes in Montreal to constructing skyscrapers in Tel Aviv, from promoting academic excellence through the Azrieli Foundation to then going back to school yourself at Carleton University.

"You've constantly inspired everyone around you, and your efforts have gone a long way in strengthening ties between Canada and Israel."

Stephanie Azrieli revealed a little known fact about her husband: one of his eyes is near-sighted, and the other far-sighted. This may explain why, at his age, he does not need glasses, as well as why he pays such close attention to details, big and small. He also knows the importance, she said, of remembering the past, for example through the publication of Holocaust survivors' memoirs, and of supporting science and education for future benefit to the world.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

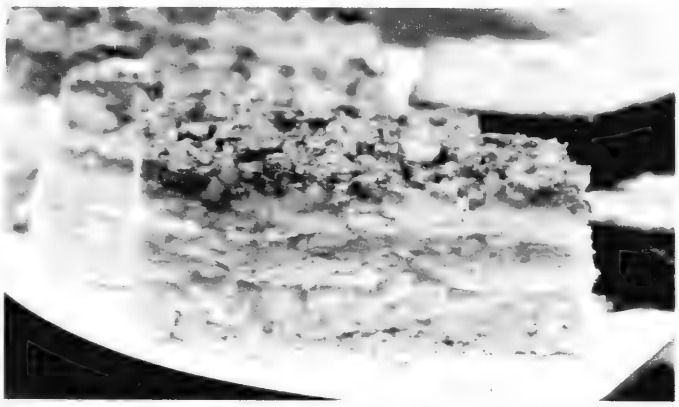
Tantalizing coffee cakes

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN



By now you've probably heard that the return (yet again!) to comfort food is an antidote to uncertain economic times, both local and global. Not that the bakers among us ever really needed an excuse to cream together butter and sugar and turn on the ovens!

The joy of home baking is constant. Time constraints, of course, mean that layer cakes and other fancy concoctions are reserved for special occasions. Coffee cakes, on the other hand, are a cinch to assemble, and many of their ingredients are ones that you will already have on hand. These toothsome wonders are no longer just for coffee klatches and afternoon get-togethers. They're perfect endings for weeknight meals as well as fancy dinners and ideal for weekend brunches. As an added bonus, although they're simply marvelous still warm, they hold extremely well, tasting just as delicious the day after they're baked.

The acid in the sour cream or yogurt ensures a tender, moist crumb. Make sure that all your ingredients are at room temperature before you start, or the final texture of the cake will be heavy and grainy. Finally, don't be tempted to reduce the amount of sugar called for, as the specified amount helps define the fine crumb that is so characteristic of great coffee cakes.

CINNAMON APPLE COFFEE CAKE

1/2 cup each granulated sugar and packed light brown sugar
3/4 tsp. cinnamon
3 apples, peeled, quartered and cut into large cubes
2-2/3 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
pinch salt
1 cup unsalted butter, softened
1 cup granulated sugar
3 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup plain or vanilla yogurt

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease 10-inch tube pan.

In bowl, stir together granulated and brown sugars and cinnamon until well combined. Set aside.

In another bowl, combine flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Using hand-held or upright mixer, beat butter with granulated sugar until light and fluffy, about 4 minutes. Beat in eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition and scraping down sides of bowl. Beat in vanilla. Reduce speed to low. Beat in flour mixture alternately with yogurt, making three additions of flour and two of yogurt.

Scrape one-half of batter into prepared pan, spreading evenly. Scatter apple pieces evenly over. Sprinkle with half of sugar cinnamon mixture. Scrape remaining batter over, spreading evenly. Sprinkle with remaining sugar cinnamon mixture.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for 55 to 65 minutes or until cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool in pan on rack. Makes 12 servings.

CHOCOLATE TOFFEE COFFEE CAKE

3/4 cup English toffee bits for baking
1/2 cup miniature semisweet chocolate chips
1-3/4 cup each granulated sugar and packed light brown sugar
1-1/4 tsp. instant espresso powder
1 tsp. cinnamon
3 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
1-1/2 tsp. salt
3/4 cup unsalted butter, softened
1 cup packed light brown sugar
1-1/2 cup granulated sugar
3 eggs
2 tsp. vanilla
1-3/4 cups sour cream

Preheat oven to 350. Grease 10-in. tube pan well.

In bowl, stir together toffee bits, chocolate chips, granulated and brown sugars, espresso powder and cinnamon for topping until well combined. Set aside.

In bowl, combine flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Using hand-held or upright mixer, beat butter with brown and granulated sugar until light and fluffy, about 4 minutes. Beat in eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition and scraping down sides of bowl. Beat in vanilla. Reduce speed to low. Beat in flour mixture alternately with sour cream, making three additions of flour and two of sour cream.

Spread one-third of batter evenly into prepared pan. Sprinkle one-third of topping over, trying to not let too much of it touch the sides. Spread another third of batter over filling, covering completely and spreading evenly. Sprinkle with another third of filling, again taking care not to let filling touch sides of pan. Spread last third of batter evenly over, covering filling completely. Sprinkle with remaining filling.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for 55 to 65 minutes or until cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool in pan on rack. Makes 12 servings.

CLASSIC COFFEE CAKE WITH PECANS AND RAISINS

1 cup toasted chopped pecans
2/3 cup raisins
2 tbsp. granulated sugar
3 tbsp. packed light brown sugar
2 tbsp. sifted unsweetened cocoa powder
3/4 tsp. cinnamon
1-1/2 cups sour cream
1 tsp. baking soda
3 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1 cup unsalted butter, softened
1-2/3 cups granulated sugar
3 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla

Preheat oven to 350. Grease 10-in. tube pan well. In bowl, stir together pecans, raisins, granulated and brown sugars, cocoa powder and cinnamon until well combined. Set aside.

Stir together sour cream and baking soda; set aside.

In bowl, combine flour, baking powder and salt. Using hand held or upright mixer, beat butter with granulated sugar until light and fluffy, about 4 minutes. Beat in eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition and scraping down sides of bowl. Beat in vanilla. Reduce speed to low. Beat in flour mixture alternately with sour cream, making three additions of flour and two of sour cream.

Spread one-third of batter evenly into prepared pan. Sprinkle half of filling over. Spread another third of batter over filling, covering completely and spreading evenly. Sprinkle with remaining filling. Spread last third of batter evenly over, covering filling completely

Bake in centre of preheated oven for 55 to 65 minutes or until cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool in pan on rack for 15 minutes. Remove gently from pan. Makes 16 servings.

Mexican boutique hotel/spa is beside a golf course

Puerto Vallarta, on Mexico's west coast, is where you will find the treasure that is the Spa Casa Velas in the luxurious Casa Velas Boutique Hotel, an adults-only resort that's adjacent to the 18-hole Marina Vallarta Golf Course.

Casa Velas is located five minutes from the Puerto Vallarta Airport and 15 minutes from the bustling downtown core, although it's so relaxing that it seems worlds away.

Spa Life

By Kathryn Kates

Opened three years ago, the intimate, two-level Spa Casa Velas boasts five treatment rooms, including a couple's room. The light, airy, earth-toned spa has trickling fountains, ambience enhanced by candlelight throughout the corridors and aromatherapy fragrance wafting through the air. Visitors to the spa include about 80 per cent women. Most customers are guests of the resort.

The spa offers separate hydrotherapy areas for men and women, a spa boutique and a beauty salon for hairstyling, manicures and pedicures. There's a well-equipped fitness centre with floor-to-ceiling windows with a great view of the goings-on at the Ocean Club Pool and Jacuzzi. Spa Casa Velas is designated a Leading Spa of the World.

"In all our rooms, we do facials, massage and wraps," says Adriana Alala, spa manager at Spa Casa Velas. "Both our men and women's sides have a sauna, steam room, Jacuzzi and Vichy shower. Often we offer packages through travel agencies that include spa services."

The spa has five therapists and one esthetician/hairdresser. All the treatments are divided into elemental categories: earth, air, water, fire and metal.

"Casa Velas Spa's signature treatment is the Holistic Casa Velas Massage," advises Alala. "It is a massage that we created using different kinds of herbs from the resort's own botanical gardens to form a bath and then we use hot stones. The most popular massage is the Therapeutic Massage, combining techniques that including deep tissue, holistic and Swedish massage. The most popular facial is the deep-cleansing Cure Facial."

This past spring, the spa began offering its QuiroGolf Massage, inspired by the neighbouring golf course. This unique treatment was designed exclusively for the spa by Natura Bissa, a beauty product manufacturer.

"Natura Bissa provides the oils, creams and golf balls that we use to massage the skin with. This massage is suited for people who have tension in the muscles – the pressure of the golf-ball massage is really hard. Most people that come to Casa Velas come to play golf, so for that reason we have this treatment. Right now, it is not the most popular treatment, but people are starting to ask about this treatment," she adds.

The Casa Velas has 80 modern terraced suites with traditional Mexican furnishings, many with a cool plunge pool or hot Jacuzzi. The 3,000-square-foot four-bedroom Presidential Suite has an oversize plunge pool and terrace with a Jacuzzi perfect for a large group.

The Casa Velas offers its Presidential Suite as part of the Divorcee Package, where the newly unhitched and up to five friends can live it up in style. The package includes a private farewell cocktail party for the wedding ring (coffin included), a VIP night on the town to kick off singlehood, a jewelry consultation to redesign your ex-engagement ring and a shopping spree to start spending your settlement.

Casa Velas is the only property in Puerto Vallarta with membership in the Leading Small Hotels of the World. It's Mexico's only adults-only all-inclusive golf resort to receive the AAA Four Diamond Award.

Casa Velas offers both an all-inclusive and European plan. The all-inclusive plan includes taxes and gratuities, access to the Ocean Club and gym, meals, room service, selected liquors and wine, minibar, discounts at three neighbouring golf courses and Wi-Fi. It also includes shuttle access to the picturesque Beach Club and use of the facilities and all-inclusive plan at the expansive sister property minutes away, Velas Vallarta Suite Resort, overlooking the beach with great views of downtown Puerto Vallarta.

The European plan offers lodging, à la carte daily breakfast, full access to the Ocean Club, luxury amenities, special offers at the three golf courses, 25 per cent off on the spa and more. www.hotelcasavelas.com.

UNESCO approves Palestinian membership

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The UN education and cultural organization decided Monday to give the Palestinians full membership, a vote that will boost their bid for recognition as a state at the United Nations.

UNESCO is the first UN agency the Palestinians have sought to join as a full member since Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas applied for full UN membership on Sept. 23.

The motion to admit the Palestinians was passed by UNESCO members meeting in Paris, with 107 votes in favour, 14 against and 52 abstentions.

The United States, Canada and Germany voted against Palestinian membership. Brazil, Russia, China, India, South Africa and France voted in favour. Britain abstained.

U.S. lawmakers had threatened to withhold some $80 million in funding to UNESCO if it approved Palestinian membership.

The United States is the biggest contributor to UNESCO, accounting for 22 per cent of its $653 million budget.

U.S. officials opposed the Palestinian UNESCO request and say it could harm renewed efforts for Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Huge cheers went up in UNESCO after delegates voted to approve the membership on Monday. One shouted: "Long live Palestine!" in French.

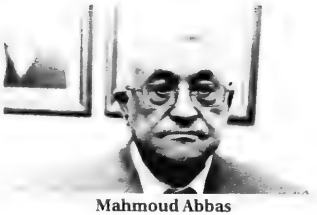
Palestinian officials are seeking full membership in the United Nations, but because that effort is expected to take some time, they separately pursued membership at Paris-based UNESCO.

Rejecting partition a mistake, Abbas says

JTA

RAMALLAH — Mahmoud Abbas said the failure to seize the opportunity of statehood in 1947 was an Arab and Palestinian mistake.

"It was our mistake. It was an Arab mistake as a whole," the Palestinian Authority president told Israel's Channel 2 TV last Friday in an interview translated by the Associated Press. "But do they punish us for this mistake for 64 years?"



Mahmoud Abbas

The Zionist leadership accepted the 1947 UN-designated partition of Palestine into Jewish and Arab states, but the Palestinians and their Arab backers rejected it, launching a war.

Abbas' view is a sharp departure from what has become Palestinian dogma that Israel's independence was a catastrophe inflicted on the Palestinians by the Zionist movement.

Abbas ready to resign, UN official says

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel must take heed of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' threats to resign and dismantle the PA, a United Nations official who is close to the PA president told Ha'aretz, adding that the deadlock between Israel and the Palestinians could cause violence to erupt in the West Bank, and the rest of the world will not bail out Israel if that happens.

"The Palestinians feel growing alienation towards the Oslo process," said Robert Serry, the UN special co-ordinator for the Middle East peace process. "I hear many voices in Ramallah that call for the dismantling of the PA and to throw the keys back to Israel."

"I don't want to sound apocalyptic, but if things go wrong, don't expect the international community to bail you out," Serry said in an interview with Ha'aretz last Friday in his office at the UN's headquarters in Jerusalem. "We will not pay the bill."

Of the foreign diplomats serving in Israel and the PA, Serry, who is from the Netherlands, is considered one of the closest to Abbas. The Mideast envoy, who also serves as the UN secretary general's personal representative to the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Palestinian Authority, meets with Abbas almost every week, and like other diplomats, Serry has heard from Abbas that he intends to resign within a few months if no progress is made in negotiations.

Serry warned that violence could erupt in the West Bank.

"It is a sad and paradoxical situation," said Serry. "On the one hand the Palestinians made progress in their state-building, but on the other hand, because there are no negotiations, and not only because of Israel's fault, the Palestinians are starting to wonder if this [two-state solution] should be the direction. This trend should worry the Israeli government and the Israeli public. If things will stay like this, the good security situation [in the West Bank] will not continue."

At a Fatah Revolutionary Council meeting in Ramallah Oct. 26, Abbas called on the council to consider dismantling the Palestinian Authority. After three days of debate, the Fatah leadership decided to establish a committee to discuss "the future of the PA in light of the continued Israeli occupation."

Israel should take Abbas' comments to heart, Serry said.

"Abbas is a wise man, and he is committed to non-violence and to the two-state solution, but even he starts to think that it might be impossible," said the UN official. "You need to take Abbas' words seriously. Israel must not treat it as empty threats. If there will be no hope, it might turn out to be a self-fulfilling prophecy."

Serry said repeatedly during the interview that he wanted to speak to the Israeli public: "On the surface the Israeli public thinks that the situation is good because there is no violence. But in order for the Palestinian leadership to continue to be committed to the security co-ordination with Israel, there has to be a political horizon. Otherwise it will be impossible."

"If people think that now it is just a bad period and that in the future we will renew the negotiations, it is an illusion," he added.

On Oct. 26, Serry, who has served in his UN posts since 2007, participated in Quartet meetings with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's adviser, Isaac Molho, and the head of the Palestinian negotiating team, Saeb Erekat. The meetings were a last-ditch attempt to restart the peace process and stop the Palestinians from seeking statehood through the United Nations.

Serry said he feels the Israeli public and the Netanyahu government aren't paying enough attention to the despair coming from Ramallah.

"I think that the Israeli public has complicity in the situation," he said. "You think that this can go on. I doubt it. Israel's character as a Jewish state is in danger. I am here four years and I see how you are continuing to build the settlements. You and the Palestinians are becoming Siamese twins. It will be impossible to separate you. Only separation will make the vision of a Jewish state for the Jewish people possible."

Abbas was greatly hurt by Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman's comments calling him the "greatest obstacle" to regional order and statement that it would be a "blessing" if the Palestinian leader were to resign, Serry said.

"We spoke to both sides about the need to refrain from provocations. You can make your own conclusions," he said.

The Quartet's most recent efforts to conduct talks with Israel and the Palestinians separately, based on a preset schedule, is more significant than it looks, Serry said.

Israeli killed by Gaza rockets

JTA

JERUSALEM — Rockets from Gaza continued to hit southern Israel despite efforts by Egypt to achieve a second ceasefire between Hamas and Israel.

Egypt reportedly continued to negotiate a ceasefire for Sunday night in an effort to stem a weekend assault of rockets and mortars on southern Israel.

The Israel Defence Forces Home Front Command on Sunday night announced that there were no more restrictions on public gatherings, meetings, schools, non-essential jobs or shopping centres. Though the lifting of the ban means that schools were to open as usual on Monday after being closed on Sunday, several southern Israeli communities such as Ashdod, Ashkelon, Be'er Sheva and Gan Yavne announced that schools were to remain closed on Monday.

At least 39 rockets and mortars pounded Israel's south over the weekend, including 11 on Sunday morning. Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the attacks. The attacks left an Israeli father of four dead and dozens wounded.

"We will do anything to defend Israeli civilians," said Israel's defence minister, Ehud Barak, on Sunday afternoon following a meeting with security and intelligence officials. "I advise the Hamas and Islamic Jihad terrorist organizations not to test our capabilities."

Early Sunday afternoon, reports that Islamic Jihad had accepted an Egyptian-brokered ceasefire surfaced following several hours of calm. That ceasefire came to an end Sunday afternoon when Israel's Air Force struck a terror cell about to launch a rocket from Gaza to Israel.

At least one member of the terror cell was killed in the Sunday afternoon attack, according to reports.

Several long-range Grad missiles hit in and near cities throughout southern Israel, including Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gan Yavne and Be'er Sheva. A school and a private home were damaged in the attacks, and several cars were burned. Some 200,000 children stayed home from school, and several colleges and Ben-Gurion University did not open for the start of the new academic year on Sunday as scheduled.

An Ashkelon resident and father of four, Moshe Ami, 56, died from injuries sustained when he was hit by shrapnel Saturday as he ran to a shelter from his car. He died in the hospital from stomach wounds several hours after the attack.

On Saturday, Israel's Air Force attacked a terrorist cell preparing to fire long-range rockets from southern Gaza into Israel, thwarting the launch attempt and killing five terrorists. The Israel Defence Force reported that it was the same terrorist cell that was responsible for rockets fired on Israel last week. It is believed that Israel's attack sparked the new barrage of rocket fire from Gaza on Israel.

Israel's Air Force retaliated overnight Saturday for the more than 20 rockets and mortars that rained down on Israeli territory, striking six of what it called "terror activity sites" in Gaza, including three rocket-launching sites and a terror tunnel.

At least 10 Islamic Jihad terrorists have been killed in the Israeli strikes, according to the IDF.

An Iron Dome anti-missile system positioned near Ashdod failed to intercept rockets on Saturday due to a "technical" failure, according to the IDF. It was back in service and intercepted a rocket on Sunday morning.

Kent State prof shouts 'Death to Israel' at former diplomat

JTA

KENT, Ohio — A Kent State University professor shouted "Death to Israel" at a lecture given by a former Israeli diplomat.

Ishmael Khaldi, the former deputy consul general at the Israeli Consulate in San Francisco, was confronted by Prof. Julio Pino during a question-and-answer session following Khaldi's speech on Tuesday, according to Kent Wired, a student publication.

Khaldi was speaking about his life as a Bedouin in Israel who rose through the ranks of the Foreign Ministry, as well as Middle East issues.

Pino, a convert to Islam and a tenured professor, asked Khaldi how the Israeli government could justify providing aid to countries like Turkey with "blood money" from the deaths of Palestinian children. After briefly arguing with Khaldi, Pino left the auditorium shouting "Death to Israel."

An audience member responded by shouting "Shame on you" after him. Pino has courted controversy for years, writing an opinion column in 2002 in which he praised a suicide bomber. In 2007 he was accused of running the blog Global War, which bills itself as "a jihadist news service."

Ishmael Khaldi, former deputy consul general at the Israeli Consulate in San Francisco.

Pino refused to discuss the allegations, describing it as a freedom of speech issue. After Pino's departure, Khaldi answered more questions, but also addressed the incident. He called for respect in discussion and suggested that people are misunderstanding the situation in Israel.

"Is this what the professor is telling you?" Khaldi asked. "It is my responsibility to tell the truth and build relationships."

Rewards offered for capture of Israeli soldiers

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

RIYADH — A Saudi royal has offered a $900,000 reward to anyone who captures an Israeli soldier.

Prince Khaled bin Talal, the brother of business tycoon and Fox News co-owner Walid bin Talal, told the Saudi-based broadcaster Al Daleel on Saturday that the captive would then be released in exchange for Arabs held in Israeli prisons.

Khaled's offer comes days after the prominent Saudi cleric Awad al-Qarni put $100,000 on the head of every Israeli soldier. Al-Qarni's statement – posted on Facebook – was severely criticized, and messages posted online even warned of death threats.

Khaled told the broadcaster: "My offer also comes in response to the threats made against Sheikh al-Qarni."

The Saudi offers follow the recent deal between the Israeli government and Hamas, in which Israel agreed to release 1,027 Palestinian prisoners in exchange for Gilad Schalit.

Israel Briefs

Treaty with Jordan will stand

Jordan's King Abdullah II said he would stand by his country's peace treaty with Israel, although he expressed doubts about the Egypt-Israel peace. "You have seen what has happened in Egypt [and] Turkey," Abdullah told the Washington Post in an interview last week, referring to Israel's deteriorating relations with both countries, particularly since the overthrow earlier this year of the Mubarak regime in Egypt. "We are actually the last man standing with our relationship with Israel." The king expressed doubts about the viability of Israel-Egypt peace in the wake of president Hosni Mubarak's removal, describing the prospect of an Egyptian abrogation of the peace treaty as a "very, very strong possibility." Abdullah said he would stand by the peace with Israel and might even take a more active role in the peace process. "Because of the loss of Egypt's political leadership, the rest of us are having to step up," he said.

Sub on hold over settlements

The German government has threatened to halt delivery of a Dolphin submarine to Israel in protest of its settlements policy, a German newspaper has confirmed. In a report released Sunday, German officials confirmed to Der Spiegel magazine that the government of Chancellor Angela Merkel is threatening to halt delivery to Israel of a Dolphin submarine, which is nuclear capable, in protest against the recent Israeli government-approved construction of 1,100 apartments in the Jerusalem settlement of Gilo. Israel already has three Dolphin class submarines, with two more under construction in Kiel, in northern Germany. Last summer, Germany approved a $189-million discount for the purchase of a sixth submarine, which costs about $1 billion.

BACK IN ISRAEL

U.S.-Israeli national Ilan Grapel, left, landed safely in Israel last week as part of a prisoner exchange that saw the release of 25 Egyptian prisoners from Israel jails. Grapel, 27, embraces his mother. He was arrested in Cairo in June on alleged espionage charges that were ultimately dropped and changed to charges of incitement. Israel denied all the charges and allegations. [Israel Sun photo]

TEL AVIV — Stav Shaffir's cellphone began ringing frenetically again last week. True, it was not like two or three months ago, when the activity of the protest movement peaked, but speculation is rife that the movement may soon again be all the rage, after several weeks of hibernation.

In recent days, Shaffir and her colleagues who initiated the tent protest movement, have been doing their utmost to put socioeconomic issues back on the public agenda. The attention diverted by Hamas captive Gilad Schalit's release and the return to work and school after the fall holidays may frustrate their efforts to re-energize protestors following the climactic "march of the million" on Sept. 3, they say.

Last week, some protest leaders produced short films calling on the public to take to the streets again. They posted them online, but only a few hundred people viewed them. Shaffir stars in a short piece filmed at a bank. With a big grin on her face, she optimistically declared: "The people demand social justice."

"This is just the beginning," Shaffir confidently said in an interview.

This auburn-haired woman, who turned into a symbol of the protests, believes Israelis will not accept the status quo, and she wants to change it.

Tent camps have been taken down, enthusiasm has dampened and university students haven't really supported her actions.

In the interview, she was asked: "Do you believe your group can bring people to the streets again?"

Shaffir replied: "More than ever before, we need to hit the streets to prove we won't be stopped if change doesn't happen. Such a large protest movement is a one-time occurrence. I don't know when an opportunity like this will come again, so we cannot afford to miss it. I don't know where we will end up if the millions who took part in this protest return to despair."

The public took to the streets time after time last summer. She was asked, "How will another demonstration help?"

Shaffir replied: "A demonstration is an emotional act – that's its great advantage. Sometimes, as citizens, we need to be reminded that we are not alone, that an entire public is with us. The government needs to be reminded constantly that the public won't stay quiet, and is not willing to be swindled and duped. In terms of getting this message across, there's nothing like hundreds of thousands of people shouting together."

She was asked: "Is it possible the Trajtenberg Committee, set up by the government to address protesters' concerns, satisfied the public?

Shaffir replied: "There's no question about rejuvenating the protest, because it never died. The government is trying to break up the protest via an array of methods, but people haven't stopped talking about it. Everyone who passes me on the street looks me in the eye and says: 'Don't stop, just don't stop.' What's happening here is that society decided to take responsibility for the state it's in. This change will take time."

Shaffir, 26, quit her job as a writer for Yedioth Ahronoth's women's site, Xnet, a few days after the protests began. While she said she loathes politicians and the political system as a whole, she acts and expresses herself in measured, cautious tones. The one exception is when it comes to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, whom she stridently attacked.

"Bibi proved that he is not brave enough to look the people straight in the eye," she said. "He smoothed this over, he concealed things. He did nothing to create a real connection with us. He had plenty of opportunities, but nothing happened. The Knesset now faces a real test."

Neither Shaffir nor her protest colleagues say they are seeking to have Netanyahu replaced. "The change must be systematic. It is not personal," she said. "The ideology of privatization, of reducing public allocations and of selling society's resources does not belong to any single individual. The public is seeking a new ideology."

She believes the protests will find expression in the next national elections, whenever they are held. "The public will support candidates with a social commitment. We won't buy the lies we've been fed for so many years. Now we're connecting the issues of security and social welfare. Diplomatic-security issues will not monopolize the next election. Social issues will also count," she predicted.

Shaffir and other protest leaders categorically reject the recommendations of the Trajtenberg Committee report. "Time will show that this [report] just perpetuates existing policy," she said. "It also totally ignores most of the issues we discussed. Where are health, social welfare, public housing and employment? What really happened there? What have we received? This committee hasn't changed things."

She was asked: "Perhaps the protest's failure to change policy priorities proves that in order to bring change, you need to enter politics?"

Shaffir replied: "It would be wrong for us to become infected by any of the existing parties' partisan interests. We are committed to maintaining common ground, without breaking down into sectors. What we are doing is very political, and we talk with politicians, but it would be a grave mistake for this protest movement to become attached to any party."

She was asked: "Could you see yourself becoming a Knesset member?"

Shaffir replied: "I've never had such plans, and I have no idea what the present will bring. Right now, I don't have any such thoughts. I'm very content with the route I've chosen, the one we must follow as citizens."

Shaffir was recently interviewed by Time magazine. The article "What Occupy Wall Street can learn from Occupy Tel Aviv" compared the Israeli protest movement and the Occupy Wall Street campaign.

"The other thing that's very important is chaos," she told Time. "You have to be like water, to be everywhere, to be unpredictable.

"We are not an organization. The last thing you can say about us is that we work in an orderly fashion," Shaffir insisted. "Everyone takes part in the process. We don't stage votes, and we don't have a hierarchical structure. Increasingly, we are starting to function as a movement, but this is not a movement in the old sense of the word. Our biggest goal is to enable people to feel they have power. If citizens in Israel do not feel like they have power, all of us will lose."

In practice, the protest movement's inner circle has a tight grip on the reins. Its members might talk about a new form of politics and popular democracy, but representatives of the tent compounds were not involved in decision-making processes, and key activists were nudged to the margins while others simply quit, accusing the leaders of grabbing the spotlight. The protest's leadership works with an adept public relations strategist, professional filmmakers and a speechwriter. Press conferences have become part of the routine.

Meantime, the movement's leaders became embroiled in disputes. These conflicts continue. The deepest rift is between the protest initiators and the country's university students. As a result, National Student Union Chairman Itzik Shmuli was not involved in planning the most recent demonstration; a small inner circle of leaders did it all.

"So long as we all pursue one goal, of forging a better state, it's fine that we're working in different forums," Shaffir said.

She is pinning hopes on a "people's strike" scheduled for Nov. 1. The success of the Tel Aviv student union's boycott of the supermarket chain Super-Sol and the Tnuva food conglomerate encourages Shaffir. "We've learned that economic pressure is necessary, not just filling the streets," she said.

Activist works to preserve our environment

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Canadian environmentalist Tzeporah Berman was coincidentally born on a special day, a winter morning in 1969 when a massive oil slick closed Santa Barbara's harbour. The spill not only caused an uproar in California, but marked the beginning of the environmental movement in the United States as we know it today.

"I don't know if it was serendipitous," she laughed, referring to that propitious event. "But it was interesting."

Indeed.

Berman, who once considered a career in fashion when she was a student at Ryerson University, is one of Canada's pre-eminent environmental activists. Currently co-director of Greenpeace International's climate and energy program, she was a founder of two non-profit organizations, ForestEthics and PowerUp Canada, both of which helped shape the concerns and tactics of the contemporary environmental movement.

Berman documents her passionate two-decade involvement in it in a new book, This Crazy Time (Alfred A. Knopf). "I wrote it because these issues can be so depressing and hard to understand," she said in an interview at her sister's house in Toronto. "It can be fun and meaningful to engage in these issues."

Raised in an observant Jewish household in London, Ont., Berman is active on several fronts. She has been in the forefront of raising consciousness about the urgent need to end all forms of pollution, rein in global warming, devise cleaner and safer modes of energy production and create a sustainable post-carbon society.

Berman, who divides her time between an office in Amsterdam and a home in Vancouver, launched her career with a savvy public relations campaign to save old-growth forests and endangered species. Nowadays, she's campaigning for a global climate change agreement and fighting against the oil sands project in Alberta.

"We need a climate change agreement," she said. "But it won't happen until nations reduce their dependence on carbon fuels and concentrate on building sources of renewable energy."

Striking an upbeat tone, she expressed optimism that it can be signed within two years. Failure to do so will be disastrous, she warned. "Carbon emissions will increase and weather patterns will be adversely affected. Many people will lose their homes and be displaced as a result of flooding and drought. And we'll see sharp increases in food costs."

Berman, who holds a master's degree in environmental studies from York University, describes the oil sands in harsh language, saying they're among the world's dirtiest developments. "Over 1.5 billion litres of toxic water is pumped out every day," she said, arguing that jobs can be created without degrading a fragile environment.

Berman, too, is critical of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's government. "Canada is too reliant on fossil fuels and nuclear power, and has some of the weakest laws to address pollution," she said. "Canada is falling behind in the race to devise clean air technology. Canada has promised to pass new environmental legislation, but hasn't."

In a further reference to the oil sands, she added, "At best, Canada is not acting because it's ignorant and slow to change. At worst, this government has a vested interest. It's given this industry $2.5 billion in tax breaks and subsidies, at a time when oil companies are making record profits."

Berman's accusations notwithstanding, she is confident that the global community is heading in the right direction. "The good news is that investment in renewable energy is at an all-time high, and that the technologies available today are more superior than ever. These problems can be resolved. We're at a tipping point toward a clean energy system. We're moving toward a post-carbon society. It's possible."

As she looks back, Berman believes that the environmental movement in Canada was instrumental in cajoling government and corporate decision-makers to wake up to reality and assume responsibility for guarding the environment.

Tzeporah Berman

"We've come a long way and have had a huge impact," she declared. "We've expanded and matured. When I started, we were very clear about what we were against, but not so clear what we were for. We're not just naysayers anymore."

Although she's modest about her own contributions, preferring to give her fellow environmentalists most of the credit, Berman acknowledges that she played a significant role in protecting 12 million acres of Canada's boreal forests.

Citing two of her most important achievements, she talked about her role in preserving old-growth forests in British Columbia's Great Bear Rainforest and in stopping logging in Canadian wilderness areas so as to protect the habitat of caribou herds.

Berman is also glad she supported a plan by the premier of British Columbia to impose a carbon tax. "It was unpopular with some environmental groups, but it is a critical component in decreasing pollution."

Last but not least, she is proud of having convinced the Victoria's Secret women's apparel chain to stop using old-growth forest paper products to make catalogues.

Looking ahead, she fears that weakening global economies may prompt political leaders to scale back commitments to the environment.

Berman – whose birth name was Suzie Faye but whose Hebrew name is Tzeporah – ascribes her social conscience to her late parents, Sam and Carole. He owned a small advertising business. She worked alongside him, ran a flag and pennant company on the side and was president of local Hadassah and B'nai Brith branches.

"We were brought up with a strong sense of community and social responsibility," said Berman, who was once president of her United Synagogue Youth chapter.

When she was 20, she and her sister, Wendy, toured Athens. "The air in Athens was so thick, so toxic, that people were dying on the street," she writes in This Crazy Time.

This experience jolted Berman so much that she dropped out of Ryerson's fashion program and enrolled in environmental studies at the University of Toronto.

In the early 1990s, she found her calling in the Carmanah and Walbran valleys of British Columbia, building trails and boardwalks and helping researchers.

"I find my spiritual guidance in nature," said Berman, whose husband, Christopher is also an environmentalist. "It's just who I am."

A mother of two boys – Forrest and Quinn – she has paid a price for her activism. In 1993, while co-ordinating a civil disobedience protest in B.C.'s Clayoquot Sound over logging practices, she was charged with 857 criminal counts, arrested and consigned to prison for four days. Two years later in Vancouver, she spent a night in jail after trying to stop raw logs from being loaded onto a ship.

"It's not something I took lightly," she said of these incidents. "It was terrifying."

After all these years as an environmentalist, Berman is no longer cocksure. "I know I don't have all the answers. The best we can do is to ask the right questions, listen and stand up for what we believe in."

Civil War was a watershed for Jews in U.S.

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

This year marks the 150th anniversary of the outbreak of the U.S. Civil War, a seminal event that was seared into the consciousness of every American who had the misfortune of living through it.

The four-year war, sparked by irreconcilable North-South differences over states' rights and slavery, exacted an extremely heavy toll on both sides in terms of casualties, trauma and destruction of property.

The role of Jewish Americans in it, little known even to specialists, is laid out in considerable detail in Jews and the Civil War (New York University Press). An eclectic, informative collection of essays edited by Jonathan D. Sarna and Adam Mendelsohn, it covers a range of topics, from the relationship of Jews with slavery to the role of Jewish soldiers in the conflict.

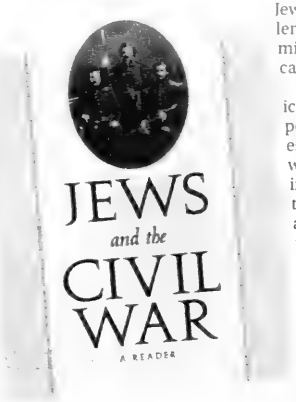
When the war broke out in 1861, the United States had a Jewish population of 150,000, the majority of whom were immigrants and 25,000 of whom lived in 11 Confederate states.

The distinguished Southern historian Eli Evans estimates that 2,000 to 3,000 Jews served in the Confederate army, while 6,000 Jews joined the Union army.

According to Evans, six Jews were awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor, conferred by the Union for extraordinary bravery in battle. Inexplicably, he cites the names of only two of the recipients: Leopold Karpeles, a sergeant of Czech origin who arrived in the United States in 1850 at the age of 12, and Abraham Cohen, a private and native American.

Although few Jews in either army attained the rank of officer, Jewish officers made their presence felt. The two highest-ranking Jewish officers in the Union army, brigadier generals Edward Solomon and Frederick Knefler, who were immigrants, participated in some of the bloodiest battles of the war. On the other hand, Col. Abraham Charles Myers, the great-grandson of a South Carolina rabbi, was the quartermaster general of the Confederate army.

More important still, one of the leading civilian figures in the Confederacy was Judah P. Benjamin, whom Evans describes as the first acknowledged Jew in the U.S. Senate. Born a British subject in the West Indies, Benjamin was a resident of Louisiana, and was alternately attorney general, secretary of war and secretary of state in president Jefferson Davis' cabinet.



Evans claims that Jewish merchants purchased or sold less than a fraction of one per cent of the 12 million African slaves in the Atlantic slave trade. In another essay, Seymour Drescher suggests that the figure rose to 26.7 per cent at one point.

Slaves were put to work on plantations, very few of which were owned by Jewish planters. In fact, the average Southern Jew was a peddler or shopkeeper, historian Bertram Korn says.

Among the Jewish planters were Benjamin, who purchased a plantation near New Orleans; Nathan Nathans, who was a president of Beth Elohim Congregation in Charleston, S.C., and Raphael Moses, who owned 47 slaves in Columbus, Ga.

"No Jewish political figure in the Old South ever expressed any reservations about the justice of slavery or the rightness of the Southern position," observes Korn. He adds that antebellum Southern Jews regarded slavery as part of the landscape.

"Most Southern Jews accepted and defended slavery until the Civil War ended," says Jayme A. Sokolow. "They supported the peculiar institution because Southern Jews lived in a pro-slavery environment, profited economically and psychologically from slavery, and lacked Reform Jewish temples which might have challenged slavery." The fear of an antisemitic backlash also made them politically conservative, she notes.

Louis Ruchames says that the American Jewish community took no official position on slavery or secession. In an essay, Rabbis and the March to War, he writes, "Since there was no chief rabbi in the United States, and Judaism in the country was not organized hierarchically, the great political questions of the Civil War era elicited a broad range of Jewish views, as many as there were rabbis and congregations."

Quoting Korn, Ruchames says that while some rabbis sided with the North or the South, still others promoted the principle of compromise for the sake of peace.

A number of Jews, such as Alfred Mordecai, a major in the U.S. army who graduated at the top of his class at West Point, the United States Military Academy, faced a morally wrenching problem over loyalty, says Stanley Falk.

Born in North Carolina, Mordecai was a true Southerner, but he considered slavery a "misfortune and curse" and worked for the preservation of the Union. Refusing to fight against his fellow Southerners, he resigned his commission in the Union army and lived quietly in Philadelphia during the duration of the war.

John Simon, in his essay That Obnoxious Order, offers a concise analysis of one of the war's most controversial incidents.

On Dec. 17, 1862, Maj.-Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, a future American president, issued Order No. 11, which expelled "Jews as a class" from several Southern states occupied by the Union.

Claiming that unscrupulous Jewish traders had illegally sold gold and scarce goods to the Confederacy, Grant signed the order over the objections of his chief of staff and without the knowledge of president Abraham Lincoln. Later, Grant revoked the order, saying it had been written in haste and petulance. Lincoln himself opposed it.

Order No. 11, however, was not an isolated case of antisemitism. As Evans points out, antisemitism reared its ugly head regularly during the war. "That Jews didn't fight, but just made money off the war, is a canard that gained great currency in the press," he says.

Such accusations prompted a Jewish lawyer, Simon Wolf, to issue a sharp retort in the form of a book, The American Jew as a Patriot, published in 1895. Wolf's book not only contained a list of Jewish soldiers who had fought in the war, but included the recollections of their experiences on the front and interviews with their respective families.

In Evans' view, the war accelerated "the process of acculturation" in the American Jewish community. Sarna and Mendelsohn suggest that Jews emerged from it with "greater self-assurance and a renewed determination to make a place for themselves in American society."

The war was indeed a historical watershed, for Jews and non-Jews alike.

PLAYWRIGHT TO ATTEND OPENING OF HIS PLAY ABOUT JONATHAN POLLARD

Award-winning Israeli playwright Motti Lerner is coming to Toronto for the North American première of his play Deceived as produced by the Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre Company.

Deceived tells the story of Jonathan Pollard, the American civilian intelligence analyst who was convicted for spying for Israel and has been in prison since 1985. It runs Nov. 9 to 20 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, Studio Theatre, 5040 Yonge St.

"The play explores the question of why the Israelis agreed to use Pollard even though they had a strict rule against operating spies in their home countries so as not to create issues of antisemitism or dual loyalty," Lerner told The CJN in a brief phone interview last week.

Gary Shteyngart

"It deals with the period of his spying and the period when he was caught, and in retrospect, questions why he's still in jail," he continued, adding that he would dearly like to see him freed. "I don't think he did the right thing when he decided to spy, but on the other hand, he shouldn't die in jail," he said. "He's served for 26 years, and the punishment is becoming disproportionate to the crime."

Ticket prices to Deceived range from $19 (preview) to $48. Call 416-781-5527 or visit www.teatrontheatre.com

Films Explore Jewish-Muslim Relations: The theme of the 11th annual International Diaspora Film Festival is "wave of change," with films reflecting global political, social and cultural changes of the past year. Film director Deepa Mehta screens her acclaimed film Bollywood-Hollywood; and some "Palywood" films are included as well, direct from the Gaza Women Film Festival.

"Can Muslims and Jews ever be friends?" seems to be the question asked in several of the films. David, a Toronto première, is the story of a young Muslim boy who is mistaken as a Jew by the Jewish community of Brooklyn. Kaddish for a Friend, directed by Leo Khasin, focuses on a teenage Palestinian in Berlin who develops an unlikely friendship with a Holocaust survivor.

Another selection is Playoff, by Israeli filmmaker Eran Riklis, about a friendship between an Israeli basketball coach and a Muslim Turkish woman in 1970s Germany. The festival runs Nov. 1 to 6. www.diasporafilmfest.com

Chagall featured in exhibit on Russian avant-garde

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

"My pictures are painted collections of inner images which possess me," Marc Chagall wrote succinctly distilling the essence of his painterly philosophy.

Until the day he died at the ripe old age of 97, Chagall's vision was rooted in Vitebsk where he was born in 1887, the son of a Jewish fishmonger.

Vitebsk, in western Russia's Pale of Settlement, profoundly shaped Chagall as a painter. He drew not only on chassidic folk tales of miracles and mysteries, but also on Slavic folk art.

These inspirational influences left an indelible impression on Chagall, long after he emigrated from Russia and settled in Paris in 1911. Thirty two of Chagall's whimsical, dreamy works will be on display at the Art Gallery of Ontario until Jan. 15. They form an integral component of a compelling exhibit, Chagall and the Russian Avant-Garde: Masterpieces from the Collection of the Centre Pompidou, Paris.

Apart from Chagall, the exhibit features an array of paintings, drawings, sculptures, poster art and photography from such Russian masters as Vassily Kandinsky, Natalia Goncharova, Mikhail Larionov, Alexandre Danilovich Grinberg, Jacques Lipchitz, El Lissitsky and Ossip Zadkine.

Chagall, however, is at the centre of it.

Double Portrait with Wine Glass

Although he is not everyone's cup of tea, his brash originality is clearly appealing.

Chagall's style, characterized by vivid colour, distorted space and geometric forms, resulted in highly personal and unforgettable images that resonate across generations.

On his canvasses, Chagall conjured up fantastical floating lovers, flying horses, goats playing fiddles and the like. His themes turned on memory, family, joy, love and loss.

Nazi invaders razed Vitebsk in World War II, murdering many of its Jewish inhabitants, but the nostalgic Vitebsk of his boyhood remained deeply imbedded in Chagall's consciousness.

A sampler:

Chagall's oil on linen Self-Portrait, (1908) is strong and virile, suggesting immense willpower and seld-confidence.

The Studio (1910), an oil on re-lined canvas, is an explosion of blue, red and white colours. As Chagall said, "Colour is the pulse of a work of art."

To Russia, to the Donkeys and to the Others (1911), an oil on canvas, is surreal and ominous.

The Newspaper Vendor (1914), an oil on cardboard, is moody and melancholy.

Over Vitebsk (1914), an oil on paper mounted on canvas, celebrates a long-lost way of life and portrays a traditional, snowbound landscape of wooden buildings and a Russian Orthodox church.

The Father (1911), an oil on linen, typifies the Russian chassidic Jew.

The Cemetery (1917), an oil and pencil on canvas, is a chaotic jumble of tilting tombstones and a kinetic sky.

The Harlequins (1944), an oil on linen, evokes the joyous facet of the eastern European shtetl.

Chagall's piece de resistance at the AGO is doubtless Double Portrait with Wine Glass (1914). An oil on canvas in shades of white, red, brown and green, it celebrates his new bride, Bella Rosenfeld, and is an ode to marital bliss and a bow to optimism.

Chagall's works, the acme of Russian modernism, radiate a range of emotions and glisten powerfully.

The SS St. Louis voyage through children's eyes

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Children's Holocaust author Kathy Kacer felt the story of the 1939 SS St. Louis voyage had to be retold in a manner that would resonate with children.

Denied entry by Cuba and then the United States, the St. Louis, with 937 mostly Jewish passengers, was forced to return to Europe. Canadian immigration policy was also hostile to Jewish immigration, and the government of the day refused to offer the passengers sanctuary.

Kacer's new book, To Hope and Back: The Journey of the St. Louis (Second Story Press), looks at the ill-fated voyage through the memories of two young passengers, Lisa Avedon and Sol Messinger. Kacer divided the story into three sections: Lisa's account of the voyage, Sol's perspective and the captain's point of view.

"Children love to read a story with the main characters being their age. Through the voices of Lisa and Sol, they address the hopes and feelings of young children. You feel the optimism and the fear of the children as the St. Louis has to change course in the journey," Kacer said.

"Lisa and Sol addressed what they saw, heard and felt in their hearts and looked up to the captain. In the section titled 'From the Captain,' I gave the factual account of the voyage with details and concerns the captain had at different points of the journey to round out the story."

With Lisa and Sol as the voices in To Hope and Back, Kacer wrote on how each child saw the voyage through the expectations of their families, resulting in two gripping accounts of the same event.

Kacer will be speaking on "To Hope and Back: My Personal Testimony" with Sol Messinger on Nov. 6, 10 a.m., at Temple Sinai in Toronto. On Nov. 8, 2:15 p.m., she will speak at Louis Honore Frechette School in Thornhill. Both events are part of Holocaust Education Week.

"Lisa lives in Toronto and Sol in Buffalo, and from many meetings with them, I was able to write from their perspectives," Kacer said. "It was an honour to share their views of the voyage and having Sol speak with me during Holocaust Education Week." Kacer is a child of Holocaust survivors. To Hope and Back is her seventh book in her series of Holocaust Remembrance Books for Young Readers. Kacer's first book, The Secret of Gabi's Dresser (1998), tells how Kacer's mother escaped the Nazi concentration camps by hiding in a dresser at her home.

The Secret of Gabi's Dresser was adapted into a play that was performed at the Al Green Theatre in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre in Toronto in 2004, as well as in many schools.

"I come from a family of survivors who were willing to talk about what they went through," Kacer said. "There are so many survivors willing to speak and whom I met over the years that there is no shortage of stories for me to write about in the future."

She worked for 20 years as a psychologist before becoming an author in 1997. Kacer is married to attorney Ian Epstein. Her son is actor Jake Epstein, best known for his work on the television series Degrassi: The Next Generation. Her daughter, Gabi, is a jazz singer and actor who recently recorded her CD Show Off.

Documentary focuses on director of antisemitic German film

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

From 1939 onward, Joseph Goebbels, Nazi Germany's propaganda minister, supervised the production of a trilogy of antisemitic films – Jud Suss, Die Rothschilds and Der Ewige Jude.

Of the three, Jud Suss, written and directed by Veit Harlan and unveiled at the 1940 Venice Film Festival to great acclaim, was the most commercially successful. Seen by 20 million Germans and 20 million other Europeans, it fanned the flames of antisemitism and facilitated the marginalization, persecution and murder of Jews throughout Europe.

Goebbels was extremely pleased with it. In his diary, he noted, "An antisemitic film of the kind we could only wish for. I am happy about it." Heinrich Himmler, the leader of the SS, was similarly impressed, ordering special viewings for SS men and members of Einsatzgruppen mobile killing squads.

Ironically enough, Jud Suss was based on a bestselling historical novel by the German Jewish writer Lion Feuchtwanger, whose subject was the 18th-century Jewish financier Joseph Suss Oppenheimer.

When Goebbels saw the British film version in 1934, he rubbed his hands in glee, knowing he could cynically twist and manipulate the material into a grotesque new form and antisemitic screed.

The man who implemented his vision was Harlan, a Berliner who studied theatre under the illustrious Jewish stage director Max Reinhardt and who was briefly married to the Jewish actress and cabaret singer Dora Gerson, who died in Auschwitz.

Probably the most high-profile film director in Nazi Germany next to Leni Riefenstahl, Harlan was a compliant and supple craftsman who possessed the rare gift of being able to fuse drama with ideology. Having done so in such feature films as Der Herrscher (1937) and Die Reise nach Tilsit (1939), Harlan was the ideal candidate to direct Jud Suss, which employed the services of Jewish extras.

After World War II, Harlan was the only figure in Germany's entertainment industry to be prosecuted by the Allies, having been charged with aiding and abetting antisemitism. Twice acquitted, he went on to direct six films in postwar West Germany. He died in 1964 at the age of 64.

Felix Moeller's German-language documentary with English subtitles, Harlan: In the Shadow of Jud Suss, focuses on what his descendants think of him in light of his contributions to Nazi culture. It will be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Society at the Al Green Theatre on Sunday, Nov. 6 at 4 p.m. and again at 7:30 p.m. during Holocaust Education Week.

Jud Suss is an insidious film of the first degree, starring the Austrian actor Ferdinand Marian, whose first wife was the Jewish pianist Irene Saager.

It portrays Oppenheimer as a cunning manipulator who enriches himself at the expense of the German people and a sexual predator who ravishes the blond Aryan maiden Dorthea Sturm, played by Harlan's Swedish wife, Kristina Soderbaum (whose father was the secretary of the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences).

Harlan's descendants, bearing the stigma of his surname and reputation as Goebbel's faithful collaborator, are generally ashamed of their father and grandfather.

One of his sons, describing his role as "unforgiveable," says he created "an instrument of murder." A daughter admits the film left her speechless and disgusted. As she puts it, "I felt like going out and puking."

Harlan's niece, Christiane Susanne, the wife of the late Hollywood Jewish director Stanley Kubrick, calls Jud Suss "repulsive." His grandson finds it "shocking." One of Harlan's other sons sits on the fence, claiming it is a family matter.

The most poignant comments are expressed by Jessica Jacoby, the daughter of Susanne Korber, one of Harlan's daughters and an actor who converted to Judaism to marry a Jew.

In a devastating observation, Jacoby points out that while Harlan, her Christian grandfather, demonized Jews through his film, her Jewish grandfather, a decorated veteran of World War I, was murdered in Minsk during the Holocaust.

The juxtaposition is stunning.

While none of Harlan's descendants defend him, they claim he was personally not antisemitic and was coerced to make Jud Suss. In postwar Germany, Harlan claimed he was "used" by Goebbels. As for Soderbaum, she said that Jud Suss "ruined" her life.

By any yardstick, Harlan: In the Shadow of Jud Suss is a riveting movie, amalgamating the past with the present and underscoring the importance of film in shaping public opinion.

But the gaps in it are puzzling. Moeller does not even try to understand why Harlan agreed to write and direct Jud Suss. And he says nothing about how it was made. These are serious omissions in an otherwise historically important film.

Puck heads rejoice! Hockey back at Maccabiah Games!

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The executive director of the Maccabi World Union (MWU) was in Toronto last week to report on developments in advance of the 2013 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

There was plenty for Eyal Tiberger to reveal, from the anticipated participation of dozens of new countries and the addition of several new sports to the relocation of the opening ceremonies to Jerusalem and the closing event to Haifa.

But the news that will likely get Canadian sports fans, puck heads and rink rats most excited is that "ice hockey" has been added to the roster of Maccabiah sports, for the first time since 1997.

Back then, a Canadian team stocked with pros, juniors and college-level skaters, coached by ex-Habs bench boss Jacques Demers, beat the United States for the gold medal.

This time, Canada will vie for a medal with teams from the United States, Israel, France and, likely Russia. The games will be played in the Canada Center sports complex in Metulla, a small town on Israel's northern border with Lebanon.

Tom Bacher, president of Maccabi Canada, said Mark Goodman and Alex Voihanski have been tasked with assembling the Canadian team. Goodman is in charge of fundraising, and Voihanski will recruit the players. Voihanski, director of JCC Chai Sports, also serves as general manager for International Scouting Services (ISS). He has iced two winning Jewish teams at the Canadian Multi-Cultural Hockey Tournament in Toronto and is a virtual walking encyclopedia of Jewish hockey information.

Bringing the best Jewish athletes to Israel is something Tiberger has made a priority. At the 18th Chai Games in 2009, four-time Olympic gold medalist Jason Lezak officially opened the Games. The 2001 Games saw Lenny Krayzelburg, another Olympic swimmer with four gold medals, compete in the pool.

The participation of elite athletes has proven to be a tremendous inspiration to young Jewish sportsmen and women, Tiberger said. It also enhances the Maccabi mission of connecting young Jews to the State of Israel and the Jewish people through sports. "Our mission is to develop Jewish and Zionist awareness, to instil love of Israel and to develop ambassadors for Israel in our communities and ensure the future of the Jewish community," he said.

"Our program is Jewish continuity. Once you expose kids to their Israeli peers and teams and they become part of the big, wide family of Maccabi where you meet thousands of youngsters in Israel, they want to stay and volunteer and work or even serve in the army," he added.

At the last Games, the experience of Canadian junior athletes was less than advertised as they were faced with substandard housing and organizational problems at the athletes' village. Many complained of filthy rooms, dirty water and inadequate food.

Tiberger said that issue has been addressed at MWU meetings. "At the 19th Maccabiah, all athletes will be accommodated in hotels," he said.

He said the site chosen at the last Games was a boarding school and was in good condition when it was inspected by MWU officials months before the Canadians' arrival. It was chosen to provide a large, self-contained venue in which youngsters could easily socialize, enjoy barbecues and cultural programs.

"We thought the content would be most important thing, not the accommodations. It should be clean and decent, but the accommodations did not meet expectations," he said. Hopefully, that has now been rectified, he added.

Turning to the upcoming games, Tiberger said several sports have been added besides hockey. New to the Games are handball, women's water polo and equestrian events. In addition, paralympic competitions in basketball, tennis and swimming will be held.

Tiberger said beyond the sporting events, athletes are blown away by the unique experience of being "cheered by 50,000 people" as they enter the stadium during the opening ceremonies. It's an experience most will only get at the Maccabiah Games, he said.

Around the world, Maccabi sports clubs are the central organization around which community life revolves, he continued. They are also beginning to develop in far-flung Jewish communities that are trying to reconnect with the wider Jewish world.

Eyal Tiberger

As Jewish life develops in "remote" communities, the number of international delegations to the Maccabiah Games increases. At the 2013 Games, 70 delegations are expected, up from 55 in 2009. The number of athletes is expected to surge to 8,500, up from 7,500, making it the third-largest sporting event in the world, behind only the Olympics and the University Games.

Among the new entrants are delegations from the "Stans" – Turkmenistan, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan – as well as Azerbaijan, Honduras, El Salvador, Costa Rica, Curacao, Aruba and Nicaragua.

Other new participants will be athletes from Arab countries, Bosnia, Macedonia, Romania and from the Far East – China, Japan, Hong Kong and Singapore.

Some of these communities number only in the dozens or hundreds of people, others are larger, but "we'll take the best athletes they have."

India will return to the Games for the second time after the 2008 terrorist attack in Mumbai. At the last Games, India won a silver medal in cricket. On returning home, "they gave the medal to Moishele, the child of the rabbi who was killed," Tiberger said.

Since then, the local community has supported creation of a local Maccabi club, which now boasts 1,800 members, Tiberger said.

Many of these delegations cannot afford to subsidize their athletes, so costs are being borne by Maccabi organizations and their supporters around the world, he added.

Film fest to première doc on 'Judeophobia'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A film on CBC bias toward Israel and another on "Judeophobia" will highlight the Second Annual Free Thinking Film Festival, which runs Nov. 11 to 13 in Ottawa.

The brainchild of Ottawa businessman Fred Litwin, the festival will air 23 films, hold two panel discussions and a debate.

In an event planned for Remembrance Day, Canadian historian Jack Granatsein will face off against law professor Michael Byers over the future of the Canadian military.

Fred Litwin

The festival will mark the Canadian première of the film Unmasked: Judeophobia and the Threat to Civilization. The documentary examines "the political assault against Israel," which Litwin describes as fundamentally a war against the Jewish people and their right to self-determination. The film's producer, Gloria Greenfield, will be on hand to answer questions.

Also on tap is the film The Biases of the CBC, produced by Litwin and James Cohen. The film's premise is that the CBC is slanted against the State of Israel and conservatives, said Litwin.

"My goal here is not to fight to delegitimize the CBC, but to provide a forum for people to see and hear what a segment of the population feels."

Litwin, who describes himself as a conservative, said the CBC's professed mandate is to represent all Canadians but the Toronto-centric CBC falls short, "so that a segment of the population is just not being served."

The film will be followed by a panel discussion with Sun Media's Brian Lilley, Mike Fegelman of HonestReporting Canada and Stephen Taylor of the National Citizens Coalition.

Other films include Milk War, the story of farmer Michael Schmidt's efforts to sell unpasteurized milk; Oscar's Cuba, the story of Oscar Elias Biscet, who spent 25 years in prison for "disrespecting the revolution; The Power of the Powerless, the story of Czechoslovakia's Velvet Revolution, and Freedom Fighter, a look at the efforts of Rev. Majed El Shafie to support the rights of religious minorities around the world.

The festival features a number of films of Jewish interest, Litwin said. Among them, Ahead of Time: The Ruth Gruber Story and The Last Jews of Libya.

Litwin conceived of the festival several years ago when his efforts to convince theatres to screen Michael Moore Hates America were turned down.

"It hit me that to see the films I wanted to see, I'd have to bring them in myself," he said.

After airing several films that looked at issues from a conservative and libertarian perspective, he launched the First Annual Free Thinking Film Festival last year.

In January, he screened the Canadian première of Iranium at Library & Archives Canada (LAC). The Ottawa institution had cancelled the screening of the film, citing security concerns after receiving complaints from the embassy of Iran, followed by threatening phone calls and suspicious letters that required a police response.

National Heritage Minister James Moore overturned the library's decision.

LAC will again provide the venue for the festival's films, along with the Bronson Centre.

HEEBONICS

Editor wants to immerse 'people in hockey culture'

Jordana Divon

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

Jordana Divon did not know Charles Lewis, but a feature on her Facebook account kept suggesting that she might.

"We had a bunch of friends in common so he kept popping up," she says.

When Divon recognized his face while covering an event for the Toronto International Film Festival in 2010, she approached him.

Lewis is the director of communications for the hockey lifestyle magazine The Fourth Period. The magazine happened to be looking for a new editor, and Divon fit the criteria.

"The guys running the magazine really knew hockey," Divon says, "but they didn't know publishing."

Although she knew very little about hockey, she took the job. She describes it as somewhat beneficial that she isn't as big of a fan, since it allows her to read the articles from the eyes of a more passive fan.

"When I look at an article, I'm not clouded by my knowledge of the player," she says.

The magazine's title comes from the idea that the fourth period of hockey is what happens after the game is done. It's the period off the ice, Divon explains, when the players go out into the world and live their lives.

After just two years in production, the magazine has a circulation of around 30,000 throughout Canada and the United States. The magazine is involved with the National Hockey League, most notably the NHL Awards, and it co-hosted the after-party for the NHL awards in Las Vegas in June.

"I was so the last person who deserved to be there because there were so many NHL players walking around and I couldn't pick out any of them," she says, adding that she thinks a diehard fan would have appreciated her spot at the party – and she would like to make this happen if they get to host again.

Although she doesn't call herself a diehard fan, the Toronto native did watch hockey when she was a child, and she enjoyed attending games with her father. Her interests began to change when she was a teenager and noticed how violent the game is.

However, she has since recognized that fighting is part of the game, and that the players tend to be interesting, educated people.

"What we're trying to do is, you have this culture of celebrity, particularly in the States, regarding football players and basketball players," she says, "but you don't really see the same with hockey."

The magazine aims to bring people into the players' lives outside of the game, and immerse people in the hockey culture, she says.

But The Fourth Period doesn't exclusively feature interviews with hockey players. For example, earlier this year, Divon interviewed Canadian rock band Sum 41, as well as Napanee-born punk-princess Avril Lavigne.

The nature of the magazine fits perfectly with Divon's outlook on journalism.

"I think everyone has fascinating stories to tell about themselves, and about their lives," she says. "My dream job would be to write about those stories and bring them to fresh eyes."

In an era when freelancers are going extinct, Divon has also been able to carve herself a career in the field. Her positive attitude and perseverance come through when she discusses her career.

"The beauty about [freelancing] is you really are privileged to meet and talk to some incredible people," she says. "That's why I love this and that's what keeps me going when things get difficult."

Among these difficulties is not knowing when the next job is coming, or conversely, working every single day of the week. She describes the past year as a series of seven-day work weeks.

"Anything worth doing is going to be challenging," she says. "It's going to be difficult, but you can't let that get in the way of your dreams."

The field of freelance journalism really belongs to those journalists who stick with it, she says. "It's nothing more than being a struggling freelancer and trying to take every opportunity."

It's this open mind that allowed her to succeed in print journalism, though she primarily trained in broadcasting, earning her master's degree in broadcast journalism at Boston University.

She got her first professional writing assignment from The CJN, and she later spent a year working for Metro Toronto, where she produced the "Metro Minute" and "5 Minutes With" columns, as well as freelancing for many other Toronto newspapers.

Although she has interviewed numerous well-known figures, including comedian Russell Peters and legendary Fashion Television host Jeanne Beker, she describes the most moving stories as the unexpected ones.

They're the ones you might be interviewing for a quote for one story, she says, but you wish you were interviewing them for a profile.

She describes her experiences as very rewarding as a journalist.

"You keep your nose down to the grindstone, close your eyes, grit your teeth and keep going," she says. "It's all you can do, and it's all you have, because there's nothing worse than giving up your dreams."

Educating teens about environmental issues

During the High Holiday period, I had the opportunity to speak to Grade 8 science classes at a number of the Toronto Jewish day schools.

My talks are generally drawn from materials I have access to as a result of being trained by Al Gore as a Climate Reality Project volunteer presenter. Recently, Gore hosted a 24-hour effort, one for each time zone in the world, where local speakers would explain climate change and global warming in the global and local context.

New this time were some of the videos and visuals used to get a clear message across – that the time to debate scientific findings is over and the time for action is now.

The message I wanted to impart to the Grade 8 students had to be carefully crafted to balance the challenges that arise as a result of climate change and the belief that something can be done about it.

The key message that emerged was the need to question and seek proof for statements made on the topic and how to differentiate between propaganda and reality.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

Through the videos and slides selected, I was able to have a conversation with the students that helped them understand why it's important to become more literate on the topic of climate change, understand how to put the issue into a Jewish context, and then find a way to ensure measurable energy consumption reduction action going forward.

Fortunately, the schools that invited me had also discovered that the best way to learn is to work together. These schools had recently agreed to submit a joint proposal to the ongoing ClimateSpark Social Venture Challenge (http://bit.ly/climatespark-svc).

The focus of their joint Inter-School Conservation Quantification proposal was to find creative ways for students and teachers to quantify measurable energy consumption at their school and to become more skilled at quantifying energy consumption at home.

The first level of discovery was expected to be within each school branch, looking at real numbers around the consumption of electricity, water and natural gas, and developing an understanding of what actually drives the consumption.

As the numbers were being gathered, the Grade 8 students would also be asked to look at what other students aged 12 to 18 were doing in activities for which energy consumption reduction could be quantified. From there, the proposed effort could go in one of two directions: either into the home or to the sister campus of each school. Once the north-south intra-school effort was in place, the next step envisioned would be an inter-school effort to test community electronic brainstorming.

The current proposal is to be carried out in the Greater Toronto Area. The next logical direction would be an inter-country effort linking Grade 8 students in Toronto and Eilat, Israel, using the fact-based approach and electronic brainstorming to develop a stronger understanding of the differences and similarities in the problem and approaches to solving it.

This is one of almost 50 proposals currently competing in ClimateSpark. On Nov. 1, the schools were to discover whether they made the final 20.

The arts can be a tool to promote intercultural dialogue and diversity, Kathleen Weil, Quebec's immigration and cultural communities minister, told more than 100 young adults at the Segal Centre for Performing Arts. Quebec, can benefit from the diversity that results from attracting young immigrants from around the world with the talents that the province needs, Weil said.

Shragah Phyvle: yahrzeit

I haven't seen my father in 22 years.

His name was Shragah Phyvle Rosensweig. In those days, when he was a boy, you would be assigned an English name. His was Philip, which he didn't like. Philip means "lover of horses."

He grew up in Toronto with two brothers, Berel and Davey, and his sister, Sylvia.

As a youngster, he was considered to be a good student and a good boy. His brother Berel led the family down a religious path. Shragah Phyvle followed. The two brothers took different spiritual paths, however. Berel embraced modern Orthodoxy and Shragah Phyvle, a more right-wing direction.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

In his early years, Shragah Phyvle was one of the founders of the Agudah in Toronto. The Agudah spoke on behalf of haredi Jews in Israel, America, Canada and other countries. Shragah Phyvle felt comfortable in that environment and maintained an Agudah-type lifestyle his entire life.

When the Holocaust was coming to an end, Shragah Phyvle, together with other Agudah leaders like Mike (Elimelech) Tress, began rescuing Jewish orphans in Europe. He put his life on hold, and at one point when he was smuggling orphans into Canada, he was sought by the RCMP.

I haven't seen my father since October of 1989. I knew him for 29 years. Soon he will be out of my life longer than he was in it. Strange.

In the early '50s Shragah Phyvle received smichah, rabbinical ordination. He married the lovely Gitel Flicht, and moved to Kitchener after his rebbe, Rabbi Abraham Price, approved of this career move.

By 1960, Shragah Phyvle was the father of five children. I was the youngest. He envisioned a new building for the Kitchener Jewish community and eventually built it. The community burgeoned under his leadership, and would continue to do so over the next 36 years.

First and foremost, Shragah Phyvle was an activist. He worked diligently to introduce the Jewish community to every other community in Kitchener. He lectured at high schools and universities, to church groups and in multi-faith environments – so much so, that the Kitchener Jewish community was at ease with its neighbours and, more importantly, got on well with them. A thousand people of all backgrounds were at his shloshim.

Shragah Phyvle left this world with a brood of grandchildren, and a shem tov – a good name. His house was full of "strangers," some of whom never really left. His wife is an aishet chayil, a woman of valour, who stood at his activist-side while he actualized a powerful need to make things right for others.

I haven't seen my father since the night before he died. A couple of days later, following his death, I was flying to Israel to bury him outside of Beth Shemesh in the Jerusalem Hills. What a panoramic view, one he must love!

The last thing I saw of my father was his hand. His hand was gentle. (Sometimes, take a look at people's hands. They have character). It seemed to reach out from his shrouds wishing us farewell, wanting to stay.

Shragah Phyvle is definitely gone. Recently I read about the new rabbi in Kitchener. I scanned it waiting to read something about my father, who was perhaps the greatest spiritual leader there. But there was nothing. I understood.

I have not seen my father in 264 months. How do we do it?

Jerusalem mayor visits Canada

By Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat is doing everything he can to keep his city flourishing. From the moment he took office in November 2008, the former venture capitalist has been on a mission to transform Jerusalem into a city rich in culture, youth, tourism, education and lasting economic development.

"Jerusalem is starting to show its real potential as a centre of the world, as a city loved by over 3.5 billion people around the world, and I believe and hope we'll continue that trend," Barkat told The Canadian Jewish News in a late-evening meeting at city hall ahead of a trip to Canada this week. The ninth mayor of the city, Barkat was born and raised in Jerusalem.

"Barkat has tried to cast himself as a kind of Israeli Bruce Wayne – a young, hip millionaire dedicated to saving his city," Newsweek.com has written.

Israel, U.S. plan joint military exercise

Largest ever operation between two allies

WASHINGTON D.C. — Israel and the United States will embark on the "largest" and "most significant" joint exercise in the allies' history, Andrew Shapiro, U.S. assistant secretary for political-military affairs, said on Saturday.

Speaking to the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, Shapiro said the exercise will involve more than 5,000 U.S. and Israeli forces, and will simulate Israel's ballistic missile defence.

"Joint exercises allow us to learn from Israel's experience in urban warfare and counterterrorism," said Shapiro.

"Israeli technology is proving critical to improving our Homeland Security and protecting our troops," he added, "explaining that Israeli armour plating technology and the specially designed "Israeli bandage," being used on American troops in Afghanistan and Iraq, are proven successes.

Israel's navy last week intercepted without incident two vessels bound for Gaza that were trying to break Israel's blockade of the Hamas-run territory. The vessels, one of which, the Tahrir, was sponsored by Canadians, were taken to Ashdod. The crews were deported back to their countries of origin. The Israeli navy will soon take part in a joint exercise with its American counterpart. [Israel Sun photo]

New Order Members

OTTAWA — Comedic actor Eugene Levy and former University of Toronto medical dean Dr. Arnold Aberman were among 28 people named members of the Order of Canada last week. Levy, 64, is perhaps best known for his work on SCTV and in the American Pie movies, while the Montreal-born Aberman, a 1967 McGill University medical graduate, has served on numerous hospital boards and as physician-in-chief at both Mount Sinai and Toronto hospitals. In addition, Tony and Elizabeth Comper also were named members of the Order for their philanthropy and social activism. The couple co-founded the business and community coalition Fighting Anti-Semitism Together (FAST).

Teacher Honoured

OTTAWA — A teacher in Carleton Place, Ont., west of Ottawa, received an award for her work in Holocaust education. Shelley Lynch of Carambeck Public School accepted the Arie van Mansum award Nov. 3 at the launch of Ottawa's Holocaust Education Week. The award was started by the Ottawa Shoah Committee in 2004 in tribute to van Mansum, a Dutch man who came to Canada after World War II and was named by Yad Vashem as a Righteous Gentile for saving Jews during the war. Lynch, who isn't Jewish but has taught the Shoah for 12 years, was nominated by survivor Vera Gara, who speaks annually to her class.

WORLD

Cash to Israel

SAN ANTONIO — John Hagee Ministries gave $6 million to Israeli charities, with the largest gift going to Nefesh B'Nefesh, a group that backs aliyah from English-speaking countries. It got $900,000 in the awards announced after the 30th annual Night to Honor Israel held at Hagee's Cornerstone megachurch in San Antonio, Texas. The event drew 7,000 people.

Apartheid Charge a 'Slander': Goldstone

NEW YORK — Saying Israel practises apartheid policies is "unfair and inaccurate slander," Judge Richard Goldstone wrote in the New York Times.

Such a charge is "calculated to retard rather than advance peace negotiations," Goldstone, the South African who led a United Nations fact-finding mission on the Gaza war of 2008-09, wrote in a Nov. 12 opinion piece. "It is important to separate legitimate criticism of Israel from assaults that aim to isolate, demonize and delegitimize it."

Richard Goldstone

His report to the UN on the conflict accused Israel and Hamas of war crimes and possible crimes against humanity – charges against Israel that Goldstone withdrew in an April 2 Washington Post article.

Goldstone said it's important to distinguish between Israel and the West Bank in discussing the apartheid charge. He said there is no apartheid in Israel proper, pointing out that Israeli Arabs vote, serve as lawmakers and get equal treatment in hospitals, for example.

Separation between Jews and Arabs is often chosen by the communities themselves or is discrimination, he said, but not apartheid. The situation in the West Bank is "more complex," he said, because the security fence and roadblocks are necessary for self-defence.

Shchitah Spared

MELBOURNE — Australian Jewish leaders praised the Labor government for keeping an exemption for kosher slaughter. The move followed an Oct. 29 meeting of the Primary Industries Ministerial Council in Melbourne that discussed kosher and halal ritual slaughter, neither of which allow stunning. Animal rights activists say shchitah is inhumane, but it's been allowed in Australia for some 200 years. In June, a bill requiring stunning before slaughter passed the lower house of the Dutch parliament. New Zealand banned slaughter without stunning, which was partially reversed for shchitah of chicken.

Veteran remembers a fallen comrade

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

Kelman Cohen says he's no storyteller.

That is, until he starts talking about his tour of duty with the Canadian Armed Forces during World War II, something he remembers vividly.

He was with the Hamilton Light Infantry Royal Regiment, known primarily by his tag number, B-162032.

Cohen's memory remains sharp and he has a talent that keeps you glued to your chair listening to his stories.

Private Cohen, now 86 although he appears younger, decided one day while serving overseas to keep written memoirs of his time in France, Belgium, Holland and Germany. He figured it was the only way to ensure that his stories would live on.

Known to family members and friends as "Kal," the Toronto-born Cohen admits his emotions often show when he talks about the war, and for good reason, especially around Remembrance Day, when he reminisces about some chilling days in December 1944.

He calls one of his recollections in particular his "special story." It's about Lt. Theodore (Ted) Herman.

Feature

Cohen, who has no brothers, talks fondly about Herman, as if the lieutenant was his adopted brother.

Not long after the Allies had landed on the beaches of Dover, Cohen, who was on the way to Calais, met Herman in the bombed ruins of Kleve, just inside the German border. Herman was cleaning his rifle, and the two started a conversation about the destruction of the ancient town.

Cohen said this was the start of a unique bonding.

HONOURING LIVES LIVED

"Our wonderful life-affirming tradition turns loss into constructive remembrance that helps heal the world."

Sheilley Norris, Executive Director, The Benjamin Foundation

The Benjamin Foundation allows families to entrust memorial donations for temporary management until they are ready to select a charity that meaningfully honours the deceased. This takes the pressure of making a long-term decision off grieving families and also makes it easy for mourners to contribute.

Remembrance

From the editor's desk...

Those of us born in the decade after World War II can vividly recall the commemorations of Remembrance Day of our early youth. And though we were too young to grasp even a small particle of the meaning of the term "veteran of a war," let alone of the far larger notion of "war" itself, we understood through the sombre annual ceremony that the few moments around 11 a.m. of that one day deserved a special place in our hearts. As it should.

War must be abhorred.

But there are occasions when war, as abhorrent as it will always be, cannot be avoided. When our men and women fall in combat, we acknowledge that they did.

The following are the names of Canadians who have fallen in service in Afghanistan, the only remaining active battle field in which Canadians are still fighting on the ground.

That special place of remembrance that was carved in our hearts during the days of our youth remains there to this very day. – MBD

Rabbi Sacks sees Judaism as 'a voice of hope'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Despite his presence on Twitter and Facebook, extensive interfaith work, a PhD from London, England's King's College, and frequent media appearances, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks doesn't use the term "modern Orthodox."

Speaking to a capacity crowd at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation Nov. 2, the chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth said he is critical of "many of the values of modernity."

Rabbi Sacks was interviewed by Torah in Motion co-founder Elliott Malamet at a program celebrating the modern Orthodox educational organization's tenth anniversary. He spoke the following night on "The Future of Religion in a Secular Age" at the University of Toronto in a second TIM program that also featured philosopher Charles Taylor.

Among the values Rabbi Sacks takes issue with is individualism, which he said has ruined the institution of marriage. Britain, he noted, has the largest percentage of teen pregnancies and single-parent families in the world, at 46 per cent.

Rabbi Sacks, the author of 24 books, including last year's Future Tense, has had "a transformative impact on British Jewry and beyond," said MP Irwin Cotler, former minister of justice and attorney general of Canada, in an introduction. His voice "carries a unique moral authority beyond the Jewish community," Cotler said.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks

When the rabbi's 2004 book Radical Then, Radical Now was serialized in the London Times, he asked the non-Jewish deputy editor why he wanted to publish it, given the small size of the Jewish population in Britain. The answer, recalled Rabbi Sacks, was, "because you're our chief rabbi."

Cotler said that the book, known here as A Letter in the Scroll, offers an understanding of Jewish values, and validates the message of religious Jews.

Malamet noted that many Jews today view Judaism as somewhat antiquated, while the chief rabbi views it as "revolutionary."

The rabbi said that, at a conference on climate change, he spoke about weekly Shabbat observance – including abstention from driving cars and riding in airplanes – as a solution to the world's energy crisis.

At the same time, he recognizes what he calls "the dignity of difference" among religions and cultures. "We each have something unique to contribute."

Religious extremism is on the rise in every religion, he noted. "The groups in the middle are in decline everywhere... this is incredibly dangerous."

He said that he and his wife, Elaine, host and are friendly with leaders of other faiths, including Jains, Zoroastrians and Baha'is.

As well, he recalled encouraging university students who were experiencing antisemitism to "do the unexpected thing" and lead the fight against Islamophobia on campus.

The result was the Coexistence Trust, an organization formed in 2005 to fight Islamophobia and antisemitism.

"We need friends and allies," he said.

Within Judaism, one of the biggest changes during his term as chief rabbi, which began in 1991, has been the growth in Jewish day school education in Britain.

Twenty years ago, 25 to 30 per cent of Jewish children were educated in Jewish day schools, compared to nearly 70 per cent today, he said. The chief rabbi noted that, unlike the situation in Ontario, the government covers the cost of tuition.

A proponent of integrated curriculums and leadership programs, Rabbi Sacks cautioned against underestimating kids' intelligence.

"We have to give our children challenges that give our children the ability to give us pride."

Rabbi Sacks sees Judaism and Israel as "voices of hope" – Judaism for its ability to outlast civilizations that once seemed invulnerable, and Israel, with its accomplishments in arts, science and humanities, for setting an example for small, young nations.

He urged audience members to "wear [their] Judaism with pride... it will be good for us and it will be good for the world."

Sanctions against Iran, no 'silver bullet': analyst

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The United States missed a glorious opportunity to assist opponents of the government of Iran in 2009, but since then, President Barack Obama has a good record of pushing sanctions that have weakened the Islamist regime.

According to Mark Dubowitz, executive director of the Foundation for Defense of Democracies (FDD), western countries, led by the United States, have taken steps that have hurt Iran economically and have hindered the country's ability to pursue nuclear weapons and spread terrorism.

Mark Dubowitz

"This administration has done more than any in history on the economic warfare front," said Dubowitz. The results include depriving Iran of an estimated $70 billion in energy revenue over five years.

At the same time, Dubowitz was critical of the Obama administration for failing to support Iranians who took to the street in June 2009 following a rigged presidential election. "It was a significant mistake." The United States could have provided material support and covert assistance without adopting an aggressive stance versus the regime, Dubowitz said.

Dubowitz met with The CJN during a brief visit to Toronto, where he addressed a private meeting sponsored by HonestReporting Canada on "The Iranian Threat: What the Media Fail to Report."

Around the time of Dubowitz's visit, the situation in the Middle East appeared to heat up. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu reportedly urged his cabinet to approve a military strike on Iran's nuclear facilities, while other reports indicated Britain was accelerating its planning to be part of a U.S.-led attack on Iran.

These developments seemed to contradict reports of U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta's recent trip to Israel, when he warned Jerusalem not to act alone against Iran. "The reality is if Israel strikes, Iran would believe the United States was behind it. There would be hell to pay if Israel acted alone," Dubowitz stated.

The current approach of sanctions, cyber warfare and killing Iranian scientists will continue to hamper the regime's ambitions. Such an approach is also consistent with Israeli strategic doctrine of "mowing the grass" – setting back the effectiveness of its foes without dealing them a decisive blow.

Dubowitz believes Iran is getting close to a "break-out capacity" which would see it capable of assembling components to create a nuclear bomb.

Threats of military action by Israel create an impetus for more stringent sanctions, which hamper Iran's economy and influence. Iran could be a much more important energy power, allowing it to exert influence over European nations, but sanctions have eroded its ability to do so.

"Sanctions are not a silver bullet. They may be silver shrapnel that wounds the regime… Much more needs to be done," he said.

Iran's recent attempt to contract a Mexican drug trafficker to assassinate the Saudi ambassador to Washington was, like other Iranian assassination plots over the last 30 years, "quite amateurish" but not without precedent. Plots against Kurds in Berlin and dissidents in Paris were "rolled up" quickly by police, Dubowitz noted.

When Iranian security forces act outside familiar territory, surrogates are hired and they often botch the job, he added. Hiring outsiders provides the regime with "plausible deniability." The news media fell short when they described the Washington plot as a "rogue operation. If you know Iran, you know it wasn't a rogue operation. It was approved at the highest level," Dubowitz said.

Asked about the crackdown by Syria on dissidents, Dubowitz said Iran is providing the Assad regime with security personnel, advice and even snipers. It is trying to prop up its main Arab ally.

"It took a long time for this administration to admit Assad had to go," he said. Joined by other western countries, the United States imposed an oil embargo and other sanctions, but "it needs to provide material support, such as secure communication, to rebels" who are facing Iranian cyber squads who are passing information to the Syrian government.

The United States could provide money to the regime's opponents, similar to a strike fund, and it should consider providing rebels with a geographic safe zone similar to the strategy undertaken in Libya, he said.

As in Libya, the United States is "leading from behind" in Syria, while Turkey is taking a more proactive role in establishing links to Syrian Islamic radicals, he said.

Dubowitz, a native of Toronto who attended York Mills Collegiate and the University of Toronto, was accompanied by Sheryl Saperia, who was named last week as the foundation's director of policy for Canada.

The FDD describes itself as "a nonpartisan policy institute dedicated exclusively to promoting pluralism, defending democratic values, and fighting the ideologies that threaten democracy." It was founded shortly after 9/11 by a group of philanthropists and policymakers to support the defence of democratic societies from terrorism and militant Islamism.

Partial disclosure, full alarm

This week may prove to be pivotal in the world's efforts to bring Iran's furtive nuclear weapons industry to a halt. The director general of the United Nation's International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), Yukiya Amano, will present the latest of the agency's reports on the Iranian nuclear program to the representatives of 35 countries that compose the IAEA's board of governors.

Even ahead of its official release, some observers have noted – undoubtedly through selective leaks of some of the document's findings – that Amano's report will be the harshest yet concerning Iran's dissembling and duplicity about its nuclear ambitions.

For lack of the full and final piece of unequivocal evidence, the report will not definitively conclude that Iran has already acquired the capability to manufacture nuclear weapons. But it is expected to cite the many activities undertaken by the Iranian engineers and scientists, the sole purpose of which can only have been to acquire nuclear weapons. As Ha'aretz commented however, "the report's main importance is that it will emphasize that Iran has continued its various activities to produce nuclear weapons since 2004, and therefore the report will also invalidate the U.S. intelligence report from 2007 that stated Iran had stopped its work on nuclear weapons development in 2003."

It was likely the anticipation of the report's imminent release that inspired much public speculations last week out of Israel, the United States and Europe about the inevitability of a military strike by Israel, joined possibly by other western forces, against Iran's military nuclear infrastructure. Israel's successful test trial of a long-range missile undoubtedly contributed to the suddenly heightened tense atmosphere.

Even Israeli President Shimon Peres commented ruefully that the time to achieve a diplomatic solution to the Iranian crisis seemed to be winding down. He urged world leaders to honour their respective vows "not to allow Iran to obtain nuclear weapons."

The IAEA report will form the basis of the further measures that the United Nations will take against Tehran. The lines are drawn and have been for the entirety of the debate over Iran. The United States and other western nations will demand stricter sanctions against the Iranian government. Russia and China, on the other hand, will likely oppose them. The situation, alas, is far too grave for geopolitical gamesmanship and jockeying.

The IAEA report will give us only part of the damning story. But it will leave the countries of the Middle East, especially Israel and the Gulf states feeling fully alarmed. Peace-loving nations must act to prevent the rise of a nuclear-armed Iran.

Advocating for release of hostages

Although I have no family members in Israel who were killed by terrorists, I can fully understand Jason Kimelman's article "Welcoming Gilad home with mixed emotions" (Perspectives, Oct. 27). My own feelings were torn as well. I remember when his sister Marnie was killed, as it was the first time an attack felt close to home, seeing both Marnie and I lived in Toronto. It was a horrible feeling knowing her family lived in the same city as I, almost as if we were family or close friends. I would, however, like to caution people in subtly pointing fingers at the Schalit family. Possibly, many fathers in Israel would do what Noam Schalit did – advocate for the release of his son – and if Jason had been in Gilad's shoes, I am almost sure his family would have done everything possible to set him free.

Yes, it is a very high price for Gilad's freedom; however, I also caution the press to stop writing about this high price so much, for my innermost fears would be of Gilad falling into a deep depression or worse, as it is obvious being held hostage for over five years does not produce a great feeling of stability. Yes, we all had mixed feelings, but many of us would want our fathers to do exactly what Noam Schalit did, if we were being held hostage by a terror organization.

Too much information

The article "Subdued celebration greets Schalit's Release" (Oct. 27) contained some unnecessary and disturbing information. The writer's reference to the release of terrorists convicted for the 1993 murder of Montrealer Joshua Friedberg was most insensitive! It served no purpose other than to reawaken feelings of despair, hurt and anger in his parents, siblings, family and friends. The media have been very precise in informing the public that more than 1,000 Palestinian prisoners would be released. Was that not sufficient? Why cause so much pain once again to innocent people whose lives have already been permanently damaged and changed? What purpose does this serve? Sometimes too much information could be most destructive. In this case, the expression "leave well enough alone" would have been appropriate.

God and the Holocaust

I take no issue with Rabbi Ilan Acoca's right to his beliefs, and when he publicizes them I assume he is prepared to substantiate his theories ("God watches over us," Oct. 6). The rabbi states: "Our Father in heaven is here for us at every moment." How does this impact on the misery, expulsions, degradation and hatred Jews have experienced throughout the centuries? Rabbi Acoca maintains that "God's protection of us is beyond question," but there is a question that has been posed many times since the Holocaust: what protection did God provide to a million innocent Jewish children gassed and slaughtered by the Nazis, only because they were Jews? The rabbi claims that "God is watching over us, has bequeathed to each a unique mission." Does he mean to imply that God's mission for the Nazis was to destroy the Jews? Was that their "unique mission" ? The rabbi has a view of God as a "refuge of love, hope and protection in good times and in bad." I will accept "love and hope," but protection? How? I know such questions are not original, but they do persist and perhaps the rabbi would explain.

Jerusalem hilltop focus of world's attention

Jessica Steinberg
JTA

The entrance to the neighbourhood of Givat Hamatos isn't immediately apparent. Accessible only from the winding roads of the Arab community of Beit Safafa next door, or via a sharp right off the five-lane Hebron Road, the eastern Jerusalem hilltop that once hosted caravan housing for immigrant Ethiopians and Russians is now the focus of international controversy.

The Israeli government recently announced plans to build 2,600 housing units in the vicinity of Givat Hamatos. Together with nearby Gilo and Har Homa, the new neighborhood in Givat Hamatos would create a near-contiguous chain of Jewish neighbourhoods along Jerusalem's southern fringe, all in portions of the city captured in the 1967 Six Day War.

While the Israeli government has been adamant in asserting a right to build in all parts of its capital city, foreign governments have criticized the planned construction. The Palestinians and Israeli peace activists see the Givat Hamatos plan as a land grab and part of an effort to cut off eastern Jerusalem's Arab neighbourhoods, which the Palestinians envision as their future capital, from the West Bank.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said in a statement that the location of Givat Hamatos makes it "one of the most damaging settlements" that will "turn the Palestinian town of Beit Safafa into a ghetto" because the site is between the Jerusalem Arab neighbourhood and the West Bank city of Bethlehem.

"As we approach Christmas," Erekat said, "for the Palestinians in Bethlehem, who live just a few kilometres away from the Holy City, Jerusalem might as well be on another continent."

Not all of the planned housing, however, is intended for a new Jewish neighbourhood. Under the plan, 800 of the new housing units are intended as an expansion of Beit Safafa, a comfortably middle-class Arab neighbourhood of approximately 5,500 people that has an unusual history and is home to a joint Arab-Jewish school.

Following the 1948 War of Independence, Beit Safafa was divided, with half in the Jordan-occupied West Bank. After Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War, the two parts were reunited within Israeli Jerusalem's expanded municipal boundaries, but the Palestinian residents of eastern Beit Safafa today mostly hold Jerusalem identity cards, while the residents of the western portion of the neighbourhood are Israeli citizens.

But while international attention has focused on what the new development means for Israeli-Palestinian relations and the struggle for Jerusalem, the story also has an overlooked element. For the dozen down-on-their-luck Israeli families who are still living in caravans on the hill – long after most of the hill's residents have decamped for more settled environs – the planned construction has stirred a sense of uncertainty about their future.

"I don't know where my parents will go," said Barak Hasid, 29, an Israeli fireman who was raised and still lives on Givat Hamatos. "They don't have any money to buy anywhere."

Hasid's story is similar to that of the other poor Israeli families who ended up on this nearly abandoned hill, living alongside several hundred Ethiopian and Russian immigrant families who have since left. Hasid's father lost all his savings on two apartment deals that went sour, his son explains. The family lived in a series of temporary housing situations, eventually ending up with several hundred Russian and Ethiopian immigrant families in the Diplomat Hotel, a previously abandoned hotel in Jerusalem's Talpiot neighbourhood, before moving to Givat Hamatos.

Construction workers are on the job in the south Jerusalem neighborhood of Gilo, adjacent to Givat Hamatos. [Flash90 photo]

"All my friends were Ethiopians, not just one or two but nine or 10," Hasid said. "The night they arrived here, my father and I went from house to house setting up their washing machines and televisions. They didn't know what to do with them."

The immigrant families eventually headed to new homes bought with generous government assistance. But the Hasids and some other Israeli families stayed, many adding onto their simple caravans for lack of a better plan. They pay a small rental fee, as well as property taxes, electricity, water and gas. The Hasid family's once-simple caravan is now a four-room complex, but it's no "villa," he jokes, using the Israeli term for a single-family home. But there is plenty of space, a great view and the feel of a pastoral moshav, says Hasid, a decorated army veteran who has created his own little Shangri-La behind the caravan with an outdoor bar, poker table and living room carpeted with artificial turf.

"It's a great place, the best in Jerusalem," he said, adding that he and his pregnant wife will soon move to a newly purchased apartment in Petach Tikvah.

The neighbourhood's name means Airplane Hill, for an Israeli jet that crashed there in 1967, and there is a small memorial at the entrance.

"Givat Hamatos was an empty hillside, cold and windswept in the winter, in the far south of the municipal area," wrote Ira Sharkansky, a Hebrew University of Jerusalem political scientist, in an article on the subject of immigrant populations. "It was close to the Arab cities of Bethlehem and Beit Jallah, and included a minefield left over from a previous war. No one could complain that housing for immigrants would cause a drop in their property value."

When the government first placed caravans at the site, the Jerusalem municipality was concerned that the area would become a slum. In time it became a neighbourhood with several kindergartens and daycare centres, synagogues, a club for youth, adults and the elderly, and a health clinic, as well as sidewalks, lighting and playgrounds – even an office of the Immigration and Absorption Ministry and a contingent of social workers. All that remains is a smattering of dilapidated caravans, an abandoned playground and a few turkeys whose owner lets them wander around.

While it shares with Har Homa and Gilo the status of being located on territory captured by Israel in the Six Day War and all the political controversy that entails, in real estate terms Givat Hamatos has one advantage: location. Givat Hamatos is a bit closer to the main areas of the city, including the better schools in Talpiot and Baka, and enjoys easy access to Hebron Road, a major thoroughfare for the public buses that run between the south, centre and north of the city.

Palestinians not interested in UN observer status

JTA

NEW YORK — France says it will abstain when the UN Security Council votes on whether to admit Palestine as a full member of the world body. Earlier last week, France voted to approve a similar Palestinian request for membership in UNESCO.

The French Foreign Ministry said Friday that, while Palestine's quest for statehood is legitimate, it has no chance of getting past the Security Council. That's because the United States has said it will veto the measure. Germany has made known that it will not support the Palestinian bid, without saying whether it would abstain or vote against it. The ministry also said it was worried that the vote and its failure would unleash a violent reaction.

As a result France has offered to help Palestine elevate its status to that of a non-member state. But Palestinian Foreign Minister Riyad al-Maliki said that the Palestinians will not accept anything less than full UN membership and do not want an upgrade to an observer state.

Maliki told journalists in Ramallah the Palestinians could have won observer-state status long ago and were not interested in it now. They currently hold the status of observer entity.

"We do not want, after all of these struggles, sacrifices and efforts by the entire Palestinian people, to accept an observer state in the United Nations. We will not accept less than we deserve – a full member state," he said.

The vote before the Security Council is expected to be held this week or next.

Meanwhile, in an interview with Egyptian television on Oct. 23, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said he will never recognize a Jewish state and that capturing Gilad Schalit was a "good thing." A transcript of the interview was published in an Oct. 31 report by MEMRI, the Middle East Media Research Institute.

"They started talking to me about the 'Jewish state' only two years ago, discussing it with me at every opportunity, every forum I went to – Jewish or non-Jewish – asking: 'What do you think about the 'Jewish state'?' I've said it before, and I'll say it again: I will never recognize the Jewishness of the state, or a 'Jewish state,'" Abbas said.

In response to a question about whether it was "the resistance" that freed more than 1,000 prisoners in the swap for Schalit, Abbas responded, "Hamas kidnapped – or rather, captured – a soldier, and managed to keep him for five years, and that is a good thing. We don't deny it. On the contrary, it's a good thing that on a small strip of land, 40 by seven kilometres, they were able to keep him and hide him."

Montreal a model for other Jewish communities

The mid-October issue of the Jerusalem Report exploded as a naches-bomb for me. Naches, of course, is that delicious Yiddish word meaning delighting in someone else's accomplishments. My delight stemmed from two articles in that issue demonstrating how young Montrealers are revitalizing the Jewish world. These articles raise the question of how did these transformative, creative juices start flowing in Montreal?

The first article described downtown Toronto's vibrant Jewish scene centring on the hip Carlebachian "Annex Shul." One co-founder, Richard Meloff, is a Torontonian who studied at McGill University in the mid-1990s, while the Annex's spiritual leader, Yacov Fruchter is a Montrealer who enrolled at McGill in 2002.

The second article was written by a Montrealer who is now a Jerusalemite, Justin Korda, executive director of ROI community, an international network of 600 social entrepreneurs and Jewish innovators in 40 countries, created by American Jewish philanthropist Lynn Schusterman. Korda's article, "Innovating Jewishly," describes how social entrepreneurs are transforming modern Jewish life at the grassroots level, social entrepreneurs being innovators who combine "the vision of a social reformer with the business acumen of an entrepreneur."

The Montreal flavour to these welcome Jewish revolutions struck me because when I moved to Montreal in 1990, I saw a stodgy, top-heavy, uncreative Jewish community. Even the few young Jews involved in this decaying city seemed prematurely old, shmoozing their elders, not wowing their peers. Although still dining out on its Yiddishist, Zionist prime earlier in the 20th century, the city was now traumatized by Quebec separatism, which sent many young Jews packing. Montreal Judaism seemed more likely to turn Jews off than turn them – and others – on.

I asked Meloff how he explained Montreal's success in helping to incubate exciting new Jewish expressions. "Montreal's Jewish community was where I was when I started to feel the tug of my faith and heritage and it was a wonderful, welcoming place," Meloff responded. He was impressed by Montreal's ideological diversity – "there was Hillel and Chabad, Revisionist Zionists and progressive Zionists, and perhaps most critically, a tight-knit and traditional community that surrounded the school. Toronto is huge and impressive, but the community is far-flung. Montreal seemed so intimate yet still had the amenities of a significant community." Meloff got the message that "you could do anything you wanted from a community point of view" – which soon resulted in the launching of the "Ghetto Shul," a vibrant, intimate, student-based synagogue in Montreal which has inspired – and helped populate – Toronto's "Annex Shul."

Fruchter notes that Montreal's traditionalism provides such solid grounding for Jewish life in the city, including "a fairly strong knowledge base," as well as "strong Holocaust education and a commitment to Israel." He also draws inspiration from leading activist Orthodox rabbis such as Rabbi Reuben Poupko and Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz. Fruchter appreciates the "Moroccan (French) element of the Jewish community," which "has remained distinct while adding some 'cool' and spicy flavour to the overall community," as well as the "fertile ground for cross-denominational exchange" resulting from the mix of Toronto and Montreal Jews at McGill. Finally, Fruchter mentions that "Hillel and the Ghetto Shul are set up to maximize empowerment and ownership. When I was the student president of Hillel Montreal, I controlled the $50,000 program budget."

In his article, Korda, who with his friend Sig Shore created a dynamic duo of Jewish activism during their days at McGill, added another critical element, the successful Birthright Israel program which has connected thousands of young Jews to each other and to their heritage through "transformative free trips to Israel." Birthright Israel helped inspire the founding of the Ghetto Shul, which inspired the founding of the Annex Shul, while ROI logically flows from philanthropist Lynn Schusterman's generous involvement with Birthright.

I would also add two important "I" words – infrastructure and investment. Montreal has a rich Jewish organizational and educational network, maintained by a strong federation and thousands of generous donors. Visionary donors such as Charles and Andy Bronfman were also critical in funding identity-oriented initiatives, small and large, which bore fruit later.

The Montreal formula, then, emerges. A traditional, literate, well-organized, and well-financed community also needs strong youth-oriented programming, empowered young leaders and an openness to new ideas. But ultimately, you need sparkplugs, young, passionate, creative people to create a new mix, putting their dynamic modern twist on our ancient, enduring, traditions.

Here's what I learned

Note: this month my column was written by my 17-year-old son, Micah Sienna. As it says in Joel 2:28, "The old shall dream dreams and the youth shall see visions."

I spent three weeks living in a small rural village in Kenya called Eor Ewuaso (pronounced Ayor-Waso) with MetoWe, building a classroom, learning about Third World issues, playing with kids, kissing giraffes, making friends, going on a safari, learning how to carry huge jerry cans of water – you know, just a regular summer.

I have never experienced anything remotely close to what I experienced in Kenya. There's nothing that can prepare you for seeing the brown river from which the people drink, or the houses smaller than the room in which you are reading this article. Nothing could have prepared me for seeing an elderly woman carrying 40 pounds of firewood on her back.

I was expecting to see Kenyan kids look like the "famine ads" – you see their ribcages, they're wearing nothing but a loincloth, leaning up against a wall with a bloated belly, too tired to swat the flies from their face. But they didn't all look like that. I loved seeing the kids who, after having nothing more than tea for breakfast, were able to outrun me in soccer – with no shoes on, mind you! The kids I saw were happy kids. Happier than some of the well-fed, healthy kids I know in Canada.

I'd like to share three scenarios.

First: We were building, and some of the preschool kids came to play with us. We gave them our sunglasses to try on. The look of unrepressed gratitude when I gave a kid my $10 sunglasses to wear made me feel as if Chanukah had come early. When we had to take the sunglasses back, it was heartbreaking. Those kids enjoyed my sunglasses more than I ever did and ever will. They had never seen sunglasses before, so the experience was something out of their reality. For a five-year-old Kenyan, this was a "there is a world bigger than the one I know" moment. I learned that it is important to remember that some things are bigger than we are.

Second: We saw first hand where the villagers lived. To understand the impoverished conditions, just picture the worst you can think of, and double it. The women, who had virtually no money, had a charity of their own to help each other. Every month, each woman would donate a small sum, and that collected "pot" would go to the woman who needed it most. They all knew that when they needed the "pot" it would come around to them. It reminded me of the Jewish law that says even one who takes out of the tzedakah box must put into the tzedakah box later. From this I learned that rather than just accepting your life, we must try and improve others' lives, and see how this improves ours.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

Third: After six hours on a bumpy Safari lorry seeing lots of common African animals like giraffes and zebras, most of the kids went to sleep. "Wake us if you see something awesome." (They meant a lion.)

Later, I woke them, "Look out the window!"

No lion! "What's so cool?" they demanded.

I told them to look down and see the leaf ants going by. They weren't all that impressed, but I sure was. From this I learned that beautiful things are not always the big things.

Living with non-Jews in this community didn't feel very Jewish. However, living in an environment completely foreign and non-Jewish is almost a staple of our history. Being Jewish while volunteering in Africa seemed "normal" – the very practical application of tikkun olam.

I did not go in thinking I would leave with a new paradigm. But I have, though my shower time is still long! I now am more conscious of the world around me, and am grateful for everything I have. I can't ask you to donate to MetoWe (though that would be awesome!). I can't ask you to take shorter showers. But I can ask you to be more grateful, to realize that there are things bigger than us, to work to improve the lives of others, to see the beautiful even in the small, and that as Jews, our role to be an "or lagoyim" (a light unto the nations) extends even to Kenya.

Pulitzer transformed American journalism

Joseph Pulitzer (1847-1911), though dead for a century, is hardly a forgotten figure. Best remembered today for the prestigious prize in journalism that bears his name, he is credited with having transformed the mass media in the United States. Through two daily newspapers he owned, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and the New York World, he converted American journalism into a medium of mass consumption and considerable influence.

Pulitzer was a political force as well. A progressive in an age of robber baron capitalism, he brought to the fore the heretofore outlandish idea of taxing personal income, inheritances and corporations. For a Jewish immigrant from Hungary who arrived in America virtually penniless and friendless, he did not do badly at all.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

James McGrath Morris, a journalist, has written a sprawling biography of this ambitious and accomplished Hungarian Jew, Pulitzer: A Life in Politics, Print and Power (HarperCollins).

He leaves no stone unturned, elevating his book into what confidently can be described as the definitive work. As he suggests, Pulitzer, the fourth child of a petty merchant from the town of Mako, was lucky to survive birth, given the fact that infant mortality was so common a phenomenon in mid-19th-century Hungary.

He was also fortunate to have survived a brush with war. In 1864, the penultimate year of the U.S. Civil War, Pulitzer, despairing of dismal economic conditions in Mako, immigrated to the United States, right into the welcoming arms of the military.

Desperately short of manpower, northern forces recruited able-bodied European immigrants as soldiers. In exchange, they could expect free passage, a bounty of $100 when they reached the United States and $12 a month while in the army.

With no discernible prospects in Hungary, Pulitzer joined the program. Assigned to a German-speaking company conveniently far from the front, he served for eight months before being demobilized. Pulitzer, upon being released, found himself on the streets of New York City, homeless, destitute and sleeping in doorways. "Peace had its risks," writes Morris wryly.

With barely a command of English but proficient in German, he left New York, bound for St. Louis, which had a large ethnic German population. He scraped by taking odd jobs, tending mules, driving a coach, labouring as a deck hand aboard a riverboat, unloading cargo as a stevedore and working as a waiter in a oyster house. He also applied himself to the task of learning English. Pulitzer's big break came when the Westliche Post, a German-language newspaper, hired him as a reporter, just a year after he became an American citizen. Though bereft of any experience, he compensated for it through raw devotion and hard work.

In 1869, he joined the Republican party, and shortly afterward, he won a seat in the state legislature. At the Westliche Post, meanwhile, he attained the rank of managing editor before becoming publisher.

After selling his shares in it, he took a great leap forward, purchasing two ailing newspapers, the St. Louis Dispatch and the St. Louis Post, and merging them into another newspaper, the St. Louis Post Dispatch.

Since its circulation was only one-tenth of its competitors, Pulitzer had to find a winning formula to increase readership. "He took aim at the oligarchs who controlled the city's economic life," Morris explains. Pulitzer thereby reinvented himself as the populist champion of the common working man.

A crusading newspaper, the Post Dispatch questioned municipal monopolies and exposed shady banking practices and insurance schemes.

Not one to inhabit an ivory tower, Pulitzer worked side by side with his reporters and editors, thriving on the hubbub of the newsroom. And he treated his employees decently, paying better salaries, granting bonuses and longer vacations and remaining intensely loyal to those who served him.

Pulitzer's brother, Albert, was also a newspaperman. A reporter on the staff of the New York Herald whose ambition was to be a publisher, he raised the capital to establish the first Pulitzer family newspaper in the Big Apple, the New York Journal.

Shortly after Albert's coup, Pulitzer bought the New York World, a typically gray sheet, and proceeded to turn it into an exciting, mass-circulation newspaper focusing on sensational human interest and crime stories dripping with pathos, blood and scandal.

Pulitzer's editors dispatched reporters to mine "the urban dramas" of Gotham, and Pulitzer instructed them to write their stories in a pithy, punchy colloquial style. "The clear, simple prose of the World drew in readers, many of whom were immigrants struggling to master their first words in English," writes Morris. The new "yellow" journalism that the World helped pioneer included such innovations as the interview and the first newspaper comic printed in colour.

In time, the World, housed in the then tallest office building in the United States, became one of the most widely read dailies in American history.

Joseph Pulitzer

Elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1884, Pulitzer chafed under its limitations. "In New York, he had power and could make his own decisions," writes Morris. "Here [in Washington, D.C.], he was one of 325 men and nothing happened without collaboration." Still worse, he was a freshman. He resigned after a few months.

Throughout his career, he points out, Pulitzer was the butt of antisemitic jibes. Although his wealth gained him admission into rarefied circles, he was never genuinely accepted as an equal. Says Morris, "In the eyes of many, he remained, as he was born, a Jew."

One of Pulitzer's bitter rivals, Charles Dana, finding him personally offensive, demeaned his "Hebraic physiography" and his "cunning, malice, falsehood, treachery, dishonesty, greed and venal self-basement."

Pulitzer's gentile wife, Kate Davis, was the youngest daughter of an old Confederate family with a social pedigree but a declining bank account. He married her in an Episcopalian church. Although his Jewish background was not held in high regard by her parents, Pulitzer's intelligence, wit and appearance of financial means worked to his advantage, Morris dryly observes.

"Her family, her pedigree and her religion completed Pulitzer's metamorphosis," he adds.

The truth of the matter is that Pulitzer was not a practising Jew and, indeed, he concocted a tale that his mother had been a Catholic. And in keeping with his assimilationsist desire to seal his departure from Judaism, he had his children baptized and raised as Protestants. The Pulitzer clan today remains thoroughly Christian.

Pulitzer's last years, delineated by blindness, illness and loneliness, were unhappy ones. But to the end of his days, he lived in grand style, unlike his readers.

His funeral took place in a church. Inside the casket, Pulitzer's right arm lay across his chest and in his hand he clasped a copy of the World, which folded in 1931.

He was a newspaperman till the end.

Shoresh program wins U.S. innovation award

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Shoresh's Kavanah Garden last month made the Slingshot Foundation's list of the 50 most innovative non-profits in the North American Jewish community today.

Kavanah Garden is the only Canadian organization on the American foundation's list.

Slingshot releases an annual guidebook that names 50 Jewish non-profits to watch, for community members and potential donors. Applicants are evaluated on innovation, leadership, impact and organizational efficiency.

"It was very affirming to find out we'd been selected," said Risa Cooper, Shoresh's executive director, who joined the Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs in 2008.

One year later, she established the Kavanah Garden at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont., with support from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Shoresh's Kavanah Garden is also one of nine finalists in the running for the UJA's Six Points Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund.

The garden was created to be a working model of Jewish social and environmental responsibility. Each season, it plays host to a variety of programs that give families and school groups the chance to plant and harvest produce while learning about the environment and related Jewish values.

Students from Robbins Hebrew Academy, Bayview campus, help prepare the soil for spring planting at the Kavanah Garden.

"It's not just about Jewish learning, and it's not just about Jewish action. It's about bringing those two spheres together," said Cooper.

Through the various programs, community members are invited to help plant some of the more than 100 varieties of vegetables, fruits and herbs, which are organically grown; make treats in the solar oven; use a bicycle-powered blender and plant potatoes in the Chanukah garden bed (to make latkes, of course). There are also nature trail treks and learning workshops for adults.

For parents and children who come to the weekly family drop-in at the Kavanah Garden – Cooper's favourite of the programs offered – it is very much their own garden. "I think the reason that I adore [the drop-in] so much is that it's so sweet to build a community of people who come every week and become really connected to the garden and its surrounding spaces," she said.

Once the hardworking members of the community and volunteers harvest the produce, more than 80 per cent of it is donated to those in need through Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, to emphasize the Jewish value of tzedakah.

So far, the Kavanah Garden has been getting rave reviews. "The feedback has been really, really sweet and humbling," said Cooper. She added that in the last two growing seasons, 3,400 community members and more than 200 volunteers helped out at the garden. Cooper said that the Jewish community is just starting to see the connections between Judaism and the environment, even though the environmental movement has been popular for a while. "We're realizing that Judaism is so rich in agricultural and ecological wisdom."

Learning the lessons that Judaism has to teach about food systems and the environment and applying them to help take care of the Earth and the community is what Kavanah Garden is all about, Cooper said. "It makes Judaism really relevant."

CTS engages next generation

Michelle Bitran
Intern

The Canadian Technion Society (CTS) is literally refusing to grow old.

The organization, which creates awareness and fundraises for Haifa's Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, has been around since 1943, but in the last year, it's been focusing its efforts on the 25-to-45 crowd with its Generation Next project.

The goal is to "pass down the philanthropic role from one generation to a new one," said Scott Woodrow, CTS board liason to the Generation Next group, which includes about 25 young professionals who are interested in learning about fundraising for the Technion and spreading the message about the institution in Canada.

Generation Next organizer Hershel Recht and Cheryl Koperwas, executive director of the Canadian Technion Society, at a Generation Next meeting last month. [Michelle Bitran photo]

The young, enthusiastic crowd that has signed up comes from a range of different professional backgrounds.

"We have venture capitalists, we have architects, real estate agents, lawyers – you name it, we've got it – all people that took an interest in the Technion," said Hershel Recht, CTS' national development director and the main organizer of Generation Next.

Though the idea to form Generation Next originated in 2004, it had been put on the back burner until last year. Now that the group is in full swing, Recht is enthusiastic about the impact it will have. "Over the last year, it's back," he said "and it's back with a vengeance."

The group's first event was held last March, with businessman and philanthropist Seymour Shulich addressing the crowd about his personal story as well as about why the Technion is crucial for Israel's development.

For its next event, Generation Next has planned a trip to Israel later this month. The group of 16 who have signed up will be taken to see the Technion and examine its impact on the thriving high-tech industry in Israel. The one-week trip is being heavily subsidized by a donor, and Recht is certain it will be an eye-opening experience.

"It's a one-week smash, bang – this is Technion, this is high-tech in Israel," he said with his typical enthusiasm, adding that, as supportive as the Generation Nexters are, it's impossible for them to fully understand the Technion's impact without seeing it for themselves.

The itinerary promises a peek at Better Place, the electric car company founded by a Technion graduate, as well as a visit to the Elite chocolate factory, where food and biotechnology graduates help create delicious treats. The group will also listen to several speakers and have the chance to take in the sights and sounds of Israel's cities.

Torontonian Moran Drori, 29, only joined the group about a month ago, but the ninth-generation Israeli snatched up the opportunity to go on the trip. She said the first-hand experience will help her spread the word about the Technion when she gets back to Toronto.

"It's not just about going to the university, it's about going...to the places where the Technion is involved to see the fruit of the labour," she said.

Recht added that the trip will also allow the Toronto community to make professional connections with Israelis, so that both sides can benefit from new partnerships.

According to Recht, Generation Next is going to forge a new path when it comes to young Jewish organizations. He wants to keep it focused on emerging technology and its creators, rather than on the glitz and glamour of traditional fundraising parties. "We're not looking for parties. That's not us," he said.

After the trip to Israel, Generation Next will get back to planning its growth in Canada. Recht is confident the group of enthusiastic young people he has brought together is a strong one. "Ten years from now, they'll be the board for Technion."

NIF asks: Is Israeli democracy at risk?

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

The New Israel Fund of Canada recently brought a group of scholars and activists together to speak about Israel's successes and failures in the areas of domestic tolerance, equality and freedom.

The Oct. 30 event, called Israel From Within: The Dream Reborn, was attended by some 450 people who packed the Toronto Reference Library. It was also simultaneously broadcast across the country, with screenings in Montreal, Vancouver and Calgary.

"In the last decade, we've experienced what I call a 'democratic recession' in Israel," said Prof. Naomi Chazan, president of the New Israel Fund and former deputy speaker of the Knesset.

"We've been allaying certain fears in society by rolling back rights through disturbing pieces of legislation that limit civil society, civil liberties, freedom of speech and the rights of Palestinians," she said.

"So we are shifting our priorities towards the democratic well-being of Israel, because at root, what makes Israel strong, vibrant and capable of surviving is its democratic character."

Chazan spoke about the socio-political conditions that led to last summer's tent protests, which she said drew more than 20,000 Israelis to the streets to rally for social justice.

"What started as a protest against housing and cottage cheese prices quickly morphed into a broader campaign for social justice and fair distribution of resources," she said.

Naomi Chazan

"It wasn't just young people, it wasn't just Tel Aviv, and it wasn't just secular society. As Israelis, we can't agree on anything, but 87 per cent of the population supported this movement."

Chazan said the popularity of the protests came largely as a result of growing economic inequality in Israel, where 20 families control 40 per cent of the gross domestic product (GDP).

Ali Haider and Ron Gerlitz spoke on behalf of Sikkuy, an association for the advancement of equality in Israel. The two presented their findings, from a new study, on how Jewish Israelis viewed equality with Israeli Arabs.

"There's a clear gap between the behaviour of elected officials towards Israeli Arabs and what the citizens of Israel actually want, which is to reform and normalize relations," said Gerlitz.

"Our citizens want more equality. Closing the gap between Jews and Arabs is not just the moral thing to do – it's essential for our well-being."

Haider, of Palestinian origin, said he wants to contribute and be part the State of Israel. "I believe in the right of Israel to exist – I obey the law, pay taxes and want a shared future where both Jews and Arabs are safe. I want the government to respect my civil, cultural and religious rights," he said. "So we need an open and honest dialogue."

Derek Penslar, a professor of Jewish history at the University of Toronto, spoke about the concept of the importance of land in Israel and its connections to the Zionist movement.

"We have a few different competing notions of land as a community, as both sort of a public trust and a private good," he said. "There's also a spiritual ownership of land, and so we struggle to reconcile the various meanings."

Replying to a question from an audience member, Chazan said that "most Diaspora communities tend to be a bit more hard-line, because guilt and distance can obscure the complexities of certain situations. But the cost of extremity creates an unnecessary tension between our identity and our values. We can't live with this disconnect forever, because we will lose the next generation."

Chazan said there is a close connection between Jewish identity and liberal values, and if you sacrifice one for the other, you'll lose out all the time.

"If you care about Israel, make it better, more democratic, more just and more equal. We have to be leaders in respecting human dignity because historically, that's why we exist."

She added that security issues cannot erase social issues. "We must consider these things together. We have to be a haven for those persecuted in our sovereign state because we can never do to minorities what was done to us."

Cantor marks 10 years at shul

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Cantor Marshall Loomer's voice on his soon-to-be released CD filled his office as he played Berkley Square/A Foggy Day – a decidedly non-cantorial choice – for a visitor last week.

He said he hoped that the eleven-track CD, his first, would be ready for release Nov. 23, the date of his upcoming concert at Beth David. The event will celebrate his 10th anniversary at the shul.

Cantor Marshall Loomer

The CD called In Concert, features Hebrew and chassidic music, cantorial selections and Broadway tunes, much like the mix Loomer favours when performing in an actual concert.

The upcoming show, a fundraiser for the synagogue's accessibility improvements and Haftorah scroll project, will also feature Michael Burgess, best known as Jean Valjean in the Toronto production of Les Miserables.

"We'll do one song together for sure – and there are a few other surprises," Loomer said. The evening will include some of the songs from the new CD.

Loomer, 51, credits his late parents for his eclectic taste in music – his father for his affinity for jazz and chazzanut, and his mother for his love of musical theatre.

A latecomer to the cantorate, Loomer worked in retail furniture sales before beginning cantorial studies with Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple at age 32.

He served for two years as assistant cantor to Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue's Cantor Louis Danto, then became cantor/spiritual leader at Adath Sholom Synagogue for three years before joining Beth David.

Several years ago, Loomer served as president of the Toronto Council of Hazzanim. He also co-founded a Kabbalat Shabbat service at Baycrest, reaching out to other cantors to become involved in the project. Among his previous concert intiatives was a showcase for talented Beth David members.

As a cantor, Loomer said, "you have to be part of the community, not just the community at large, but part of your synagogue community."

Chabad honours young leaders

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Two Chabad Youth Network (CYN) alumni were honoured on Nov. 8 for their leadership roles and commitment to the Jewish community at the third annual CYN gala at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill.

Those who gathered at the event – which included a silent auction, a wine-tasting station, a lavish dinner and musical entertainment – paid tribute to two Thornhill men, 18-year-old Ben Babins and 24-year-old Daniel Kaplan, for their roles with CYN, an organization that provides more than 400 youth with classes, programs and Shabbatons.

Babins, a first-year psychology student at Queen's University, said he was a Grade 9 student at The Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel campus when he discovered that joining CYN would be a great way to get involved while logging the community service hours required by high school students to graduate.

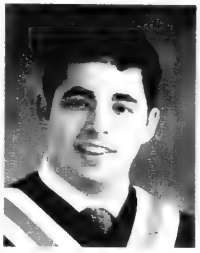
He joined CYN's Teens For the Community (TFC), which aims to engage high school students in community life while developing their leadership skills.

Although he enjoyed meeting with the TFC group every week for 1 1/2 hours, he didn't feel like he was maximizing his potential.

"Halfway through the year, I found myself wanting more responsibility," Babins said.

In his second year with TFC, he became the vice-president, hoping that his new role would relieve his desire for more responsibility. But it wasn't until the following year, when Babins became the TFC president that he was satisfied.

"This was finally what I wanted… I felt like I was really doing something. I felt like I was doing more than just my community service hours," Babins said.



Ben Babins

"Instead of feeling a responsibility for TFC, I felt a responsibility to do the most I could for the community."

Daniel Kaplan, who is working on his post-graduate degree in corporate communications and public relations at Fanshaw College, was a member of the first Torah 4 Teens class, a CYN program that offers ministry approved high school courses in Torah and Jewish philosophy.

Daniel Kaplan

He said he took a course in grades 10, 11 and 12, and soon began working with Rabbi Shmuli Nachlas, CYN's director, on event planning and Shabbatons.

"In high school, I went on a Shabbaton and when I graduated from high school I started to chaperone them."

Kaplan also led a group of CYN alumni – high school graduates – in planning Purim parties, wine tastings, and more.

Kaplan said he credits the rabbi for expanding his intellectual horizons.

"I think Rabbi Shmuli really inspired me and it changed me and influenced the path that I went down after taking his classes," he said.

"I think the Chabad Youth Network is a vital tool in creating community cohesiveness. People are so absorbed by their computers and iPhones and iPads and I think Rabbi Shmuli provides opportunities for children to be inspired and explore and to make friends."

Babins said he was also inspired by Rabbi Nachlas, whose dedication to the organization is contagious.

"I see how Rabbi Shmuli works. He works 24-hour days. There were times when we would work on a project and he called me at 1 a.m. to get it finalized. When I woke up in the morning, I saw a text message from him that was sent at 6 a.m.," Babins recalled.

"If he's doing that, can't I be bothered to put in a couple extra hours?"

He said that as a university student, he is motivated to stay connected to the Jewish campus community by attending Hillel events.

"I definitely do want to get more involved and take on a leadership role within Hillel and the Jewish community at Queen's," Babins added.

As for the CYN gala on Nov. 8, Babins said he was "honoured" to receive the Young Leadership Award because he is "so passionate about TFC."

Kaplan said he is also thrilled about being recognized by an organization he admires.

"It means a lot because I know of a lot of other extraordinary people who are doing great things with Rabbi Shmuli who are really devoted and work really hard," Kaplan said.

"To stand out among the people who I know are making a really big difference is a pretty big deal."

U.S. filmmaker makes doc about T.O. survivors

Michelle Bitran
Intern

It all started on a cruise ship in the Panama Canal almost four years ago. Radio disc jockey turned documentary filmmaker Frank Lozano was enjoying a meal in the shade when an elderly Toronto couple sat down beside him. The wife warned him that her husband would talk his ear off.

Little did Lozano know, that couple was Syma and David Forberg, and they had met during the Holocaust in the Chenstacowa concentration camp. When their story of survival came up in conversation, Lozano got a filmmaker's itch to get it all on tape.

Last month, David Forberg died at the age of 89, and Lozano has been reflecting on the remarkable experience of capturing the Forbergs' story in his award-winning short documentary Hole Hearted.

"I just love people. I'm naturally inquisitive," said Lozano, 48, about his interest in what the Forbergs had to tell him. Lozano, who is Catholic, said he knew "zero" about the Holocaust before listening to their story.

"It was remarkable just to talk to somebody first-hand who saw it," he said. Lozano decided that same evening that he would ask to record the Forbergs for a short documentary that he would enter into an upcoming Christian film festival. The festival, called the 168 Hour Film Project, requires participants to put together their films in only one week, or 168 hours.

The Forbergs were more than willing to oblige. It wouldn't be the first time someone filmed their story – Steven Spielberg had done so for his Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation.

Lozano began filming immediately on the camera he had brought to record his vacation. "My biggest challenge was, how do I capture this on tape? I'm on a cruise ship!" he said, adding that without professional equipment, he knew he'd have a lot of work left to do after the cruise.

The Forbergs agreed to have Lozano continue to film at their winter home in Miami, but he wanted to check with the rest of their family before taking the opportunity. "I knew that at their age, they were going to have kids [and] I'd need to have permission," he said.

At first, Lozano found two of the Forbergs' daughters to be skeptical about his motives for making the documentary and confused about his intense interest. "This is someone outside your community that was spending his own money, " said Esther Michaels, one of the Forbergs' four children, reminiscing about her reluctance to give Lozano the green light to film.

Holocaust Education Week

Ultimately, she agreed to Lozano's request, and he flew over from his Los Angeles home to continue the shoot. Several hours of filming and editing later, Lozano put together an 11-minute documentary and, after some unexpected technical difficulties, submitted it to the film festival, only 15 minutes before the deadline. He won for 2008 best documentary, but the contest was only a part of his winnings.

Revenge and justice in postwar Germany

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Margarete Myers Feinstein walked a difficult line at her lecture on Jewish revenge and justice in postwar Germany for Holocaust Education Week last Thursday.

Margarete Myers Feinstein

Feinstein, a research scholar at the University of California at Los Angeles's centre for the study of women and an expert on displaced persons after the Holocaust, spoke about the often overlooked and complicated relationships of Jews and their German neighbours after the war.

After describing some instances of Jewish revenge, she was met with a few upset audience members, many of whom were the children of Holocaust survivors. One asked her if, in telling of Jews taking revenge, she had intended to victimize the Germans.

Feinstein said that was not her intention, but rather she had wanted to bring to light the rarely discussed issue of communities of displaced persons living among the Germans.

"Living in Germany, Germans forced these survivors to think about guilt – who was guilty?" she told the audience. Feinstein added that after what they had gone through, many survivors blamed the German people collectively, seeing them as complicit in some way in the atrocities they endured. "Survivors saw the murderers of their families in the Germans they encountered every day," she said.

However, despite their rage, displaced persons had to interact with Germans on a daily basis. Their neighbours, shopkeepers and even babysitters were often German. Sometimes, Feinstein said, the survivors were forced to reconsider the collective guilt that many of them had assigned to their German neighbours. "They had difficulty when they did encounter German kindness – how to interpret it, how to understand it," she added.

Holocaust Education Week

Feinstein told the story of a survivor who was invited to Sunday dinner by a German acquaintance. The invitation, was looked at by the survivor as an example of antisemitism, since Sunday is the Christian holy day.

For other survivors, the resentment and rage ran even more deeply. Though it is something often missing from stories told about the Holocaust, Feinstein spoke of instances of violent revenge visited upon Germans by Jews, sometimes on those who were not Nazis.

Although the urge to retaliate was a strong one for many survivors, violent retribution was rare. "Most displaced persons were determined to demonstrate their moral superiority to the Germans," she said.

Instead of beating, killing, or even simply punishing former Nazis themselves, some survivors reached out to the Allied Forces to do the job for them.

Others preferred what Feinstein called "symbolic revenge." She explained that this term included financial exploitation, sexual exploitation, hiring German workers to build Jewish institutions and simply living well and having many children.

The reason for straying from more traditional forms of revenge, Feinstein said, was often a fear that it would affect their chances of moving out of Germany and on with life. "Revenge was looking backwards. It was a diversion from the energies needed," she said.

For still others, revenge seemed like too huge a task, considering the magnitude of the crimes committed in the Holocaust. Feinstein said that these survivors felt that only Divine Justice could bring about adequate punishment.

Though Jewish revenge was not very common and, Feinstein said, something that was not accepted by the outside world, many survivors were left with feelings of rage that they had to find a way to deal with. "All of the survivors had to conceive their own standards of justice."

Nazis co-opted Germany's corporate elite

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Holocaust Education Week

The German corporate elite absorbed the values of Nazism and maintained a "symbiotic relationship" with the Nazi regime in Germany after Adolf Hitler's accession to power, an American scholar told a Holocaust Education Week forum last week.

Leaders of major German corporations tended to distance themselves from the Nazi movement before Hitler's appointment as chancellor in 1933 and did not share his virulent racist views, said Peter Francis Hayes, a Northwestern University historian.

But by the early 1940s, they had internalized Nazi ideology and criminality, noted Hayes in a speech at the University of Toronto titled "Corporate Complicity: German Business and the Holocaust."

Hayes – a specialist in this topic and the author of books and monographs about it – said that while members of Germany's conservative industrial leadership held genteel antisemitic views typical of the times, they generally mistrusted the Nazis and distanced themselves from Hitler in the pre-Nazi era.

But when they realized they were in basic agreement with Hitler's economic policy and could make money while he ruled Germany, they modified their skeptical assessment of Nazism.

"The Nazis were good for business," said Hayes, who has mainly studied two major German companies that co-operated with Hitler, Degussa and I.G. Farben.

With German firms benefiting financially from Hitler's rearmament campaign and his Aryanization policy, which deprived Jews of their property, corporate leaders joined the Nazi bandwagon, said Hayes, a member of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum's academic committee.

And since the Nazi government controlled the factors of production, German companies were all the more dependent on Hitler's goodwill, he said.

"They were drawn ever more into a symbiotic relationship with the Nazis, enabling them to ignore Nazi criminality," he explained.

Reinforcing their ties with Nazism was a belief that they had to subscribe to a national consensus that Hitler was an expression of Germany's will and destiny.

"There was pressure to conform," he said, adding that German companies felt no compunctions about sacking Jewish employees for "the good of the company and the nation."

In Hayes' estimation, the German corporate elite crossed the point of no return in 1937 and 1938, when the head of a subsidiary of Degussa – which would manufacture the Zyklon-B gas used in death camps – dismissed Jewish directors who owned 26 per cent of its shares.

He justified his position on the grounds that there was no point in "swimming against the stream" of public policy and opinion in Germany.

Having been co-opted and corrupted by the Nazis, German corporations like I.G. Farben had no trouble supporting the slave labour program, said Hayes, the author, most recently, of From Cooperation to Complicity: Degussa in the Third Reich.

Responding to Hayes' analysis, Canadian historian Michael Marrus said that while Nazi political and military figures were held to account at the Nuremberg war crimes trials in 1946, corporate leaders faced no such tribunal.

A major trial about corporate responsibility never took place, even though key defendants had already been identified, said Marrus, the Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe professor emeritus of Holocaust Studies at the University of Toronto. "No one actually pulled the plug on it, but the idea withered away," he stated.

The reasons were varied.

The Cold War had begun and the United States did not want to be associated with a critique of the capitalist system in Germany. Economic and social conditions in postwar Europe were difficult and could not be resolved without Germany's industrial elite.

Immense logistical problems were foreseen, and the United States did not want to bear the costs of such a trial. Corporate support was needed in order for West Germany to meet its reparation payments obligations.

The fiasco that resulted from bungled attempts to bring the patriarchs of the Krupp family industrial empire to trial also had a chilling effect.

Doris Bergen, Marrus' successor, discussed the concept of intent as it related to the corporate elite. German industrialists were driven by the profit motive, not by eliminationalist antisemitism, she observed. Nonetheless, they worked hand in hand with the Nazis.

And German women, being the wives of perpetrators, were effectively partners in their crimes, she suggested.

Sabine Sparwasser, Germany's consul general in Toronto, said that large German companies were reluctant for years to open their files to historians.

Germany's focus after World War II was the rebuilding of its economy, but Germany has since developed a "culture of memory" and exerted huge efforts to delve into and atone for its Nazi past. As she put it, "'Never again' has become our mantra."

Exhibit captures philosopher's political thoughts

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

The Hannah Arendt Denkraum Exhibit, a Berlin exhibit on the political philosopher Hannah Arendt, is on view in Canada for the first time.

Five years ago, and to mark the 100th anniversary of Arendt's birth, political scientists, philosophers and academics organized a detailed exhibit in a former Jewish girls' school in Berlin, the city Arendt left in 1933.

Holocaust Education Week

The exhibit, in Toronto at the German Consulate until Nov. 30, includes abstracts and some 40 framed works of art mounted for Holocaust Education Week.

A Jewish political philosopher with an often contentious way of expressing her thoughts and opinions about the nature of power, and the subjects of politics, authority and totalitarianism, Arendt died in 1975 from a heart attack at the age of 69.

Sabine Sparwasser, the German consul general in Toronto, said the exhibit is named "Denkraum," or "thinking space," because it commemorates Arendt's political thoughts and visualizes the continuing relevance of her political, philosophical and literary work through contemporary art.

Arendt's predictions about the future, sometimes critical, are depicted in some marvellous pieces of work by students who studied with the German-born icon. Each picture is an artistic response to the work of the political thinker.

Having fled Germany for France, where she was a social worker with various Jewish organizations, Arendt triggered a great deal of controversy and international dialogue through her writing.

Her reporting five decades ago for a U.S. magazine during the trial of convicted Nazi war criminal Adolph Eichmann, contributed – especially in Germany – to the changing ways the country confronted its past.

"[Arendt] was a political thinker – and someone who had a powerful message," said Sparwasser. "It was a message that resulted in lots of debate around the world and contributed to changing the ways of how we [in Germany] addressed the past."

Sparwasser added: "I look at this exhibit and it stirs me – it has an effect. It's like an open wound with symbols of crime and oppression of the past."

Arendt is known for speaking her mind, and some of her comments showed a lack of sympathy for victims of the Holocaust and drew criticism.

Arendt worked for some time researching antisemitism before the Gestapo interrogated her. While she had a vision for the future, she often questioned "accountability" – the theme of this year's Holocaust Week.

Arendt was well-respected in Germany and a commemorative stamp honouring her was issued by the German post office. An asteroid has been named in her honour, and a special railway line operates in Germany – the Hannah Arendt Express – between Hanover and Karlsruhe.

"I'm no philosopher, but [Arendt] was brilliant – ahead of her time," said George Brady, a Holocaust survivor whose sister Hana, who died in Auschwitz, is the subject of the movie Inside Hana's Suitcase and the book Hana's Suitcase.

"The exhibit is excellent. It's important to never forget what had happened and to continue teaching that for years to come. Hate has to stop somewhere," he said.

"I look at this exhibit and my mind returns to the past. I have no issues with the German people of today, but the people who did what they did back then – I lost my entire family – I will never forgive them."

Admission to the exhibit during consulate hours is free. For more information, call 416-925-2813.

The Forberg family's gratitude for the film was another reward. "We cried. We all cried. We couldn't believe what Frank had done," said Michaels about the first time she and her family watched the documentary.

But Lozano had just begun to forge a bond with the Forberg family. In May 2010, after Lozano had sent the film to the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial and Museum in Jerusalem, the Forbergs took him with them to Israel as thanks for all he had done in telling their story in a unique and sensitive way.

Lozano accompanied the Forbergs when they were honoured at Yad Vashem and toured Israel's holiest sites for both Christianity and Judaism. During his stay there, he was even baptized in the Jordan River.

More than a year after the trip, and nearly four years since he made the film, Lozano is still in close contact with the Forbergs. "I won't say they're like family – they are family," he said.

You can watch the award-winning documentary Hole Hearted on Lozano's website at www.franklozano.com.

'So much antisemitism in those days'

As he clutches his copy of a European newspaper clipping with Herman's obituary, Cohen thinks back more than 50 years ago. There's a short pause, and the story begins about a man whose memory Cohen has cherished fondly.

"There was so much antisemitism in those days, and here I was 19 years old, away from home, scared and Jewish," Cohen recalled.

"There wasn't much of an alternative. You did what you had to do – taught to fire first and ask questions later.

"And I remember the shock of boarding a troop train going to Belgium with cattle cars that had the Jewish Star of David painted on them. It looked strange to me, until someone told me they were used to send Jews to the extermination camps. I was completely unaware back then of what the Germans had been doing to the Jewish people."

Cohen said Herman was a talkative, inquisitive Jewish lawyer, then in his mid-30s, who took great care of him.

"I'll never forget how he gave me a sleeveless leather jacket. There were some bitter cold nights. [He] told me to wear it and to stay warm. I didn't take it off until the war ended," Cohen said. "And he pulled me aside and said we would have a makeshift seder for about 100 Jews in the gym of a school in Kranenburg. Before long, we were back with the troops on the trucks ready to cross the Rhine River.

"It was a war. You worried about staying alive. People didn't remember about Jewish holidays until he instructed me to write home and send daffodils to my mother on Passover."

On Remembrance Day, Cohen said he pauses to recall cherished memories of many of his fellow soldiers. But there's always a special prayer for Herman.

While Cohen never went to Hebrew school or had a bar mitzvah, he memorializes his special friend in his own way.

"I think of him – always. I think of all the good things he did," said Cohen, who has difficulty with his ears as result of the constant firing of shells during the war.

"There was this battle in Groningen. Troops got separated," Cohen said, as he paused and his face stiffened. "I remember asking about [Herman], and the soldiers told me that he was killed trying to get a German machine gun bunker to surrender.

"I'll never forget that moment. It was like someone had hit me in the face. That bothered me a great deal. He was so special. Many of my friends died, and here I was alive. I won a lottery, but this one was for life. I still ask myself: why was I spared?"

The relationship was so close that Cohen, his wife, Vera, and many of his family (three children and seven grandchildren), travelled to the Netherlands, and the Canadian War Cemetery in 2005 and again last year to pay tribute to his fallen friend and hero.

"I am getting older and don't know how much longer I can keep doing this but he was special, like the brother I never had," Cohen said.

Four years ago, Cohen hit several roadblocks trying to locate Herman's relatives. Then, by fluke, he met Herman's brother.

"I told him what Lt. Herman meant to me, how he was killed, and we both cried," Cohen said. "We had just that one contact."

With numerous military and World War II pictures and photo albums in his home, Cohen said he quite often sits on his favourite chair thinking about his friends who paid the ultimate price.

"Death is a strange thing, and those Canadian soldiers, like my friend Lt. Herman, gave so much for what we have today," said Cohen. "I sure hope Canadians remember this – and not just for one day each year."

Hineni: here I am – or am I?

Rabbi Daniel Mikelberg

One word, so many meanings…

One of my favourite Hebrew words is "hineni." The term is often translated as "here I am." However, the real meaning goes beyond this simple translation. I often ask my students to test their classmates by stating "hineni" in different tones of voice.

Suddenly the multifaceted aspect of the word becomes clear. Sometimes we are eagerly present for whatever task lies ahead. Sometimes our "hineni" is more hesitant and reserved. Sometimes our "hineni" is dishonest, as we are truly somewhere else.

In this week's parshah, the term "hineni" is of key significance in Abraham's life journey. At this stage in the Genesis narrative, he has an established relationship with God. When God summons, Abraham is ready! In accordance with God's wishes, he has already left behind everything that he has previously known, to begin a new journey of promise.

Called upon at the beginning of Parshat Vayera, Abraham enthusiastically responds, "hineni." He likely has no idea what will soon be expected of him. God asks Abraham to venture to Mount Moriah to sacrifice his beloved son Isaac. Abraham's "hineni" is whole-heartedly sincere. He appears ready to follow God's orders meticulously.

Later in the narrative, Isaac calls out to his father. Again, Abraham replies "hineni." However, in this instance, we can legitimately question whether Abraham's response is equally committed. Is he truly present for Isaac? He is focused on God's commands, and his words appear to be subdued and hollow. He is distracted. God's command takes precedence over his son's needs.

Rabbinic Reflections

Abraham very nearly sacrifices Isaac. Thankfully, an angel of God stops him. This divine messenger calls out to Abraham. Again he responds, "hineni." However, Abraham is so focused on his mission that he needs to be summoned twice before he listens. Behold! He notices a ram in the thicket. Initially, Abraham appears to not truly be present. He needs to be alerted to the situation at hand.

We are all Abraham. We can be inconsistent with our "hinenis." This is natural and unavoidable. It is impossible to always be present. However, at this season of renewal, we are called upon to be thoughtful with our "hinenis." We can state "hineni" proudly, and we can mean it fully!

As we read about the tent cities both locally and in Israel, we can work to address the disparity between the wealthy and the poor.

As we spend time with our families, we thereby prioritize the relationships that matter most.

As we visit the gym, we wake up to the wondrous nature of our bodies.

Parshat Vayera is often referred to as Abraham's test. We, too, are often tested. May the year 5772 be a year of being truly present and engaged with ourselves, with humanity at large and with God.

Rabbi Daniel Mikelberg is an associate rabbi at Temple Sinai Congregation in Toronto.

Jeremiah, Jerusalem and me

While sitting in synagogue during recent Rosh Hashanah services, I was struck by a passage from the prophet Jeremiah, who foretold a return to Jerusalem despite the tumultuous events of the city's destruction in 586 BCE by the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar. Miraculously, Jeremiah's prophecy would come true within our lifetime.

Jerusalem has figured prominently in my own life. I was fortunate enough to have been involved in the excavations of the City of David, the most ancient part of Jerusalem, which were headed by my friend, the controversial Israeli archeologist Yigal Shiloh during the late 1970s and early 1980s.

Shiloh was hand-picked to lead the City of David excavations by Yigael Yadin, the great Israeli archeologist. Yadin had a storied career. But his most famous exploits were as the head of the famous dig at the legendary site of Masada from 1963 to 1965, as well as his work on the Dead Sea Scrolls, which were initially obtained for Israel by Yadin's father, Eliezer Sukenik, of Hebrew University.

Yadin had hoped to direct the excavations himself, but was prevented from doing so by age and other responsibilities. By the late 1970s, these included the job of deputy prime minister of Israel under Menachem Begin, as well as publishing the last major Dead Sea Scroll to be discovered, the Temple Scroll.

It was during this time that I first met Yadin, while putting together a series of programs for Ideas on CBC Radio dealing with major archeological discoveries, including the Dead Sea Scrolls. It was also then that I had started teaching an introductory course in archeology at the University of Toronto's School of Continuing Studies, one of whose aims was to give students a chance to participate in an actual excavation.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

The place we were looking for had to be familiar as well as accessible. It also had to resonate with students on a higher level. Jerusalem was the ideal site.

I naively decided to try to call Yadin while on vacation in Florida. It was a long shot, since Yadin was heavily involved in the Camp David Accords, which were underway at the time. But fortune smiled upon me, and I was able to get through to Yadin's secretary, a woman by the name of Mrs. Baillie, who was kind enough to get me an interview with Yadin, who coincidentally would be in Canada a few weeks later. She also helped me get in touch with Shiloh, who accepted my group from Toronto on his excavations.

It was while on these excavations that I came upon the remains of Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of Jerusalem. Even after thousands of years, the destruction level was enormous. What moved me was the fact that after 2,600 years, our ancient enemies were gone, but Jerusalem was being reborn from its ashes. This vista miraculously encapsulated the awe-inspiring history of our people. It is a history that I am proud to be a part of.

Air force chief can avert disaster

Reuven Pedatzur
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper

Guest Voice

If anyone can save Israel from catastrophe, it's the Israeli Air Force commander. All Maj.-Gen. Ido Nechushtan has to do is tell the prime minister and defence minister that an air attack on Iran cannot achieve its goals.

The force's planes can reach Iran and even drop bombs, he must tell them, but ultimately the operation won't destroy the Iranian nuclear program. At best, it will delay it by a few months.

He must give them an account of the attack outlines that the force is training on and explain that due to the numerous targets, dense aerial defences and the fact some of them are buried deep underground, the chances of success are slim.

Such an approach to the decision makers may be opposite to the "Air Force spirit," but Nechushtan must act with national responsibility. It wouldn't be a display of defeatism, but rather one of supreme responsibility in an era when the decision-making process appears to be going dangerously haywire. Only he can stop the train speeding to a collision in Iran's skies.

Outgoing Mossad chief Meir Dagan tried to warn against a foolhardy decision when he said "an attack on Iran is the stupidest thing I've heard." But the prime minister's people know that Dagan understands spies and assassins, but when it comes to the air force's planes and pilots' performance, he lacks knowledge and understanding.

As long as the air force continues drills on the attack in Iran, it gives Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak the illusion that it's possible to destroy the Iranian nuclear program by military action. This is why the air force commander must explain to them that there's no point in the continued investment in the drills, and they should be discontinued.

The decision could be kept in complete secrecy, but it must make it clear to Netanyahu and Barak that their strategic thinking must change from a policy centred on planning a military blow to one that prepares for the era of a nuclear Iran.

It won't be easy to persuade Barak, and especially not Netanyahu. The prime minister believes with all his heart that the mission he's charged with is to save the people of Israel, maybe even the entire free world. The Iranian issue has been preoccupying him much more than a deal with the Palestinians, relations with the Arab world and even his relationship with the American administration.

When Netanyahu compares the Tehran regime to the Nazi regime and Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to Adolf Hitler, he really means it.

Barak, in contrast, has said more than once that a nuclear Iran may constitute a threat, but he dismissed attempts to compare this situation to Nazi Germany. He has even alluded on occasion to Israel's deterrence capability. Nonetheless, due to considerations probably stemming from personality and political calculations, Barak is conveying to those around him that he might support a military operation on Iran.

All this indicates that the air force commander's mission won't be simple. He'll likely be subjected to overwhelming pressure to change his evaluations and continue planning the attack. Doubtlessly, Nechushtan finds himself at a decisive position in a critical period. Never, it seems, has an IDF officer been in a position in which his professional recommendation could bring on Israel a disaster of such proportions. We can only hope he'll rise to the occasion.

Reuven Pesatzur is a senior lecturer in Tel Aviv University's strategic studies program.

American Jewish war veterans

Last week, we looked at sites that honour Jewish soldiers from Canada who fought for their country and often paid with their lives. Today, we look at Jewish veterans south of the border – some of whom are still fighting for or have just been recognized for their heroic deeds.

In 1896, a group of Jewish soldiers who had fought in the Civil War organized what is now known as the Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America. The site mentions that there have been persistent accusations that Jews have not served in the U.S. Armed Forces. In reality, "a study of Jewish participation in the military during World War II clearly indicates Jews served in the Armed Forces beyond their numerical proportion to the general population." [http://bit.ly/jwar19]

Eighteen Jews have received the Congressional Medal of Honor, America's highest recognition for bravery. One was Airman 1st Class John Levitow, who in 1969 was aboard an aircraft in Vietnam when a mortar round ripped thousands of holes in the fuselage and caused an activated flare to roll loose in the cargo area. Despite his injuries, Levitow "threw himself bodily upon the burning flare... he dragged himself back to the rear of the aircraft and hurled the flare through the open cargo door. At that instant, the flare separated and ignited in the air, but clear of the aircraft." [http://bit.ly/jwar10]

Unfortunately, there may be other Jewish soldiers who served with distinction but have been deprived of receiving a similar honour. At 82, Elsie Shemin-Roth is fighting to have her father recognized for the bravery he displayed. In 1918, during World War I, William Shemin, then 19, braved heavy enemy fire in France to save three fellow soldiers. His daughter is taking advantage of a bill approved by the

Mark Mietkiewicz

House of Representatives to see whether Shemin should receive a Congressional Medal posthumously. [http://bit.ly/jwar16]

On the other hand, a very select group was just honoured at a ceremony for the 14 U.S. Jewish chaplains who died in combat, in accidents or of natural causes. It was only in 1862, after Jewish leaders petitioned Abraham Lincoln, that a law was passed permitting non-Christian chaplains to serve in the military. And it was only last month that the sacrifice of Jewish chaplains joined Protestant and Catholic clergy in being officially commemorated with a monument at Arlington Cemetery. Inscribed on it is a verse from 2 Samuel: "They were swifter than eagles, they were stronger than lions." [http://bit.ly/jwar12] (Don't miss the site's very impressive slide show of the event.)

Also last month, Jewish veterans from the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom and Israel got their due when the Jewish National Fund Wall of Honor was inaugurated at Jerusalem's Ammunition Hill. [http://bit.ly/jwar13]

As reported in the Jerusalem Post, American veteran Daniel Madel, who now lives in Jerusalem, attended the ceremony. "I was at the Battle of the Bulge, and we met the Russians in Czechoslovakia. We were part of Patton's 3rd Army, and we made 21 river crossings, most of them under fire... It's marvellous to perpetuate the heroism that has taken place... It's important, so that future generations will know about the past." [http://bit.ly/jwar15]

'Israel lobby' stifles campus speech: report

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A new report commissioned by the Canadian Association of University Teachers denounces the so-called "Israel lobby" for its alleged efforts to stifle debate and academic freedom.

No Debate, Israel Lobby and free speech at Canadian universities, written by University of New Brunswick professor emeritus Ian Thompson, was released last week. It's based on the controversy that surrounded the 2009 conference called Israel Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace at York University.

The conference was co-sponsored by York and Queen's universities as part of York's 50th-anniversary celebrations. Critics opposed the event because while it was billed as an academic dialogue about achieving peace in the Middle East, most of the speakers – some of whom are active in the boycott, divestment, sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel – presented a one-state solution as the only viable option for peace.

Among the speakers were Omar Barghouti, a founding member of the Palestinian BDS campaign against Israel, and Ali Abunimah, co-founder of the Electronic Intifada, a website that posts articles accusing Israel of ethnic cleansing and of being an apartheid state.

Thompson told The CJN that the CAUT-commissioned, but independent, report, which is being sold as a book, "tries to put the controversy in a general context and not just in the context concerning Israel and Palestine, but broader controversies involving academic events and the history of academic freedom."

The book highlights the events leading up to the conference, analyzes "the implications of some of the events" and makes recommendations "for defending academic freedom" on university campuses.

Thompson was also critical of what he calls the "Israel lobby," which he said tries to "limit freedom of expression by others."

He named the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) as being part of the lobby.

CIJA senior vice-president Howard English said he's disturbed by Thompson's use of the term.

"It's a slur that is designed to promote the myth that anyone who supports Israel controls the actions of government and other institutions. It's a deplorable term, and we object strongly to its usage and all that it implies."

But Thompson countered that members of the so-called lobby "denounce critics of their activities for saying that there is an Israel lobby, but at the same time, boast on their website that they are very effective in influencing government policy."

English also clarified that CIJA's opposition to the conference had less to do with the subject matter and more to do with that fact that it "did not meet rigorous academic standards."

He said a number of the speakers weren't academic scholars and did not warrant endorsement and sponsorship by York and Queen's.

"On top of that, the conference was completely unbalanced. It primarily highlighted those who promote a one-state solution, and anyone speaking in favour of a two-state solution, including [University of Haifa law professor] Na'ama Carmi was intimidated or labelled a racist."

Following the conference, Carmi wrote an opinion piece in the Toronto Star describing "an atmosphere that was totally incompatible with academic discourse," and said there were attempts "to silence unpopular views... At times, those presenting a different view were subject to abuse and ridicule."

Although Thompson concluded in his report that York "upheld and protected the academic freedom of the conference organizers and the academic integrity of the conference program," he published an e-mail from current York provost Patrick Monahan, then the dean of Osgoode Hall Law School, to conference organizers Susan Drummond and Bruce Ryder.

A seemingly frustrated Monahan urged them to bring balance to the conference by securing speakers who oppose a one-state solution.

"Given the current lineup of speakers, there is a perceived lack of balance in the approaches being taken. I hasten to add that this is not for lack of trying, as you have invited a significant number of speakers who would allow for the desired balance and have been unsuccessful in getting them to sign on," Monahan wrote.

"But I thought we had agreed that, regardless of the reasons, there is a problem with the overall balance in the speakers and it was therefore important to add at least one other speaker who would be a strong advocate of a two-state solution," Monahan wrote. Despite Monahan's assertion that the conference was one-sided, it went ahead as planned. Thompson applauded York's decision to host the conference despite many calls to cancel it.

York president Mamdouh Shoukri said in a statement that he was pleased with Thompson's conclusion, adding, "I welcome this recognition of our commitment to the fundamental values of free inquiry and academic freedom at the university and affirm our continuing commitments in this regard."

Hillel offers new arts fellowship

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Hillel of Greater Toronto, in conjunction with the Julie M. Gallery, is offering an art fellowship this year for the first time.

The Julie M. Gallery Emerging Jewish Artist Fellowship will support some five to eight students working in the arts, including photography, sculpture, creative writing and other fields.

"There's so many arts students that we know, but there's no real outlet for them," said Alona Geysman, Hillel's student coordinator for the fellowship. She added that Hillel is modelling the program after a similar one in New York that proved to be successful.

Applicants who are selected will receive a $400 stipend as well as funds toward their materials, and they will be paired with a mentor who will help them work on a project related to Israel or Judaism. In May, the visual artists will have the opportunity to display their work in an exhibition.

"It's very hard to get your first break when you don't have any background and you don't have experience," said Erica Segal, a Hillel board member and the owner of the Toronto gallery.

"A lot of kids graduate art school and never work with art because they don't know how to get started."

Segal added that having the chance to work with a mentor who is a professional artist and to display their work gives students the "first little line in [their] resumé," which will give them a launching pad to a successful career in the art world.

The Julie M. Gallery was opened in 2009 as the Canadian branch of the originally Israeli gallery. The Tel Aviv branch was established in 1975. The gallery mostly shows the work of contemporary Israeli artists, both Jewish and Arab.

For Segal, the link with Israel is extremely important, aside from religion. "My connection to Israel is very strong, and I wanted to do something that has a connection to Israel – that wasn't just Jewish," she said.

Segal hopes the fellowship will strengthen student bonds to Israel, and that it will introduce them to Hillel as a supportive and welcoming campus group. "[Hillel] offers so much more than a lot of kids at university are aware of," she said.

Though registration only opened up on Nov. 1, Geysman said she has already had a lot of interest and is looking forward to the projects that will be produced by the students who are selected. "The students are going to be drawing and sculpting their Judaism and their love for Israel," she said, adding that it will give them a chance to integrate their Jewish identity into their creative side.

Segal is also anticipating great results, and she hopes that after a successful pilot this year, the program will grow. "This year, we're aiming to do five [fellowships]," she said. "In the future, we could do even more."

Registration is open from Nov. 1 to 30. Contact Geysman at alona.geysman@hilleltoronto.org for more information and for application forms.

U of T won't cancel lecture series

Despite receiving pressure from various community groups, the University of Toronto says it won't cancel an 18-week course led by Toronto-based Islamic scholar Abdullah Hakim Quick, who has made public homophobic and antisemitic statements.

"The University of Toronto on occasion receives requests to bar individuals from speaking on campus. While, on some of these occasions, the administration is as offended as are those who would wish the speaker to be denied a voice… we will continue to encourage progress through open discussion and an exchange of views, no matter how difficult that may be in certain situations," U of T said last week.

The controversy stems from an invitation by U of T's Muslim Students Association to have Quick lead a lecture series on the life of the Prophet Muhammad.

Quick, an American convert who received a PhD in history from U of T, said in a previous lecture that the Islamic position on homosexuality is that it's punishable by death.

Quick also made a comment about purifying Islam's "third-holiest shrine from the 'filth of Christians and Jews.'"

Quick has since apologized for his comments on his blog.

Howard English, senior vice-president of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said he appreciates U of T's "sensitivity to our concerns. The university's apparently reluctant decision to permit Quick to continue his course on campus neither erases nor excuses his reprehensible endorsement of death for gay people. The presence at U of T of someone who holds such views does not do justice to the university's excellent reputation." — Sheri Shefa

ORGANIC EXPERIENCE: As part of the Grade 8 science program, students at Robbins Hebrew Academy's Beth Tikvah campus – including, from left, Shawn Zahavi, Yael Lewis, Sydney Bernknopf – have been studying cells by focusing on their structure and function of cells in plants and animals. Students created three-dimensional models that helped explain and illustrate what a cell look like.

CREATION BLASTOFF: Katie Litner, a senior kindergarten student at Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill, shows off her rocketship that she made working in the drama centre with her fellow students, who used imaginary space travel to integrate what they learned about the biblical story of creation with the study of the planets.

Thanks to Disabled Veterans like Menny, there is an Israel for all of us.

In 1996, at the Erez Checkpoint, a Channel 2 news crew climbed a tower to broadcast the riots which had erupted on the outskirts of Gaza. Palestinians opened fire on the news crew.

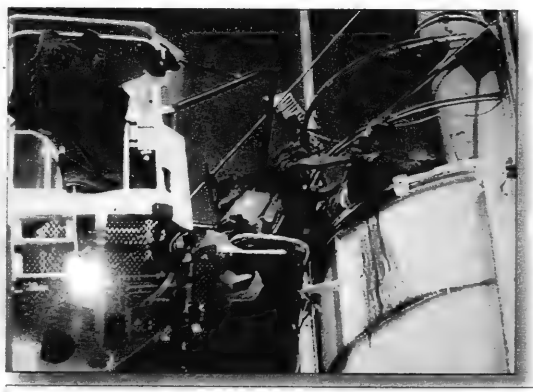
Menny Guy, a combat medic, didn't hesitate for one moment. He heroically climbed to the top of the exposed tower to assist the injured. Menny removed his protective ceramic vest and wrapped it around a wounded cameraman, thereby saving his life. In the midst of doing this, Menny was shot in the shoulder and the back, leaving him paralyzed.

Menny was told he probably would not walk again, but he never gave up. His strong determination, along with the rehabilitation he received at Beit Halochem, enabled him to leave his wheelchair.

Menny came to Beit Halochem Tel Aviv as often as five times a week. "Beit Halochem gave me so much; it enabled me to learn a lot about myself. I was surrounded by people just like me, disabled and wounded ... it is so important to be in such a warm and embracing environment, where I am understood. The professional staff here knows what's best for me. Table tennis, swimming and working out at the Fitness Hall keep me healthy. I don't feel different from anyone else."

Beit Halochem Centres in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem, Nahariya and Beer Sheva offer a broad array of specialized therapies, sports programs, cultural and social activities enabling our 51,000 wounded heroes to return to meaningful and productive lives.

Beit Halochem Canada is committed to caring for those who have been permanently disabled as a result of being wounded in the line of duty, as well as victims of terror.



In 1996, Menny Guy showed exceptional courage as an IDF medic, rescuing a TV news crewman who had been shot while covering riots at the Israel-Gaza border.

Please ASSIST the more than 51,000 disabled war veterans and victims of terror who turn to Beit Halochem for their rehabilitation.

Canada-wide kosher safety plan launched

Federal gov't. provides grant for initiative

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An unprecedented collaboration between the federal government and kashrut certification agencies in Canada will see more than three-quarters of a million dollars of public money going toward enhancing the safety of kosher foods produced here.

Industry Minister Christian Paradis, who is responsible for Agriculture and Agri-Food Canada, held a press conference Nov. 4 at the offices of the Jewish Community Council of Montreal, also known as the Vaad Ha'ir, to announce a grant of up to $763,650 to the Vaad, which is co-ordinating this effort across the country.

The Canadian Kosher Food Safety Initiative is aimed at ensuring the highest level of food safety at all phases, from the raw materials to processing, distribution and retailing.

However, participation by industry and kashrut organizations is voluntary.

The initiative seeks to create a Canadian kosher council on food safety, in which the different kosher brands are invited to participate.

"This is in an effort to standardize food safety processes for the kosher industry," Vaad executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel said. Universities are being asked to assist in the development of these standards.

"In this way, no single brand has a monopoly on the certification."

"Food safety is a priority for this government and for all Canadians," said Paradis. "This investment will further increase consumer confidence in the safety of kosher food and help build a more competitive sector."

The strengthened standards will be based on HACCP (hazard analysis of critical control points), which is considered one of the most stringent set of principles for minimizing risk in food production.

Vaad Ha'ir executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel, left, thanks Industry Minister Christian Paradis.

Already signed on to this initiative are British Columbia Kosher, Badatz Toronto and the Ottawa Vaad HaKashrut.

Paradis emphasized that this funding will benefit not only the Jewish community, but Canada's agriculture and food industries.

Rabbi Emanuel said demand for kosher food is growing, not only in the Jewish community, but among the general population.

"At a time when Canadians are increasingly concerned about food safety, this project strives to establish the kosher brand as a mark of quality and food safety," he said.

"Through this project, we, along with our partners across Canada, will be working with manufacturers and food retailers to build on this solid foundation to the benefit of Canadians wherever they live and whatever their religious beliefs."

Vegetarians, the lactose-intolerant and those with allergies are among those who are also turning to kosher food, he added.

Greater safety assurance can only benefit exporters of kosher food, he said. "The worldwide market for kosher foods grew by 64 per cent to $12.5 billion in annual sales from 2003 to 2008."

Rabbi Emanuel said the initiative, which will complement the work of the Canadian Food Inspection Agency, is concerned with all types of foods, including meat, dairy, baked goods, beverages and produce.

The first phase of the initiative involved the Vaad working with the kosher food industry to identify and assess what processes are currently in place that are unique to the kosher food sector. The second phase now involves establishing kosher food safety standards.

A database of food ingredients is to be created to assist in the audit of food processing.

Asked if a long-term goal is the creation of a Canada-wide hechsher, Rabbi Emanuel replied that "a national hechsher has been discussed. It certainly would be of great benefit," but no concrete plans are in place at this point.

The Vaad is working with Food with a Conscience and Medina Quality Food Assurance Services, private companies that serve as consultants to industry on food safety.

Rabbi Emanuel observed that the Vaad is well-positioned to taken on this expanded, national role. Founded in 1922, the Vaad today has "the experience, capacity and technology to successfully implement this project."

The MK has a new slogan: "Your key to a kosher Canada."

Asper Campus starts lottery to help cut debt

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Asper Jewish Community Campus, Winnipeg's 14-year-old Jewish community centre and the first such community campus in Canada, has come up with an idea that could herald a new direction in Jewish fundraising.

On Nov. 1, administrators kicked off the campus' first government-approved lottery.

Thirty-five hundred tickets have been made available at a cost of $100 each. The draw for 36 prizes – worth a total of $100,000 – takes place Jan. 18. The grand prize is a choice between a new Audi or $50,000 cash. Other prizes include a home theatre system, a wine tour of Italy, watches, iPads and several smaller cash awards.

The idea for the lottery came from Barry McArton, Asper Campus board president, and board member Louis Trepel.

Both have many years of experience in community fundraising. Trepel, formerly of Ben Moss Jewellers, has been recognized by Variety, the Children's Charity of Manitoba, for his many years of volunteering. He has also worked with organizations such as Rainbow Stage, St. Amant Centre, the Canadian Red Cross, Big Brothers, CancerCare Manitoba, Winnipeg Harvest and the Health Sciences Centre Foundation.

McArton has been involved in management over his career as executive director of such diverse groups as the Canadian Amateur Diving Association, the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra and CancerCare Manitoba. He has also served as president of the Manitoba Soccer Association and is the new president of the Winnipeg Philharmonic Choir.

"We were considering a number of different fundraising ideas," said McArton, the son-in-law of former Winnipeg Jewish community president Marjorie Blankstein.

"A lottery is something that our Jewish community has never done before. We thought we would give it a try."

The campus board had to seek approval from the Manitoba Gaming Commission before the lottery could proceed. The application process took about six weeks.

McArton said some proceeds will go toward paying down the Asper Campus' $1-million debt left over from the last round of renovations in 2008.

"Anything we can do to bring down our debt will free up operating funds both to help reduce the amount of rent our tenants pay and provide us with more money for maintenance and upgrades to our building," McArton said.

"Over 1 million people pass through our building every year. That results in a lot of wear and tear. We had to replace our boilers last year and the freezers in our restaurant this year."

McArton added that the campus board is also trying to reduce the building's power consumption with measures such as more energy-efficient lighting, reduced water use and more recycling.

He said 100 lottery tickets were sold within the first 24 hours they were available, and all campus tenant organizations are selling them. They get $10 for every ticket they sell.

"Our tenant organizations are very enthusiastic," McArton said. "Not only will the money reduce their rents, but also we are putting $35,000 directly into their operations. For smaller agencies, that may be a significant size contribution."

Congregational duties aside, he enjoys talking to congregants as he carries the Torah around the sanctuary on Saturday morning. "I love to find out how [someone's] wife is, and how their daughters and their sons are... I try to make every person feel that they are special to me, and they are."

During the service he likes to incorporate melodies that people can sing with him. "You must keep people engaged."

He has also found that he enjoys teaching bar/bat mitzvah students who have attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), and also those with Asperger syndrome.

Although Loomer has no formal special education training, he has drawn on his own struggle with ADHD – particularly the initial challenge of memorizing cantorial music – when working with some of his students.

He said he changes the subject often when working with students who have ADHD, returning again and again to material that needs to be reinforced.

As well, he said, he has taught a child with Asperger to read Torah "by rhythm," while others have been easy to teach because of their ability to memorize.

"Every single student is a unique individual, and you have to find a way to relate to them."

Loomer spoke highly of his relationship with Beth David's Rabbi Philip Scheim and ritual director Michael Rubin. "I can't remember ever having an argument with [the rabbi]," Loomer said, adding that they sometimes finish each other's sentences.

Rubin and Loomer sing a cappella together as the "Two Moishes," an endeavour that started unexpectedly after they were asked to sing at a Shabbat simchah. More requests followed, Loomer said. "Now, we're busy."

Is there no choice but to strike Iran?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The intense focus, for almost a year now, on the upheavals in the Arab world under what is widely referred to as the "Arab Spring" has certainly taken the spotlight off Iran as it pushes ahead, in the shadows, with its illicit nuclear program.

However, three concurrent events last week drew attention back to Iran: the launch last Wednesday by Israel of a ballistic missile described by experts as being capable of reaching Iran with a nuclear warhead; the report in the Guardian newspaper that, just days after Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak's visit to Britain, "sources" there revealed plans of coordination between British and American military for an attack on Iran's nuclear sites; and the announcement from Washington that a bipartisan U.S. Congressional committee had approved a new, tougher round of economic sanctions – this time against Tehran's central bank – as part of its efforts to deter Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

The combination of all three items occurring on the same day was reportedly designed to signal to Tehran that a multi-pronged, intensified international effort to stop its march to nuclear arms is serious.

Whether the military threats against Iran will translate into action or whether this is just co-ordinated psychological warfare remains an open question.

In the meantime, strategic analysts in Israel continue to assess the likelihood that Iran can still be deterred.

In Strategic Survey for Israel, 2011, a just-released, 12-page publication of the Tel Aviv-based Institute for National Security Studies, Emily Landau offers a bleak assessment.

She writes that while Iran "has experienced setbacks due to sanctions and sabotage, it has continued to build up its stockpile of enriched uranium while apparently working on military aspects of the program, and continues to inch its way to a nuclear weapons capability."

With the utter failure of past negotiations and the ineffectiveness, at least until now, of sanctions, and with sabotage (both cyber warfare and the assassination of Iranian nuclear scientists) capable only of slowing Iran's program, little stands in Iran's path, Landau argues.

Landau also makes an astute observation about the impact of NATO's successful overthrow of Libya's dictator, Moammar Gadhafi.

It has "unwittingly," she argues, sent a signal to other dictatorships that if you take "the high road" and give up your nuclear option, as Gadhafi did in a deal with the West in 2003, you forfeit a powerful deterrence against future attack. "This conclusion," Landau notes, "implies, correctly, that the image of being a nuclear weapon state grants a state a degree of immunity to attack."

Syria's ruthless dictator, Bashar Assad, apparently understands this lesson well. Supported by Iran on several fronts, the Syrian regime is reportedly working once again on developing a nuclear program (even though Israel bombed a secret nuclear facility, developed with North Korean assistance, in 2007).

And, of course, Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, who is in charge of its nuclear program, has even more motivation to achieve the deterrent capacity that fellow rogue state North Korea enjoys. Far from yielding its regional hegemonic ambitions to the growing influence of Turkey, a nuclear weapons-armed Iran, with Syria as a dependable (and dependent) ally, along with its proxy Hezbollah in control of Lebanon, would pose a greater threat than ever.

Iranian Supreme leader Ali Khamenei seeks nuclear deterrent capability.

Iran's threat also extends menacingly over the oil-rich Gulf states, foremost Saudi Arabia. It's little wonder that the Saudi ambassador to the United States, Adel al-Jubeir, reportedly reiterated King Abdullah's plea to the Americans to "cut off the head of the [Iranian] snake" before it's too late. And little wonder, in turn, that Iran allegedly concocted a scheme, recently uncovered, to assassinate him in Washington.

Even though Landau concludes her report with the assertion that there's "no real appetite" either in Israel or the United States for military action against Iran, that remains to be seen.

Perhaps there's no appetite, yet there's still no other option, as risky as it might be.

Man gets death sentence in bombing

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — If it's ever carried out, Adil El-Atmani's death sentence for the terrorist bombing last April 28 of a Marrakesh cafe that killed a Jewish woman from Montreal would be Morocco's first execution in almost 20 years.

Atmani was sentenced to death Oct. 28 by a Moroccan court, the first such sentence since 1992. It came seven months to the day after Michal Zekry Wizman, 30, her husband Messod Wizman, 32, and 15 others from several countries were killed at Dhjeema El-Fna Square.

Atmani's accomplice, Hakim Dah, received a life sentence, while seven other defendants got sentences of three to four years, outraging families of the victims in France and elsewhere.

Zekry Wizman, a physiotherapist born in Israel, lived in Shanghai with her husband and son, David. He was not with his parents when two bags containing bombs triggered remotely by a cellphone exploded inside the café.

They were in Morocco over the Passover holidays to visit with Messod's family.

Zekry Wizman grew up and married in Montreal and was a graduate of École Maïmonide, Concordia University and the Université de Montréal.

Her father, Jacques Zekry, who lives in Montreal, did not attend the trial and preferred not to speak to the media.

Even though El-Atmani initially confessed to being the ringleader in the attack, he later recanted and denied any ties to Al Qaeda's North African wing, the group linked to the bombing.

Anne Frank exhibit to tour Que. schools

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — An exhibition on Anne Frank and the Holocaust will begin a two-year tour of Quebec on Nov. 11, Remembrance Day, at Collège Bourget in Rigaud, a private Catholic elementary and high school with more than 1,100 students.

The itinerary of "Anne Frank: Une histoire d'aujourdhui" is being co-ordinated by Julie Couture, a Quebecer who has worked at the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam since 2009.

The bilingual exhibition will travel to schools, youth centres and summer camps throughout Quebec, including Lévis, St. Hyacinthe, Quebec City and Montreal. It has already been presented in some 60 countries around the world. This will be its Canadian premiere.

Each school will receive a pedagogical guide developed by the Anne Frank House. After the Quebec tour, the exhibition will be made available to interested schools in the rest of Canada, starting in 2014.

Klimt painting sold for $40.4M at auction

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — A Nazi-looted Gustav Klimt painting restituted to a Montreal man sold for $40.4 million (US) at auction in New York last week.

The 1915 landscape Litzlberg on the Attersee by the Austrian master was returned to Georges Jorisch, 83, this past July by the state-owned Museum of Modern Art in Salzburg, Austria.

He's the sole heir of the wealthy Viennese Jewish family that originally owned the painting.

Although the terms weren't disclosed, Jorisch agreed to split the proceeds from the sale with the museum, which will build a wing named in honour of Jorisch's maternal grandmother, Amalie Redlich. The Gestapo seized the painting from her during World War II.

Litzlberg on the Attersee by Gustav Klimt

She and his mother, Mathilde, were deported in 1941 to the Lodz Ghetto and did not survive the Holocaust.

The buyer was Zurich dealer David Lachenmann, bidding on behalf of a client. Despite the cost, bids came in from around the world, and it was a prolonged process.

It was the second Klimt masterpiece restitituted to Jorisch in as many years from the same family collection, originally owned by his great-uncle, Viktor Zuckerkandl, a steel magnate, and his wife, Paula. It's believed they bought the two works directly from Klimt.

The 1913 Church in Cassone was restored last year to Jorisch by a European possessor whose identity was never revealed. It was subsequently sold at auction in London for $45.4 million. Those proceeds were also divided between Jorisch and the other party.

The Vienna-born Jorisch has lived modestly and obscurely in Montreal since immigrating here in 1956 from Belgium, where he and his father fled in 1938 when the Nazis entered Austria.

When the Zuckerkandls died childless in the 1920s, their home and its contents were passed to Viktor's sister, Redlich. She entrusted the collection to a shipping company in 1938, but Jorisch and his father found the crates empty after the war.

According to a statement from the Salzburg museum, Litzlberg on the Attersee was bought by a local art collector after World War II and was later in the possession of the Landesgalerie Salzburg before being acquired by the Museum of Modern Art.

Jorisch, a retired photography store owner, began looking into the whereabouts of the vanished collection about 15 years ago, when changes to the law in Europe and the United States made recovery of art despoiled during the Nazi era more feasible.

Bronfman prize seeks nominees

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL —The Charles Bronfman Prize called for nominations last week for its 2012 award, an annual recognition of "bold and visionary" young humanitarians the world over whose endeavours are fuelled by Jewish values and "who serve to inspire generations to come."

The prize celebrates the "vision and accomplishment" of an individual or team, under the age of 50, whose humanitarian work has had a significant impact on the world's most pressing challenges.

Deadline for nominations is Jan. 13. Guidelines and forms can be found at www.TheCharlesBronfmanPrize.com. An internationally recognized panel of judges will select the 2012 prize recipient(s) and present the $100,000 award next fall.

The first Charles Bronfman Prize was bestowed in 2004 when Charles Bronfman's children, Ellen Bronfman Hauptman and Stephen Bronfman, along with their respective spouses, Andrew Hauptman and Claudine Blondin Bronfman, launched it to honour their father, his values, and his commitment to young people.

"The nomination criteria for The Charles Bronfman Prize are deeply inspired by the legacy of our father, who believes passionately in the power of ideas to change attitudes, lives and ultimately the world," they said in a statement. "His humanitarian instincts are expressed through a Jewish universalism we are proud to share."

RCAF veteran receives Legion of Honour award

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Torontonian Robert Sterling is a man of few words, but his actions in World War II spoke volumes.

The Royal Canadian Air Force (RCAF) veteran served as a navigator on bombing and supply runs over Nazi-occupied France during the height of French Resistance efforts in 1943-44.

And because of that, the French government this year awarded him its highest recognition by making him a chevalier of the French Legion of Honour.

In letters sent to him in September by the consul general of France in Miami, Gaël de Maisonneuve, and the French consul general in Toronto, Jérôme Cauchard, Sterling was heralded as being instrumental in the liberation of France.

"The solidarity you lent our people and country as a flying officer... will never be forgotten, and be assured that we are eternally grateful. On behalf of our government and people, a heartfelt congratulations for your induction into the Legion of Honour," de Maisonneuve wrote.

Cauchard congratulated Sterling in a separate letter, writing that his "heart was filled with gratitude and respect for what Mr. Sterling and all veterans have done."

Reached by phone at his home last week, Sterling told The CJN it's "wonderful" to be recognized in this way.

"I was with the RCAF but on loan to the RAF. Our squadron, 624, was [considered] special operations. We were the only all-Canadian crew on the squadron. The other crews were all RAF from England," he recalled.

Sterling said his crew's orders consisted mainly of dropping supplies to underground cells in France, Italy and Yugoslavia.

"We also dropped in members of the underground into those same countries who participated in disrupting and destroying [enemy installations]," he said.

In all, Sterling said, he and his flight crew flew 72 sorties over enemy territories.

Asked to define how he felt as a Jew fighting the war while the Nazis were trying to implement the "Final Solution," Sterling said his feelings were "difficult to explain."

"I felt that I was doing my best to help destroy the Germans. Normally, you were sent home after 30 operations, and then sent back to the squadron. But we decided to continue flying in order to do as much damage as possible," he said.

This is not the first time Sterling has been decorated for his heroics in the war.

In 1945, he received two medals: the French Croix de guerre medal for his efforts in the liberation of France, and Britain's Distinguished Flying Cross.

Israeli army deserter ordered to go home

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Federal Court of Canada (FCC) recently upheld an Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) decision that an Israeli army reservist who deserted and moved to Montreal with his wife and daughter in 2007 has no legitimate asylum claim and must return home, the National Post reported last week.

The IRB had earlier ruled that Karen Kirkoyan was not a true "conscientious objector," as he asserted, since he had completed military training in Israel from 1998 to 2002 and returned to duty two times before deserting.

The IRB also said Kirkoyan never appeared before an Israeli committee that decides conscientious-objector status and that he did not supply any proof he was forced as a soldier to engage in international human rights violations, something he said in his refugee claim that the Israeli army routinely engages in.

Federal Court Justice Michel Shore backed up the IRB, rejecting Kirkoyan's contention that he would be "persecuted" if returned to Israel, even if he might serve some jail time.

According to the Post, the Federal Court considered Kirkoyan a "draft dodger."

In his first stint as a reservist in 2002, he was jailed for two weeks for refusing to enter the Gaza Strip. In his second stint in 2003, the court heard, he deserted after refusing to bomb terrorist tunnels in Gaza and then from 2005 to 2007 ignored all subsequent orders to report for duty. The case was seen as entrenching a Federal Court of Canada stance that foreign nationals from democracies won't be granted asylum in Canada to avoid military service.

Hamilton federation head reaching out

Abigail Cukier
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — People here are hearing a lot more from the UJA Federation of Hamilton – and that's no accident.

Larry Szpirglas

The reinvigorated federation is working hard to reach out to the Jewish community and beyond.

Since it was elected in the spring, a new board and executive have been updating the governance model and strengthening the organization's voice in the city.

Federation president Larry Szpirglas said governance and bylaw task forces are updating the bylaws, which were set in 1989.

"We are also taking an inventory of the services we help provide and the needs of the community and projecting what the needs will be in the future and what that means," Szpirglas said.

"We need to find the best way to help our community and respond to them. We have the opportunity to create effective change in the way we operate and in the community."

Lorne Finkelstein, chair of the federation's reorganized public relations committee, has enlisted five other volunteers whose political and religious views represent a broad spectrum of opinions in the community.

"The difference between the previous committee and this new version is that we are attempting to be proactive with our own Jewish community, but also with the local media and other ethnic and religious groups in our city," Finkelstein said.

The committee now sends out regular group e-mails called the Public Relations Update, so that the Jewish community can read about federation activities and know when members have been quoted in the media or had an op-ed piece published.

"We want everyone to be aware of what the federation has done and why, so that everyone has the chance to decide whether the federation is on the right track. So far, there's been a very positive response to these communications from so many members of our community," Finkelstein said.

The committee has had several op-ed columns and letters to the editor published in the Hamilton Spectator, the local daily. When the city's CHCH-TV wanted a reaction from the Jewish community on the evening of Gilad Schalit's release, they interviewed Finkelstein.

"It's important to ensure that the general community has some understanding about what we feel about Israel and why we do. Most important is that we have to be time sensitive to the media's needs. If a story is current, any response is required immediately."

Because of this, public relations committee members scan the media several times each day to find any stories to which they should respond.

"It naturally follows that once local media become familiar with the federation's public relations committee, they will pursue us for insights on particular events that affect our local Jewish community, as CHCH-TV did about the Schalit story," Finkelstein said.

'R2P' remains elusive: Cotler

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — It's hardly a household name, but the Responsibility to Protect doctrine is, in the opinion of Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, "arguably the most significant development in the defence of human rights since the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights."

Cotler, the Liberal justice and human rights critic, was the closing keynote speaker at a two-day conference organized by Concordia University's Montreal Institute for Genocide and Human Rights Studies (MIGS) last month.

R2P, as it is abbreviated, remains little known 10 years after the term was first coined by an international commission established by the Canadian government. The reason is that it has rarely, if ever, been explicitly put into practice.

R2P isn't a law but a norm that holds that a state has the responsibility to protect its population from mass atrocity crimes. If a state is unable or unwilling to fulfil that role, the international community has the responsibility to step in.

If diplomatic or humanitarian intervention doesn't work, the international community should use more forceful measures and, as a last resort, intervene militarily.

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

2011 marks the 25th anniversary of the "Ghet legislation" in Ontario. These amendments to the Ontario Family Law Act were widely hailed as a civil remedy to the plight of the Agunot (women whose husbands refuse to grant a Jewish divorce or Ghet). Has the problem been solved? Every year many Agunot struggle to obtain a Ghet. This evening's discussion aims to heighten awareness about the ongoing challenges faced by Agunot, the history and Halacha of the Ghet, and the possible solutions available within the Halachic and civil legal systems.

If You've Got 20 Minutes: Whether you're planning-challenged, or you've got everything in perfect order but you're just having a crazy, impossibly busy day – the super-quick recipes in the 20-Minute Meals chapter are just what you need right now!

CHICKEN TACOS

This is an easy Mexican-style dinner for a perfect kid-friendly fiesta.

3 cups shredded rotisserie chicken, about a 3-lb.chicken
1 (15-oz.) jar mild salsa, divided
2 tomatoes, diced
1 tbsp. freshly squeezed lime juice
2 tbsp. chopped fresh cilantro
12 yellow corn taco shells
1 cup canned black beans, rinsed and drained
1 avocado, pitted, peeled and diced
2 cups shredded iceberg lettuce (1/2 head), rinsed and dried soy sour cream (e.g., Tofutti)

In a large sauté pan over medium heat, cook shredded chicken with 1 cup salsa.

In a medium bowl, toss tomatoes with lime juice and cilantro.

To assemble tacos, lay out all 12 tacos on a work surface. Evenly distribute the chicken, then beans, then avocado, then lettuce and finally the tomato mixture among the tacos.

Serve tacos with sides of "sour cream" and the remaining salsa. Yield 12 tacos, serves 4

CHICKEN, PEAR AND ARUGULA SALAD

I love Bosc pears. They are crisp, sweet and spicy. They are wonderful salad pears and terrific for cooking and baking. This salad goes well with a simple butternut squash soup.

1 lb. boneless, skinless, chicken breasts, cut into strips
1/4 cup Buffalo-style wing sauce (or your favourite spicy chicken wing sauce)
2 tbsp. canola oil
2 Bosc pears, unpeeled
1 lemon, halved
1 (5-oz.) packaged arugula, rinsed and dried
1 small red onion, halved lengthwise and thinly sliced
1/2 cup bottled raspberry vinaigrette, divided
1 cup store-bought candied walnuts

Elegant dinner in a hurry

In a medium bowl, toss chicken strips with wing sauce. In a large skillet, heat oil over medium heat. Cook chicken strips in the oil for 8 minutes, stirring occasionally.

While chicken is cooking, halve and core the pears and cut them into wedges. Squeeze lemon juice over pears to prevent browning.

In a large serving bowl, toss arugula and onions with 1/4 cup raspberry vinaigrette.

Top with pear wedges, chicken strips, and walnuts. Serve remaining vinaigrette on the side. Serves 4

If You've Got 60 Minutes: If you've got an hour till the dinner bell, think of it as plenty of time to prepare a feast for a king – or at least for your tableful of little princes and princesses! This chapter contains meals that both kids and adults will eat up in a flash.

ORANGE HONEY MUSTARD ROASTED CHICKEN

Note: Place both dishes in the oven at the same time and they'll be ready to serve together.

1 small onion, coarsely chopped
1 stalk celery, cut in 2-in. chunks
2 sprigs parsley
1 (3-lb.) chicken, cut in eighths
1/2 cup honey
1/2 cup Dijon mustard
1/2 cup store-bought orange juice
2 tbsp. orange zest

Preheat oven to 450. In a large roasting pan, place onions, celery and parsley. Arrange chicken on top of vegetables.

In a small bowl, whisk together honey, mustard, orange juice and zest. Pour the sauce over chicken and bake, covered, for 25 minutes. Reduce oven temperature to 425, uncover and roast for 10 minutes more, or until juices run clear when chicken is pierced with a fork. Transfer to a serving platter.

CHOCOLATE PRETZEL CRUST TART

Prep time: 15 minutes. Total: 55 minutes

For Pretzel Crust

4 cups whole pretzels
1/4 cup sugar
1/3 cup melted pareve margarine

For Filling

2 cups pareve semisweet chocolate chips
2 tbsp. sugar
1/4 tsp. salt
1 1/2 cups soy milk
2 large eggs, room temperature
1/4 cup roughly chopped salted pretzels non-dairy whipped topping

Preheat oven to 350.

In a food processor, crush pretzels into fine crumbs.

In a medium bowl, mix pretzel crumbs, sugar and margarine. Place a 9-inch nonstick pan with a removable bottom on a sturdy cookie sheet so it's easier to remove from the oven. Press mixture onto the bottom and up the sides of the pan using a small juice glass to press the mixture down and make the crust even. Bake for 10 minutes. Remove from oven and let cool completely on a wire rack, about 20 minutes.

Reduce oven to 325°F.

Combine chocolate chips, sugar and salt in a medium bowl. In a small saucepan, bring soy milk to a simmer; do not allow to boil. Pour soy milk over chocolate chips and stir until chocolate is melted and smooth, about 2 minutes.

Gently whisk eggs, one at a time, into chocolate mixture. Pour into tart shell and bake for 15 to 20 minutes until filling is set and the surface is glossy. If you see any bubbles or cracks forming on the surface, take the tart out immediately or the filling will be overcooked. Let cool on wire rack for 10 minutes.

Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate until ready to serve.

Just before serving, top with 1/4 cup roughly chopped pretzels. Serve with non-dairy whipped topping. Serves 8

NCJW takes on teen suicide

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section, is addressing its concerns about mental health issues in adolescents with Making Connections, a free series of lectures for families beginning Nov. 14.

The first lecture, titled "Raising A Great Kid: Empowering Parents to Use Mirroring and Empathy to Attune to Their Child's Feelings," is presented by Jennifer Kolari, a social worker and therapist who has been helping children, teens and families for 20 years.

On Nov. 28, psychologists Megan Lowe and Tera Beaulieu, youth outreach directors at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, will speak about "Youth, Substance Use, Gaming and Mental Health."

Dr. Katharina Manassis, staff psychiatrist and senior associate scientist at the Hospital for Sick Children, will speak Feb. 21 on the development and scientific evaluation of cognitive-behavioural treatments.

Shira Lester-Cohen, executive director of NCJW's Toronto section, said that when she started working at the organization about one year ago, she heard about some teen suicides. "It struck me that we should be addressing the issue."

Rosalie Shadlyn, a longtime NCJW volunteer, said that as a remedial specialist, she got involved in the lecture series because in her work she sees families who are concerned with the issue.

"I have come in contact with students who are in great distress. This is my arena."

Lester-Cohen said the series covers a topic that many parents are concerned about. "We are reaching out to our own community, and the community at large."

No reservations are required for the lectures, which take place at Council House, 4700 Bathurst St. Call 416-633-5100 for information.

Exercise improves surgery recovery

We all know that exercise helps keep us slim, healthy and strong, but did you know it can also help you recover better after surgery, too? A recent study conducted by the University of Texas suggests that short bursts of intense exercise before surgery can lead to better healing after.

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

The study involved patients, who were an average age of 60, undergoing major surgery. The patients were required to perform moderate exercise such as bicycling for 10 minutes or more each day, at least one week before surgery. Short intense episodes of exercise was found to stimulate a physiologic stress response that increases the production and release of EP cells (endothelial progenitor cells), which are produced and stored in our bone marrow. These cells are vital because they are responsible for the healing process after surgery or injury.

EP cells are involved in the repair of tissue in all major organs or cavities. The study found that patients who exercised before surgery had increased EP cells and had fewer post-operative complications. Only 30 per cent developed post-op complications, compared to more than 54 per cent for those patients who didn't exercise before surgery.

EP cells repair epithelium tissue after surgery. Epithelium tissue is a thin tissue forming the outer layer of the body's surface. The number of EP cells produced and the ability to release them into your body allows for proper healing with little or no complications. Patients who had a poor physiologic stress response or poor production and release of EP cells after surgery were shown in the study to have a higher incidence of post-operative complications, as well as a lower survival rate after critical illness.

Major surgery can not always be avoided, but this study shows that exercising regularly for as little as 10 minutes a day can help get you back on your feet faster.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

IAEA to report on Iran's nuclear activity

Yossi Melman
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran is pursuing its nuclear weapons program at the Parchin military base about 30 kilometres from Tehran, diplomatic sources in Vienna say. The Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) is expected to release a report this week on Iran's nuclear activities.

According to recent leaks, Iran has carried out experiments in the final, critical stage for developing nuclear weapons – weaponization. This includes explosions and computer simulations of explosions. The Associated Press and other media outlets have reported that satellite photos of the site reveal a bus-sized container for conducting experiments.

Parchin serves as a base for research and development of missile weaponry and explosive material. It also has hundreds of structures and a number of fortified tunnels and bunkers for carrying out explosive experiments.

As far back as eight years ago, U.S. intelligence sources received information indicating that the bunkers would also be suitable for developing nuclear weapons. According to that information, Iran conducted experiments there to examine its capacity to simulate a nuclear explosion.

The Iranians rejected an IAEA request to visit Parchin, saying that IAEA rules permitted the organization's member states to deny such visits to military bases. Now, eight years later, the site is again suspected as a location for covert military nuclear activity.

Sources say that this time around, the IAEA report will contain clearer language on military aspects of the Iranian nuclear program. The report is in the final drafting stages and will need the approval of the IAEA's director general, Yukiya Amano.

According to information leaked to the media, the report will include a 12-page appendix with details including documents and satellite photos that support the contention that, in violation of its international obligations, Iran is covertly developing nuclear weapons.

The report is also expected to detail Iranian progress on uranium enrichment at its Natanz facility and state that the Islamic republic still refuses to disclose information on various aspects of its atomic program. This, in turn, arouses suspicions that Iran is hiding information and is indeed developing nuclear weapons.

Previous IAEA reports have said Iran already has 4-1/2 tons of uranium at Natanz that are enriched at 3.5 per cent. If such a quantity is enriched to 90 per cent, something Iran has the capacity for, it will be enough to produce fissile material for four or five nuclear bombs.

The report is expected to state that Iran has also begun to install centrifuges at a facility near Qom that was built underground to shield the site from an air attack.

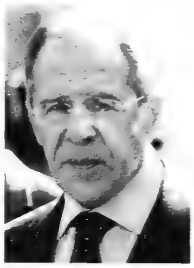
Attacking Iran a mistake: Russia

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Russia's foreign minister warned on Monday that any military strike against Iran would be a grave mistake with unpredictable consequences.

Russia, the closest thing Iran has to a big power ally, is deeply opposed to any military action against the Islamic Republic, although Moscow has supported United Nations Security Council sanctions against Iran over its nuclear program.

The UN nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), is expected this week to issue its most detailed report yet on research in Iran seen as geared to developing atomic bombs. But the Security Council is not expected to impose stiffer sanctions as a result.



Sergei Lavrov

Israeli media have been rife with speculation that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is working to secure cabinet consensus for an attack on Iranian nuclear installations.

"This would be a very serious mistake fraught with unpredictable consequences," Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said when asked about reports that Israel planned a military strike against Iran.

Lavrov said there could be no military resolution to the Iranian nuclear problem and said the conflicts in Iran's neighbours, Iraq and Afghanistan, had led to human suffering and high numbers of casualties.

A raid on Iran's nuclear facilities would be likely to provoke Tehran into hugely disruptive retaliatory measures in the Gulf that would sever shipping routes and disrupt the flow of oil and gas to export markets, political analysts believe.

Iran is already under four rounds of United Nations sanctions due to concerns about its nuclear program, which it says is entirely peaceful.

Washington is pushing for tighter measures after discovering what it says was an Iranian plot to kill the Saudi ambassador to the United States.

Russia has tried to push Tehran to disclose more details about its nuclear work to ease international concerns.

Senior Russian security officials accept that the West has legitimate concerns about the nuclear program, although Moscow says there is no clear evidence that Iran is trying to make a nuclear bomb.

Any military strike against Iran would be likely to sour ties between the West and Russia, whose leader, Vladimir Putin, is almost certain to win a presidential election in March.

"There is no military solution to the Iranian nuclear problem as there is no military solution to any other problem in the modern world," said Lavrov, who has served as foreign minister since 2004.

"This is confirmed to us every day when we see how the problems of the conflicts around Iran are being resolved — whether Iraq or Afghanistan or what is happening in other countries in the region. Military intervention only leads to many times more deaths and human suffering."

Lavrov added that talks between Britain, China, France, Russia, the United States, Germany and Iran should be resumed as soon as possible.

'My vision for the city is to open it up'

"He even dresses a bit like Batman, favouring dark suits, dark shirts and blue ties."

Indeed, Barkat speaks excitedly about the "renaissance of culture" now taking place in his city, as well as the environmental initiatives and community gardens he has instituted and the ongoing technological upgrades in education. And it's through international partnerships that Barkat feels the city is finally heading in the right direction. He points to the Canadian Jewish community as a "role model" when it comes to such collaborations.

"I'm extremely impressed by the depth of the love to the city of Jerusalem by the Canadian public," Barkat said, days before his second visit to Toronto and Montreal this week. "In many ways, it's a role model for relationships to others. The extensive trips, the total commitment, the deep understanding are something I'm coming to salute."

During his Canadian visit Nov. 9 and 10, Barkat was to meet local philanthropists and pay tribute to distinguished donors of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada.

"The Jerusalem municipality loves to create partnerships, and the Jerusalem Foundation is one of the leading vehicles of the philanthropic world," he said.

One of the projects the Jerusalem Foundation is now working on is to renovate the Morasha Community Center, which serves students and young families – two groups Barkat is trying to keep in his municipality limits. In almost every interview he gives about Jerusalem, Barkat says that the "future of Jerusalem depends on the next generation."

He is hoping to halt what is known as the "Jerusalem brain drain" – whereby the bright, young Jerusalemites leave the capital for Tel Aviv for lack of job opportunities.

In fact, before he took office, Barkat founded StartUp Jerusalem, which encourages the creation of jobs in the city through economic growth and marketing guidance. He was also a founding member of New Spirit, an organization that focuses on deepening the connections that students have to Jerusalem so that they'll stay and raise their families there.

Construction work in Jerusalem can be seen throughout the city, just as it is everywhere in Israel. Barkat said he's working on providing an equal amount of housing for all sectors of society, but steadfastly rules out any division of the city.

"There's no such working model of a split city in the world. My vision for the city is to open it up, enable the whole world to come and enjoy the city when they come peacefully – enjoy our city, all parts of it. Derived from that vision is freedom of choice, freedom of religion, freedom of movement, focusing on the common denominator of what people want to see. God forbid, splitting the city is the exactly the opposite," Barkat said.

"The public is not interested. The Arab residents of Jerusalem are not interested in this. It's like the world forgot to ask the public. If anything, you see an increase in their will to stay as part of the united city."

Barkat said a walk through his city proves the point.

"You walk in Jerusalem today and everyone is a minority. The Muslims are a minority, the Christians are a minority, the ultra-Orthodox are a minority, the secular are a minority – you walk in the streets and most of the people are different than you. And that's the power of the city of Jerusalem," he said. "You cannot physically, practically or ideologically divide the city. God forbid the world will push us there. We'll all regret it, because it will never work."

Americans say 'Israel a strategic asset'

In addition, he said, Israel will soon gain access to the expedited U.S. congressional notification process, which will allow for faster trade of smaller, routine sales and purchases of arms between the allies. Countries already subject to expedited congressional notification processes are NATO members, as well as Japan, South Korea, Australia and New Zealand.

Shapiro emphasized the Obama administration's support for Israel, despite comments by a senior U.S. official on Friday, who expressed concern that Israel would not warn the United States before taking military action against Iran's nuclear facilities.

"Our security relationship with Israel is broader, deeper and more intense than ever before," said Shapiro, adding that Israel's military edge was a "top priority" for himself, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and U.S. President Barack Obama.

The United States has a $3-billion annual commitment to Israel, which Shapiro said the Obama administration would continue to honour over the next 10 years, "even in challenging budgetary times."

Speaking of the economic impact of the U.S.-Israeli relationship, Shapiro said it was important to note that U.S. security assistance to Israel helps support American jobs, since the "vast majority of security assistance" is spent on American-made goods and services.

"We don't provide assistance out of charity. We provide assistance because it benefits our security," he said.

"We support Israel because it is in our national interests to do so," said Shapiro, echoing the recent report by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, titled, Israel: A Strategic Asset for the United States.

"If Israel were weaker, its enemies would be bolder. This would make broader conflict more likely, which would be catastrophic to American interests in the region. It is the very strength of Israel's military which deters potential aggressors and helps foster peace and stability."

The reports authors said that Americans – starting with top administrative officials – should start acknowledging that Israel is a strategic asset for the United States. They say the U.S.-Israeli relationship "stands equally on an underappreciated third leg: common national interests and collaborative action to advance those interests."

One of the authors, Robert Blackwill, is the former deputy national security adviser for strategic planning and presidential envoy to Iraq and currently serves as a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. Blackwill said last week that contrary to popular opinion, the U.S.-Israel relationship in no way weakens the United States' standing in the Arab world.

"Since 1973, we haven't identified any instances in the Arab world in which the U.S. paid a price for its relationship with Israel," Blackwill said.

"American diplomats, of course, hear much condemnation of U.S.-Israel relations, but when Arab governments act, they act on the basis of their national interests and we can't find examples of concrete tangible actions of the Arab governments against the U.S. because of its relations with Israel."

"Would Saudi Arabia's relationship with Washington be different if relations between Washington and Israel went into decline? Would they lower the price of oil? Would it view American democracy promotion in the Middle East more favourably? Would it regard U.S. Afghanistan policy more positively? Our criterion in this report was to check how the Arab government act, not what they say," Blackwill said.

PRINCIPAL LEADING COEDUCATIONAL ZIONIST JEWISH DAY SCHOOL, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA

• Exceptional opportunity for an educator with the vision and ability to assume leadership of one of Australia's leading schools which delivers outstanding results in each of its VCE years

• Lead, guide, motivate and inspire staff and students effectively through a positive attitude, intelligence and integrity

Bialik College is a cross-communal Jewish Zionist School, embracing an inclusive approach to Judaism. Bialik is committed to the pursuit of excellence in an enriching, innovative and nurturing environment. It is dedicated to empowering its students with the knowledge, skills, dispositions and values necessary to achieve their potential and to contribute meaningfully to the Jewish, Australian and global communities.

The College is currently looking to appoint a Principal. This is a senior executive role requiring an outstanding, personable educator who can demonstrate a blend of diplomacy, consultative approach and strong leadership skills. Reporting to the School Council, the Principal will be responsible for maintaining and further developing the College's standing as a premier educational institution, while upholding, nurturing and furthering the Mission, Vision and values of the College as well as fostering ongoing educational innovation.

While the preference is for an experienced Principal, with an impressive track record of success, Bialik will consider candidates who are currently holding a position that directly reports to a Principal and feel ready to take the next step.

Construction answers UNESCO

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu ordered housing construction in eastern Jerusalem and the West Bank to be expedited, in response to UNESCO's vote granting full membership to the Palestinians. The order to speed up construction of 2,000 housing units planned for eastern Jerusalem, Gush Etzion and Ma'aleh Adumim came from the Prime Minister's Office last week following a meeting of the inner cabinet, which is made up of eight senior ministers. The group was discussing how to react to the Oct. 31 vote by UNESCO, the UN cultural and scientific agency. A statement from the Prime Minister's Office said the housing was in areas that would remain in Israel's hands in any future peace deal.

UNESCO approved the Palestinians' membership bid during its general conference in Paris by a vote of 107 to 14, with the United States, Israel, Canada and Germany among those voting against the motion. Britain was among the 52 nations that abstained. France, in a surprise, voted for the Palestinians' admission. UNESCO is the first UN agency that the Palestinians have attempted to join since asking for full membership in the United Nations in September. It previously had observer status at the agency.

Federations called 'the original social network'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

DENVER — The Jewish community must abandon the paradigm of Jewish continuity as an end in itself, Rabbi Ehe Kaunfer told an audience of almost 3,000 delegates at the General Assembly of the Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) last Sunday afternoon in Denver.

Mordecai Walfish

The 80th annual GA, a three-day event, had representatives from 115 federations and six networked communities, said Judy Silverman, a co-chair of the gathering.

Speaking at the opening plenary, Rabbi Kaunfer said he and all participants are searching for "the new way to inspire the next generation and to engage the current ones."

Judaism offers "a heritage and tradition that responds to the human need for meaning, substance and connection," he said.

Rabbi Kaunfer, co-founder and executive director of the New York-based educational institution Mechon Hadar, was named twice as one of the top 50 rabbis in America by Newsweek magazine. He is serving as rabbi-in-residence for the GA.

"Our heritage is relevant, and that is the reason we need a Jewish future," he said, adding that Torah, "the sum total of Jewish text and sources," is "the pathway to meaning, substance and connection."

In the organized Jewish community, Torah is often sidelined, the rabbi said. Sometimes, he noted, it takes the form of "a pithy quote... before we really get down to business."

Torah has "the power to push us to ask bold questions," Rabbi Kaunfer said.

As well, he added, "we have to make Torah accessible to all. We have to stop imagining Torah as only for the clergy and for the elite... We would never limit the pursuit of social justice, of charity, of service, to a few elite."

Kathy Manning, chair of the board of trustees of JFNA, said this year's GA theme, "The original Jewish social network," is an accurate representation of what goes on at the event. "It's something we Jews were doing long before Mark Zuckerberg was even a glint in his mother's eye."

The economic collapse in the United States "has fundamentally changed the nature of the North American Jewish community," Manning said. Federations are now helping community members, including many former donors, deal with loss of their jobs, homes and savings, she noted, adding that Jewish schools with declining enrolment have closed or are at risk of closing.

U.S. Congresswoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz said Judaism "inspires us to do great things, but perhaps the greatest gift of our tradition is that nothing we do can be done without community."

Although many of the challenges discussed at the plenary were specific to the United States, Russ Joseph, chief executive officer of the Edmonton Jewish Federation, said, "I think the general principles that guide the work that we're doing are clearly applicable anywhere in the world.

"We in Canada, and especially in smaller Jewish communities, lose sight of the sense that there are other Jews out there." Participating in an event like the GA, with thousands of others working for a common goal, "really does energize what you do," he said.

Adam Singer, president of the Calgary Jewish Federation, said that despite the challenges facing the Jewish community, "there's great optimism too."

Educator and CJN columnist Daniel Held, who left Toronto to study for his PhD at the Jewish Theological Seminary, said it's "phenomenal" to see Jewish learning play a central role at the GA.

One of five Canadian Wexner Foundation fellows, Held said it's important for him to continue to be connected to Canada and Canadians. "It's kind of ironic that you have to come to Denver to meet the other Canadians."

Mordecai Walfish, also a Wexner fellow, is a Hamilton, Ont., native studying for a year in Israel. He credited Rabbi Kaunfer for his "bold and really useful" message.

Like Held, Walfish was looking forward to attending UIA Federations Canada reception on Monday. "I've been in the States for four years. I'm excited to reconnect with my Canadian [counterparts]."

He said the GA is "a great way to see people face to face that I've only had e-mail contact with in the last few years."

McGill student Lainie Schwartz, a native of Winnipeg and a MASA fellow with Hillel Montreal, was hoping to network, hear interesting speakers and meet like-minded students.

Montrealer Elaine Dubrovsky, a JFNA board member and a past chair of Federation CJA's women's campaign who wanted to focus on learning about what's going on in Israel, attended a session called "The big blue tent and Jewish dissent," featuring a play about a CEO of a Jewish foundation confronting an anti-Zionist playwright and a disillusioned donor, among other characters. Every federation is facing similar issues, Dubrovsky said.

Philanthropic work didn't hurt his business: CEO

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Back when he was a young lawyer, Ed Sonshine was labouring away on a file when the firm's senior partner came into his office and dragooned him to an emergency fundraising event.

It was October 1973 and the Yom Kippur War was raging. Taken to the home of a prominent Jewish lawyer, Sonshine found himself among a group of 100 to 125 "giants of the Jewish bar." They rose one after the other to pledge large amounts to support Israel.

His boss, Lloyd Fogler, prodded him to get up and make a pledge, but as a junior lawyer watching others pledge more than he earned "pre-tax," he was a little nervous about doing so.

Finally he stood and pledged $1,000. His colleague applauded, and when he returned home to tell his wife, Fran, to his delight, she supported him completely.

That unexpected incident propelled him into the world of philanthropy, which saw him participate in the United Jewish Appeal's lawyers division and eventually co-chair its annual campaign. It didn't hurt his business either. Sonshine, who currently serves as CEO of RioCan Real Estate Investment Trust (REIT), confided at a meeting of the young leadership division of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

While involvement in charitable organizations can be time-consuming, there are plenty of upsides in addition to assisting a worthy cause, he said.

"One of the most interesting things about the year I was UJA [Federation of Greater Toronto] chair was I got to meet some of the most interesting people in Toronto." Many he did not know, but his involvement was very good for networking, Sonshine stated.

"Doing good" is never a bad idea, he continued. "There are enough people in our community who respect that.

"People respect you for working for Yad Vashem," he added.

In discussing the intersection of philanthropy and business, Sonshine suggested there may be something larger at play. Businessman Larry Tanenbaum approached him to chair the annual UJA campaign. He was hesitant, he said, because it was "very busy at RioCan."

Tanenbaum told him, "The more work I do for the community, I do better."

With that advice in mind, Sonshine took the position with UJA. RioCan did well notwithstanding the time he spent on the campaign.

"Maybe it makes you a better person. I don't know," he said.

Describing his journey to the corner office of Canada's largest real estate investment trusts, Sonshine pointed out he actually began his career as a lawyer.

Sonshine joined a Jewish firm – the large downtown ones hired few Jews at the time, he said, but by 1986 he was looking for something different. He left law to join Counsel Corporation to run its real estate arm.

Ed Sonshine

In 1989 "the real estate world fell apart pretty dramatically and quickly." Sonshine realized that a real estate mutual fund owned by Counsel relied on a model that did not work – it was impossible to honour a 30-day redemption when the underlying assets were illiquid.

He had studied REITs, which were available in the United States, and in 1994 he created RioCan REIT. As an investment trust, rent generated by properties are paid back to the firm's unit holders, who have the expectation of stable returns that increase over time.

That model proved a success. "We were in the right place at the right time with the right vehicle," said Sonshine.

RioCan is now Canada's largest REIT with assets worth around $10 billion.

It owns neighbourhood shopping centres anchored by supermarkets, together with a mix of retail centres, the company states on its website. It currently has more than 60 million square feet in its portfolio, including interests in a number of grocery-anchored shopping centres in the United States.

In October 2009, RioCan obtained its first U.S. property. It now manages six million square feet south of the border, concentrated in Pennsylvania, New York and Massachusetts. It has also ventured into Texas, which, with 26 million people, has an economy about the size of Canada's, Sonshine said.

In a question period following his address, Sonshine was asked whether opportunities still exist for the younger generation.

"Every young person asks the same question," he said. In the early 1970s, an architect friend of his, pointing to the many buildings in Toronto, wondered if there'd be anything for him to build.

That person is now a successful architect, Sonshine said.

"You never know. Who knew back then that I'd be running this big thing called a REIT? It didn't exist," he said.

"There will be no shortage of great opportunities," he added. "There always are."

Prior to his address, Sonshine was introduced by his wife, Fran, who serves as national chair of Canadian Yad Vashem.

She pointed out that Yad Vashem, which is Israel's national Holocaust remembrance authority in Jerusalem, brings 20 to 25 Canadian educators to the facility each summer, the majority of them not Jewish.

They learn about the Holocaust and are given instruction in how best to teach it. They bring a message about the dangers of intolerance and the relevance of the Holocaust today, she said.

Yad Vashem's annual activities in Canada include organizing Yom Hashoah events; leading the National Holocaust Remembrance Day Ceremony in Ottawa; organizing the Holocaust Survivors' Queen's Park Award Ceremony as well as the Toronto Earl Bales Park Ceremony; hosting conferences to present curriculum materials to educators, and twinning bar and bat mitzvah kids with a child Holocaust victim.

Both she and her husband are the children of Holocaust survivors. Ed was born in the Bergen-Belsen displaced persons camp after the war; Fran was born on Cyprus in a British internment camp.

Both families ended up in Toronto where "they built a life," Ed said.

U.S retailer Syms files for bankruptcy

JTA

NEW YORK — Syms Corp. clothing company and its affiliate, Filene's Basement, have filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection.

"This has been a challenging time for Syms and Filene's Basement," said Syms Corp. CEO Marcy Sims last week when announcing the bankruptcy. "We have been faced with increased competition from large department stores that now offer the same brands as our stores at similar discounts."

Well-known Jewish philanthropist Sy Syms founded discount clothing company in 1958, gearing his store's merchandise and service to "educated consumers." He also established Yeshiva University's Syms School of Business in 1987.

Edward Filene founded Filene's Basement in 1909. This will be the second time the fashion retailer filed for bankruptcy. The first time occurred in 2009, when Filene's Basement was sold to Syms Corp. in a resuscitation effort.

There are 25 Syms and 21 Filene's Basement stores across the United States and the company employs 2,500 people. Both chains plan to go out of business by the end of January.

Genealogy-related stories preserve family histories

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

To mark its 25th anniversary, the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada (Toronto) has published a book of 44 genealogy-related stories written by its members.

The stories in Tracing Our Roots, Telling Our Stories are diverse and range freely over geography and time, encompassing both the Old World and the New from a couple of centuries ago to the present. The settings include Galicia, Romania, Russia, Ukraine, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Israel; one ranges as far off the beaten path as Barbados, another the island of Mauritius. Canadian locales include Melfort, Sask., St. John's, Nfld., the northern town of Waubaushene, Ont., and downtown Toronto.

In this miracle age of Internet genealogy, many of us have found passenger manifests of one or more of our ancestors, but relatively few of us ever hear the full story of the struggle and challenge behind a typical sea crossing. In Yetta's Gift, author Sharon Singer relates the moving tale of her grandmother's crossing with four children after her husband, who was already in Toronto, sent five ship's tickets back to her in Galicia.

"When Yetta tried to board the ship with her four children, the ticket-taker told her that the tickets were not sufficent," she writes. "He insisted that a further payment was required. Unable to speak English, Yetta was forced to give up her gold wedding ring and earrings. She never wore a wedding ring again."

Several days into the voyage, Yetta's small provision of food had been exhausted and her children began to grow weak from hunger. Travelling in steerage, she stood at the bottom of a staircase that connected to an upper deck and pleaded with a well-dressed woman for food. "The woman's heart was touched by Yetta's plight, and each day she brought food to the stairwell where Yetta would be waiting. Without knowing her name, Yetta thanked her and blessed her each Friday night for the rest of her life."

No mere genealogical document could convey such heartbreaking vignettes. Rather, they are the stuff of oral history and first-person narratives of the sort that fill this 248-page book.

In Return to Ostrowiec, Anne Stein tells of her family's existence in the Polish town where she was born, the family's immigration to Toronto in 1936 and subsequent experiences, and her eventual return to her hometown three years ago. (Stein told her tale to Evelyn Steinberg and Rodeen Stein, who preserved it as a written narrative.)

The First Jewish Kvutza in Russia, a story by the late Moishe Faerman translated from Yiddish by his daughter Sarah Faerman, is about an attempt by a group of Zionists to establish a Jewish communal farm, with Saturday as their day of rest. "Unfortunately our neighbours under no circumstances would allow us to work in the fields on Sundays. They also refused to believe that we were working according to Communist principles. They couldn't believe that a Communist would work on his own with no one over him. In their view, a Communist was one that plundered and confiscated."

As one might expect, numerous stories deal with the Holocaust and the myriad displacements it generated. In After Vienna, Henry Wellisch recounts his dramatic story as a wartime refugee from Vienna being denied entry into Palestine and being shipped by the British to a refugee camp in Mauritius. He eventually reached Israel, served in the army, and brought his parents to Canada in 1952. Another Holocaust piece, A Final Goodbye to My Lost World, was contributed by well-known author Simcha Simcovitch.

For David Price and Howard Zakai, the impulse to reconstruct the history of their shared Gorlicki family tree in Chmielnik, Poland, was sparked by the realization that the history had been all but obliterated by the Holocaust, emigration and the passage of time. They and other researchers reconstructed a family tree that now boasts more than 1,500 descendants.

Some stories, such as My Uncle Ellah by Ellen Shumak Monheit, describe pivotal personal moments. In this tale, the author explains that she first felt the impulse to research and record her family history upon the tragic death of an uncle when she was 17. "That night, 10 February 1959, I decided to become the historian and archivist for my family. I was afraid that if I did not write down important events, I would be partially responsible for my family's eventual disappearance. Therefore I essentially assumed the responsibility for ensuring that this would not happen."

Other equally riveting accounts include In Search of Mishpocha, by Peter Jassem; The Mysterious Tombstone, by Ruth Chernia; Palestine 1935, by Judith Ghert; Oh, the Family Stories They Love to Tell by Rachel Aber Schlesinger; A Prairie Vignette, by Pearl Kasdan; My Grandmother Gittel, by Lorraine Cogan Kerzner; and Discovering Family History Through the Translated Yiddish Word, by Miriam Beckerman.

In fact, each author seems to make a unique contribution. Hard to believe that the Jewish Genealogical Society began soliciting manuscripts for this project only one year ago.

Despite the wide variety of subjects and settings, one may discern a common thread in these stories. Jews today seem to have an imperative need to collect and preserve the shards of our family histories and reassemble them as one might the fragments of a fine china plate that has been shattered on the floor. Jewish genealogy may thus be seen as a form of tikkun olam, repairing the world.

Tracing Our Roots, Telling Our Stories is available by mail for $25 plus $5 shipping and handling ($10 in U.S.) from the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada (Toronto), P.O. Box 91006, 2901 Bayview Ave., Toronto M2K 2Y6. www.jgstoronto.ca

Klezmer band has fun with new album

Laura Fixman
Special to the CJN

Members of the klezmer band Gypsophilia immersed themselves in a Montreal studio for a full week to record their latest album, Constellation, which bassist Adam Fine said is nothing like anything they've previously done.

The album has more reggae influences than the band had incorporated before, Fine said, and his favourite song, the fun party tune Montreal, was chosen as the first single because it's the kind of song people can dance to.

He added that it was much more fun to make the new album, because of how the band had grown together.

"We're great friends, and we wouldn't have come this far if we weren't," Fine said. "We challenge each other and we make musical jokes."

Gypsophilia will be touring across Canada in the next few months, including a performance with Symphony Nova Scotia in Halifax in March – the show Fine said he's most excited about – and performances in Prince Edward Island, Toronto and other parts of Nova Scotia. He hopes that in the future, they'll get a chance to perform outside Canada.

The best audiences, Fine said, are the ones that dance or sing along, adding that the new album is especially danceable.

He said Gypsophilia has grown as much in its performance ability as in its sound.

"Our band has grown up a little, and our stage show is getting better," he said. "When you get to perform for a great audience that participates, you can see that they're really enjoying it, and you can learn from your peers while you're performing."

Gypsophilia formed in 2005 and was inspired by Parisian gypsy jazz guitarist Jean "Django" Reinhardt. Fine said his influence can still be heard in the band's music, but its current sound is more a mix of klezmer, salsa and classical.

The band now mostly performs songs they've written themselves.

"We tend to write songs individually," Fine said. "I'll start with a kernel of an idea and play something on my bass. Sometimes I sit on ideas I really like for quite a while."

Choosing the album's title, Constellation, was an arduous process, and they debated a few options. He added that any decision is difficult in a band with seven members, but as always, they eventually came to an agreement.

"The title came from thinking of images of space and space travel," Fine said. "Music itself is a kind of journey."

Constellation offers 11 new tracks, including Bercy, a jazzy song written by Fine that sounds like it would fit perfectly on a mystery movie soundtrack. Other songs include the lively, upbeat Vino Griego and Opa (War Gone Man), a softer tune with a slower pace.

Fine said the variation in songs has been something the band has been working toward since they got together in 2005 for what was supposed to be a one-time performance.

"I think everyone will react differently to the songs, which really speaks to the diversity of the album," Fine said. "I think we've really developed a sound and people will really enjoy it."

The East Coast Music Association gave Gypsophilia a best jazz album award in 2009 for their last effort, Sha-Ba-Da-OW!. This latest album was a collaboration with producer and former Arcade Fire band member Howard Bilerman.

Fine is also involved with several solo projects, but he said they don't compare to working in such a large group.

"It's all about being playful. You feed off each other, and it makes the experience more enjoyable than if you were solo."

They're creepy and they're kooky, mysterious and spooky, they're altogether "ooky" – the Addams family! And Dancap Productions is bringing them to Toronto!

The Broadway musical The Addams Family, based on the macabre drawings of the bizarre and beloved family created by cartoonist Charles Addams, runs at the Toronto Centre for the Arts from Nov. 16 to 27, starring award-winning actor Douglas Sills as Gomez.

Sills says this musical version has two plotlines. The first revolves around Morticia (Sara Gettelfinger) and his 20-year-old daughter, Wednesday, portrayed by Cortney Wolfson.

Wednesday has fallen in love with a young "normal" man whom she invites to dinner. She approaches her father about the news that she wants to marry and asks him not to tell Morticia until after dinner.

"So, the "A" storyline is about Gomez and Morticia dealing with a secret between them, when their marriage was founded on the premise that they would have no secrets from each other," says Sills.

"Morticia does recognize something is up. Gomez struggles, having made a promise to the second most important woman in his life not to tell the first most important woman in his life what is going on until after the dinner."

The other storyline is about the two families coming together and what happens when a family that appears to be traditional meets an eccentric family. "What you come to realize is that they're not very different at all, that the so-called 'normal' family is actually very unusual and idiosyncratic underneath," Sills says. "And the Addamses, who might appear more eccentric on the outside, are very normal in the way they have to cope with child rearing and marital relationships, and all the things that go along with living."

Douglas Sills

The cast of The Addams Family

Sills feels the key to the longevity of the Addams family's story is America's fascination with the macabre.

"People love reversals of morality," he says. "What's so wonderful about the Addamses is that it is not so gruesome, as it is kooky, with a humorous element to it. When Charles Addams originated his single-panel cartoons, the characters didn't even have names. People were drawn to the everyday situations depicted, but done with the reversal of all things dark being good. I think people were incredibly charmed."

He says that some people will come away realizing there are no outsiders and that there is no true normal, while some will walk away just having had a really fun time. The actor thinks audiences will enjoy the magical moments thanks to the memorable stage effects.

The Detroit native, who splits his time between New York and Los Angeles, garnered Tony and Drama Desk nominations, as well as the Los Angeles Ovation Award for The Scarlet Pimpernel on Broadway and on tour. Before embarking on The Addams Family tour, the Broadway veteran was in Chicago for the tryout of the new rock musical White Noise.

Sills is no stranger to television and film, either, appearing in films such as Deuce Bigalow and Funny About Love, and on TV in Murphy Brown and Will & Grace, to name a few.

Sills says that being Jewish has had a tremendous influence on his career. "Jewish culture is incredibly reverent towards philanthropy that definitely feeds into the arts and towards artistic achievement," he says.

"There was a lot of music played in the house, my mom took us to a lot of theatre and we would watch movies together. My mother would act with great respect towards the actors that would be performing. Just as you respect a learned person in the Jewish household, the same is true for successful artists."

Israeli family plays jazz together

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

It is unusual to have three acclaimed musicians in one family. But The Three Cohens, Anat, Avishai and Yuval, all excelled as jazz musicians while growing up in Israel.

The Israeli trio went to the United States in 1994 to study music at the Berklee College of Music in Boston and chose to remain there following their studies.

The Three Cohens will perform in Toronto this month in Koerner Hall, on a bill with the Jamey Haddad Arab Jazz Ensemble, as part of the conservatory's Jazz Music From The Middle East series.

The Cohens will play songs from their new CD, Family, at the concert.

"The CD allows us to show how well we blend and have a unique sound. This is our third CD together, and we each add our instruments in creating a unique jazz sound," said Avishai, the youngest of the trio who plays the trumpet.

Elder brother Yuval plays the soprano saxophone and middle sibling, Anat, plays both the clarinet and alto saxophone. All siblings are grateful to the Berklee College of Music for allowing them to hone their chops in jazz music.

"We all had talent and were influenced by the jazz recordings that we heard from our father. I took to jazz when Avishai played the trumpet. Our skills became honed when Berklee did recruiting in Israel for all of us to get music scholarships. First, they wanted Yuval, then me and then Avishai," said Anat.

Each member of the trio has an individual solo career, so they look forward to touring together this year.

"We are so musically integrated that we don't even have to talk to know what to do musically. Family was wonderful for us to try new ways of playing jazz, such as Duke Ellington's The Mooch or Rhapsody in Blake, which was inspired by the song I Hear a Rhapsody," said Anat.

Anat, 36, is the most acclaimed of The Three Cohens. She was voted best clarinettist of the year four years in a row, from 2007 to 2010, by the Jazz Journalists Association – the first time any clarinettist has been voted in for four years in a row.

Downbeat magazine called her one of the best clarinettists as well as one of the best tenor saxophonists of all time.

Cohen has released CDs on her own label, Anzic Records, including the highly acclaimed Clarinetwork (2010), a salute to the famed clarinettist Benny Goodman on his centennial.

Anat studied classical music at age 12, but switched to jazz in high school, playing for the Jaffa Conservatory Dixieland Band. Before enrolling at Berklee, she served in the Israeli military, playing music in the Israeli Armed Forces Band.

"Our soldiers put their lives at risk every day, so it was a great honour to play for them and to be proud of all I achieved, even before going to Berklee," she said.

After graduating from Berklee in 1998, Anat flourished as a musician by playing world music, including Afro-Cuban, Argentine tango, Brazilian and klezmer.

"Oddly enough, most of us think of klezmer as Jewish music, but the minor sound in the clarinet is found in other cultures as well," Anat said. "The great thing about playing music is that I think of myself as an international musician with no borders.

"I feel blessed that people view me as an ambassador of music for Israel, even if I perform not only in Israel, but all over the world," she said.

The Three Cohens perform Nov. 12 at 8 p.m. at Koerner Hall in the Royal Conservatory of Music. For tickets, call 416-408-0208 or go to www.rcmusic.ca. For more information, visit www.3cohens.com or www.anatcohen.com.

Play about Pollard explores Jewry's relationship with Israel

David Silverberg
Special to The CJN

One of Israel's most recognized playwrights is making a rare appearance in Canada, leading two lectures at Toronto universities and helping usher in the production of his play Deceived.

Motti Lerner's play about a real-life Israeli spy will run at the Toronto Centre for the Arts this month, presented by Teatron Theatre.

Deceived tracks the story of Jonathan Pollard, the American Navy intelligence analyst imprisoned since 1987 for spying for Israel. Last January, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu asked U.S. President Barack Obama for clemency for Pollard. He was denied.

Written in 1993, Deceived is more than just Pollard's story, says Lerner in a phone interview. "The play is a vehicle to explore North American Jewry's relationship with Israel. Who are you loyal to, America or Israel, and what happens when you have to choose between them?"

Lerner stresses Deceived is a work of fiction based on Pollard's life. He couldn't truly get inside the incarcerated man's head, despite visiting him at his North Carolina prison where he's serving a life sentence for espionage. "His inner world will always be a mystery," Lerner says.

Pollard's first wife, Anne, is central to the relationship drama in the play, but there's an interesting Toronto connection to Pollard's other partner: his current wife lives in the city and Lerner hopes she attends the show.

Lerner is busy during his five-day visit to Toronto: besides meeting Tarragon Theatre's artistic director Richard Rose, he's leading a public talk at the University of Toronto on playwriting. The same day he's lecturing on dramaturgy at Ryerson University.

He's a wanted man for a reason: Lerner has won four awards for his plays, including a 1995 Prime Minister of Israel Award for Writers. For 30 years, his plays have been staged across the world, and his risqué content has often focused on Israeli themes and protagonists. Some of his best-known plays include Kastner, Exile in Jerusalem and Hard Love.

Lerner has noticed his work has found more acceptance outside Israel than within its borders. "Theatre used to be relevant and radical in Israel," he remembers, "but now attendance is poor and it doesn't have the same edge as it used to." Since Israeli companies might not be warm to his plays, Lerner has found Europe and North America to be the most encouraging examples of theatre's bright future.

"When plays cross cultures and have depth, they can be staged anywhere," he says.

Lerner has long admired Anton Chekhov and his approach to theatre, a subject he explored deeply in a recent book. "It's fascinating to study how Chekhov had a certain method to write a play."

When it comes to writing plays, Lerner pens everything in Hebrew and translators bring it to English audiences. But is something lost in translation? Depends on the context, Lerner says. In Deceived, for instance, the language isn't too focused on Israeli culture and slang, but another play may include material only a Hebrew audience fully understands. Plays rooted in a religious context are always difficult to translate, Lerner notes.

Next for Lerner is another play recently completed, this time focusing on another dark period in Israel's history: Baruch Goldstein, a member of the Jewish Defence League, killed 29 Muslims in 1994 when he opened fire on a mosque in Hebron. It's the kind of controversial play some Israeli theatres wouldn't touch.

"But theatre companies need to take risks," Lerner urges. "They need to have less fear in order to present radical ideas."

Deceived runs from Nov. 9 to 20 at Toronto Centre for the Arts (Studio Theatre), 5040 Yonge St. Ticket prices range from $36 to $42. 416-250-3708.

Maccabi Canada gearing up for next Games

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Maccabi Canada has begun its search for coaches, medical staff and chaperones to accompany athletes to the 2013 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

The organization has sent out hundreds of e-mails informing supporters of the move and is using its website to recruit personnel.

The step is just part of a massive shift as the organization prepares for the upcoming Games, said Maccabi Canada president Tom Bacher. At the 2009 Games, the Canadian team consisted of more than 400 athletes and another 80 coaches and support staff.

With that kind of presence, fundraising becomes a priority and efforts have already begun to raise the millions needed. Each athlete in 2009 was asked to raise $7,500, and the costs in 2013 will no doubt be even greater.

While the heavy lifting has yet to begin, Maccabi Canada raised $50,000 at a "sports challenge" on Oct. 2. Eighty young athletes gathered at Camp Robin Hood to play baseball, softball, beach volleyball, touch football, four-on-four basketball and soccer.

Tom Bacher

Maccabi Canada's major fundraiser is planned for March 5, 2012, when hundreds are expected to attend a sports media dinner.

In addition to the cost of sending hundreds of athletes to the Games, Maccabi Canada is budgeting to incur an additional $500,000 cost in 2013. That will result from a pre-camp in Israel that will see the Canadian team spend five days training, touring and performing volunteer work.

In addition to building team camaraderie, the pre-camp is important to allow athletes to visit the country in a way they can't when focused strictly on athletic competition, Bacher said.

It's part of his philosophy of creating attachment to the State of Israel, fostering friendships and strengthening participants' Jewish identity, Bacher said.

One way of fostering that identity is to create a local Jewish sports system that will attract young people from an early age, he said. Worldwide, communities are organized around Maccabi sports clubs, but that's the kind of organizational structure Batcher can only dream of – at least at the moment.

Batcher has set an ambitious goal of broadening the presence of the Maccabi movement in Canada, to make it the place to send your kids for both recreational sports and to develop elite athletes.

One idea Bacher is considering is to run elite summer sports camps, associated with existing Jewish camps, which would combine sports and cultural programming. Also on the agenda is partnering with existing Jewish sports programs.

In the meantime, Maccabi Canada is raising its profile through fun events: it will hold its first annual bridge tournament on Nov. 9, and it is already publicizing its annual picnic at Camp Robin Hood in June 2012.

Twenty-seven runners recently participated in the Scotiabank Toronto Waterfront Marathon, raising thousands of dollars for Maccabi Canada.

SOCCER CHAMPS

Members of Bialik Hebrew Day School's junior team celebrate their victory in the Jewish Day School Sports League (JDSSL) soccer championship. Bialik defeated a team from Robbins Hebrew Academy's Beth Tikvah campus 6-2 in the championship game, played at Downsview Park. Other teams in the tournament included teams from Robbins' Beth Tzedec campus, Leo Baeck's northern campus, the Toronto Heschel School and two campuses of Associated Hebrew Schools. Bialik's team is pictured with coaches Shawn Stevens, left, and Aaron Rosenwald.

Antisemitism surveyed on British campuses

Alex Weisler
JTA

LONDON — More than four out of every 10 Jewish students at British universities reported witnessing or experiencing antisemitic incidents between October 2010 and last March.

But only two in 10 said they were concerned about campus antisemitism.

Those were two of the findings in a survey of Jewish students in Britain that showed respondents generally comfortable with their religious identity, and relatively unconcerned about antisemitism and anti-Israel activity on campus.

The National Jewish Student Survey, conducted by the London-based Institute for Jewish Policy Research and released in September, is the first-ever study examining Jewish campus life in Britain. It was commissioned by the Pears Foundation and the Union of Jewish Students, the umbrella group that oversees Jewish societies at more than 100 British universities – the British equivalent of Hillel houses.

The survey, which drew more than 900 respondents from nearly 100 institutions and was conducted in February and March, provides a comprehensive look at the demographics of the so-called millennial generation, young people who came of age in a Britain focused on Jewish continuity and youth involvement to an unprecedented degree.

Charlotte Karp, the Union of Jewish Students' communications director, said the findings are proof that British Jewry's two decades of investment in youth groups and Jewish student societies on campus "is paying excellent dividends."

"By placing trust and investment in students, we are developing the present and future leadership of Anglo Jewry," Karp said.

The survey found that the concerns of Jewish students generally matched those of non-Jewish students – grades, jobs after graduation and "relationship issues" occupied the top three spots.

In questions on Jewish concerns, 38 per cent of respondents said they were "very" or "fairly worried" about campus anti-Israel sentiment, and 21 per cent reported concerns about campus antisemitism.

Forty-two per cent reported witnessing or experiencing an antisemitic incident between October 2010 and the time of the survey.

"If the community did not make an effort to combat these things, the situation could be far worse," Karp said. "The fact that it is not a major concern is actually a credit to the longstanding efforts of UJS and other communal bodies that deal with these issues and shows they are managing the situation very well."

Amy Philip, deputy director of the Pears Foundation, said it's important not to look just at the antisemitic experiences but about the "wider experience of students and the positive ways in which they are relating to their Jewish identity."

The survey found that most Jewish students at British universities do not hide their religion, with 59 per cent reporting being "always open" and 39 per cent "sometimes open" about it.

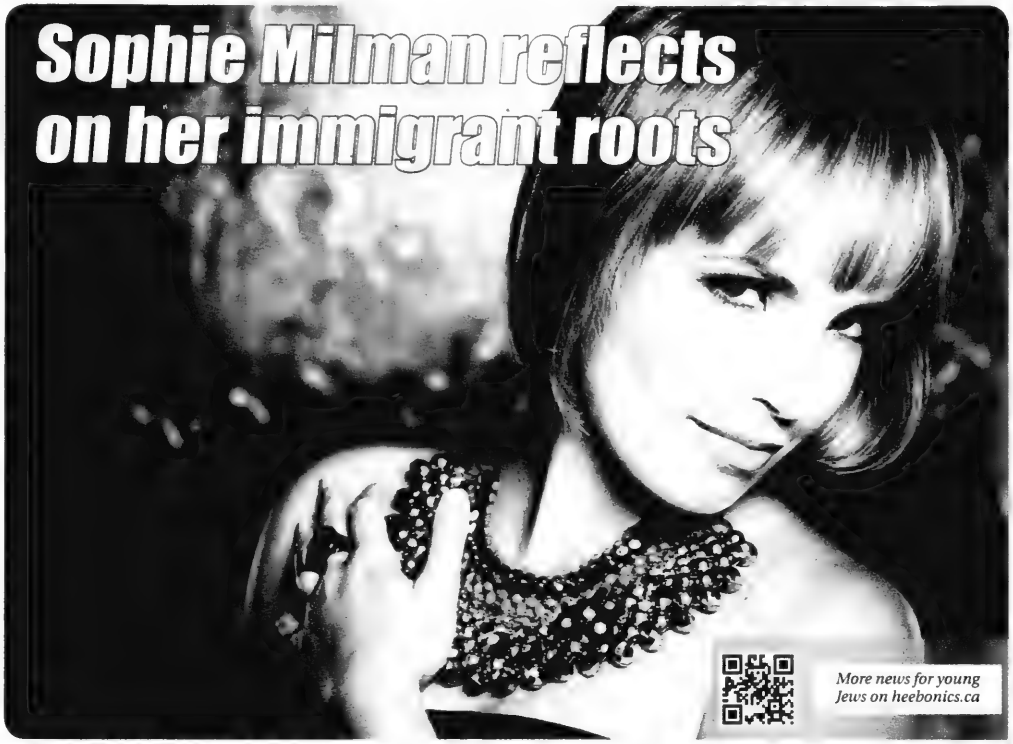
Sophie Milman reflects on her immigrant roots



More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Sophie Milman's immigrant experience has shaped not just her personality but also her approach to music.

Take for instance the Meredith Wilson song Till There Was You, the fifth song on the jazz singer's newly released fourth CD, In The Moonlight.

"That song takes me back to a time that was very difficult for us – it was the best of times and the worst of times," the 28-year-old Juno Award winner says.

Milman, then seven, had just moved with her parents to Israel from Russia. Her parents had to work several jobs to make ends meet, and Milman had to grow up fast, sometimes only seeing them on Shabbat.

"Music was how we communicated. [Till There Was You, the Beatles 1963 version] was the first English song I learned to sing. I was a big Beatles fan. We had a car and on a long trip – which in Israel means anything longer than 20 minutes – I was the stereo. My dad would always request that song. I would sing Beatles songs, Queen songs and Deep Purple songs."

Now, two decades later, she finally got to record it. "It's a simple song, a ditty, it's not very sophisticated… but there's something so beautiful about it."

Then, nine years after moving to Israel, her family uprooted again – this time moving to Canada. "There's nothing like picking up and starting over from scratch – twice," Milman says.

"My experience was very different," she says. "Leaving everything you know and never going back. I've met many rich Russian Jews who come here to go to school and go back over the summer. It was nothing like that for me. We had no money. On my birthday I would receive a telegram from my grandparents in Russia because we couldn't afford a phone call!"

This summer, Milman had a chance to go on what she called a "reverse journey," going back from Canada to Israel and Russia. Russia was just a visiting trip, but in Israel she got the opportunity to perform for the first time. She did three concerts – the first was an emotional show at the Zappa Club in Herzliya.

"I've played Massey Hall in Toronto and the Hollywood Bowl [in Los Angeles] but the show at the Zappa Club was one of the best shows of my life. Even my husband, who's seen me 100 times, says it was the best show I've ever done. It was something very special."

Milman was nervous before going on stage. This was the first time her relatives in Israel as well as her old friends would be seeing her. Although she purposely had the venue darkened, she still knew they were there.

Milman, admittedly, gets emotional even at the best of times and says that no matter how long you've been singing, you never quite get used to it.

"Singing is the only profession in the world where you go out and all eyes are on you," she says. "You have to connect with people in a way nobody else needs to."

In The Moonlight is a strong, sophisticated recording, one that shows a more introspective and mature Milman.

It features 13 songs, from the flirtatious George Gershwin/Buddy DeSylva opener Do It Again to the hauntingly seductive Serge Gainsbourg song Ces Petits Riens and the Duke Ellington classics Prelude to a Kiss and Day Dream.

"This album's moodier, lusher and more romantic," she says.

"I think that without my previous records I couldn't make this one. It's all a natural evolution. I am extremely proud of [2009's] Take Love Easy, and this album reflects a lot of growth."

Milman recorded In The Moonlight in New York with Grammy-nominated producer Matt Pierson.

"I was really looking forward to it and yet I was terrified," Milman admits. At first, she was reluctant to leave her comfort zone. "But I felt like I needed to do it."

Working with top players such as pianists Gerald Clayton and Kevin Hays and guitarists Julian Lage and Romero Lubambo helped her up the ante. "When you're in a recording studio with [such musicians] you have to sing the best you can. It allows you to push yourself in a way you normally wouldn't." Also for the first time, Milman enhances her music with orchestral strings on several songs.

"There's more personal maturity, and the strings really add to the sound. The overall effect is a more grown-up Sophie Milman record. It's a better, sleeker version of what I've been doing."

Milman's second CD Make Someone Happy won a Juno Award in 2008. She admitted to having high hopes for this record but conceded, "I'm not greedy. One win is enough."

As on her previous recordings, she also throws in a contemporary tune, this time Feist's regretful So Sorry.

"People suggested that one to me. I don't often accept suggestions, but that Feist tune is perfect for me. I'm a very temperamental person, and when I fight, I'm very fierce. There's also that whole Jewish guilt thing as well."

Although she's not particularly religious, Milman feels very connected to Judaism – at least on a cultural, traditional level.

As is the case for many Soviet Jews, it was hard for her family to be observant in Russia. In fact, it wasn't until they came to Canada in 1999 that she first went to a shul. But just like her music, Milman is constantly maturing and evolving on a personal level. She got to host her first Rosh Hashanah dinner this year.

"My husband [lawyer Casey Chisick, whom she married two years ago], who's way more religious than I am, roped me into it. I did the whole thing, two briskets and chicken soup made from scratch. I'm a real balabuste!"

To her husband's chagrin, marriage is not slowing Milman's touring schedule. She just returned from Japan and immediately launched a mini-Canadian tour that took her to Ottawa, Quebec and Montreal. She'll be spending most of the rest of the year touring the United States. She's scheduled to perform in Markham, Ont., on Jan. 27, 2012, and at Massey Hall in Toronto on June 1, 2012.

'The girl doesn't have friends'

We're sitting peacefully in the living room. The kids are busy with their laptops. Sarah, the dog, is giving the sofa cushions a thorough licking, and Sneezy, the cat, is nowhere to be found, and neither is Meir.

"The girl doesn't have friends in the new school?" I shout out of blue. What can I do. It has been inside of me for a while now.

Meir enters the room with a wet dishrag in his hands. "Maybe it's because she takes after someone we all know, and she's snooty and full of herself?" he suggests, glaring at me.

"The girl can hear you!" our daughter reminds him.

"Why aren't you making new friends?" I ask her quite nicely.

"Because you never ever, ever allow me to invite people over," she replies.

"Of course not," I say, "but why aren't they inviting you to their homes? Know what? Tomorrow I'm coming to school with you," I tell her, as I watch her brother leaving the room laughing hysterically (yeah, I helped him once, too).

The next morning, the little one and I are standing at the playground. I spot two girls who look her age. "Look at those sweet girls!" I holler. "Bet they're just dying to meet you – you're such a beautiful, smart little girl!"

I approach them assertively. They look at us with no interest, so I try to grab one of them by the arm. They run away screaming. "Idiots," I say, to explain the situation to my daughter.

I try another group or two, until a scary bully (by Grade 6 standards, at least!) politely asks me to clear the way. Another girl asks me to leave. "You're not helping, Mom," my daughter murmurs.

I leave and then return at recess. I find the girl outside the library, pull at her sleeve, put her next to a group of kids and order her to mingle. The girl leans toward them, but at the last minute she makes an interesting turn to a tree.

"Leave it to me," says Meir that night, as I cry in his arms. "I have an idea."

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

Early next morning, he buys tons of chocolate candies and takes them, along with the girl, to school. At noon, I get a call from him. He promises everything is under control, and that the girl has lots of friends. Tons of them.

In the evening, I get another call, this time from a frightened school principal, who says, "Parents and students have been informing us during the day that a suspicious-looking man, tall and dark, a pervert, probably, is giving away chocolate candies to kids in the playground. He's smiling and flattering them, and lord knows what else. Please don't panic, the police are already involved. A description of him has been already been made public."

So if you're wondering about the new moustache Meir is growing, wonder no more.

LACY POTATO LATKES

4 lg potatoes, peeled
1 lg onion quartered
1 egg, lightly beaten
1/4 c flour
3/4 tsp salt
1/2 tsp baking powder
1/4 tsp pepper
2 c vegetable oil

Using food processor, alternately shred potatoes and onion quarters. Place in colander; squeeze out as much liquid as possible; discard liquid. Working quickly so potatoes don't brown, in large bowl stir together potato mixture, egg, flour, salt, baking powder and pepper.

In large skillet, pour in ½" oil; heat over medium-high heat. For each latke, spoon 1 ¼ potato mixture into oil, pressing down lightly with fork to flatten, and leaving about 1" between latkes. Fry, turning once, until golden brown, crispy on outside and cooked through, 5-6 min. Transfer to paper towel-lined baking sheet.

Make-ahead: Reduce cooking time by 30 sec; transfer to racks. Let cool; cover lightly with paper towels. Set aside for up to 2 hrs. Remove paper towels, place racks on baking sheet, bake in 350°F oven until crisp and hot, about 10 min.

Prinz-Albrecht Strasse, a major thoroughfare in pre-World War II Berlin, was the epicentre of an evil empire, housing the headquarters of the SS and the Gestapo, the principal institutions of Nazi repression during the 12-year Third Reich. On this street today is an important museum about the Nazi era, The Topography of Terror.

A four-decade brotherhood

When I was young, it was strange to hear that two people had been friends for almost half a century. Now that I'm 51 and have had a friend for the last 42 years, it's not so difficult to understand this lengthy passing of time and how I am part of it.

My friend is David Nefesh and he lives in Detroit.

On the weekend of Oct. 28, I drove 4-1/2 hours to visit him.

Normally, David drives from Michigan to spend time with me and other Toronto friends.

It was clear, however, that it was time for me to make the trek to hang with David on his own turf.

For those of you who have a longtime friend in another city, you'll understand how a weekend like this works. The basic idea is to cram as much as you can into hanging time, go to bed late, if at all, and catch up on everything about the other person's life – past and present.

David and I, therefore, talked about our younger days in Camp Gan Israel in Fenton, Mich. We reviewed how a few years later we spotted each other in the beit hamidrash of Ner Israel Yeshiva College. I called, "Hey Detroit" and he replied, "Hey Kitchener" and we rekindled our friendship.

We shmoozed about our studies in Jerusalem a while later and how we drank a whole lot of café ha'uch and smoked Time cigarettes that year. Those were glorious Stand by Me memories.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

On Saturday night, David invited a lovely friend, Cheryl, over to his new home in Berkley. David is a singer/songwriter extraordinary and the three of us sang his songs and kibbitzed about being parents and the travails of life (a common and intense practice among 50-year-olds).

The morning after, we visited David's parents, Manny and Bessie, in Southfield. It had been many years since I had spent time with them, and I took the opportunity to unleash my obsessive curiosity.

I asked his father about the Gemara (Talmud) Babba Batra he had recently received from his other son, who had travelled to his shtetl in Czechoslovakia.

The Gemara was the one Manny had used as a boy in yeshiva. It had a heart pasted on the front cover. Manny didn't remember the source of the heart.

I asked Bessie about the perennials she had planted years before and the great joy she got from watching them grow. I asked her what it was like to be a partner in creating 77 descendants – a grand success, as she and Manny had survived the Holocaust.

They are David's parents, and our discussion intensified my love for my friend.

David gave me a tour of Detroit's once-majestic downtown, where they are creating farms in place of housing developments. We stopped in front of the empty grassy field where the Detroit Tigers played baseball and Ty Cobb set 90 major league records.

David and I enjoyed Leo's chili dogs and cinnamon buns from Zeman's Bakery. We snapped pictures of each other in front of the Motown Museum and got a glimpse of the Joe Louis sculptured fist hanging proudly near the waterfront.

We have been friends since 1969. Somewhere along the road, David and I became family.

This weekend reunited us. I look forward to another 43 years of friendship with my brother David. It was fine.

New virus attacks Iran's nuke program

Iranian missile expert dies in mysterious explosion

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran has acknowledged for the first time that it was the target of a new computer virus designed to do damage to its computers.

The admission was made by Iran's civil defence chief, Gen. Gholam Reza Jalali, who told Fars, the official Iranian news agency, that computer experts were able to identify the virus called Duqu and bring it under control. The Iranians, Jalali said, developed software capable of controlling the virus, and a special unit that works to defend the country against cyber attacks has been working around the clock.

The Duqu virus was discovered by the Iranians about a month ago, after it had affected dozens of countries, including Iran, France, Britain and India. The virus was reported by the American computer security firm Symantec. It exploits a hitherto unknown weakness in the Microsoft Windows computer operating system.

Toronto judge joins Supreme Court

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Michael Moldaver and Andromache Karakatsanis, the two most recent additions to the Supreme Court of Canada, were welcomed to the High Court in a ceremony earlier this week.

With the appointment of Moldaver, the number of Jewish justices on Canada's highest judicial body reaches four.

Moldaver will join Rosalie Abella, Morris Fish and Marshall Rothstein on the nine-justice court – an unprecedented number of Jewish judges, and more than even in the United States, which currently has three on its Supreme Court.

"Justice Karakatsanis' and Justice Moldaver's candidacies were examined through a comprehensive process," Prime Minister Stephen Harper said in a release. "Madam Justice Karakatsanis and Mr. Justice Moldaver are exceptional candidates who have the skills and qualifications necessary to serve Canadians as judges of the Supreme Court of Canada."

Both judges were recruited from the Ontario Court of Appeal and fill Ontario's allotment of justices to the High Court.

Moldaver is a well-respected justice whose expertise in criminal law makes him a valuable addition to the court, said Liberal MP and former Canadian justice minister Irwin Cotler.

Galilee Boats Arrive

TORONTO — Six dragon boats arrived on the shores of the Sea of Galilee Nov. 13 in preparation for a training session for next May's first Dragon Boat Israel competition. The racing event, an initiative of UIA Federations Canada, will be held May 17 and 18, and this week's training event included two experts from North America training Israeli steer people on the boats. Organizers expect 40 boats of 20 rowers each for the competition in May. As of last week, the event only had room for six more boats. A media event held Nov. 17 on the shores of the Galilee marked the end of the training week, and featured 100 volunteers, mayors and the Dragon Boat Israel executive and steering committees from Israel and Canada.

WORLD

Funds Pledged

BERLIN — The family that owns BMW has pledged nearly $7 million to memorialize forced labourers in Nazi Germany. The Quandt family has admitted to using slave labour in World War II. An estimated 50,000 forced labourers, including Jews from Nazi camps, worked in the factories of industrialist Guenther Quandt producing arms for the Nazis, according to a study commissioned by the family. He's also accused of taking over Jewish-owned firms during the war, with the Nazis' blessing. He became a Nazi party member in May 1933. He died in 1954. The family bought shares in BMW 15 years after the war and still owns a majority stake in the luxury carmaker.

New Shul Study

NEW YORK — A new study by Yeshiva University found a correlation between regular attendance at religious services and an optimistic outlook. The study, to be published this week in the Journal of Religion and Health, examined data from 92,539 postmenopausal women who were participating in the Women's Health Initiative Observational Study. It found 56 per cent of those who attended services frequently have a more optimistic life outlook than those who do not and 27 per cent were less likely to be depressed. As well, 54 per cent of regular attendees said they have strong social support. It also found that those who attend services regularly were less likely to be characterized by cynical hostility. "There is a correlation, but that does not mean there is causality," said Eliezer Schnall, the YU clinical associate professor who led the study. "One could argue people who are more optimistic may be drawn to religious services." Schnall also said that the findings may not apply to younger people or men, because the study only focused on older women. In 2008, Schnall led a study that found those attending services regularly had a lower mortality rate during the time they were being studied.

Penn State President Fired Over Scandal

NEW YORK — The president of Pennsylvania State University was removed from his post in the wake of a child sex-abuse scandal involving a former football coach at the university.

Graham Spanier

Graham Spanier, who is Jewish and according to the Daily Collegian was active at the Penn State Hillel, was relieved of his duties Nov. 9 by the school's board of trustees. He served as the university's president for 16 years.

Along with Spanier, Penn State's iconic head football coach, Joe Paterno, was fired in the aftermath of the scandal involving Jerry Sandusky, a former assistant football coach at the school who has been charged with sexually abusing eight boys over a 15-year span. Neither Spanier nor Paterno have been charged in the case.

"This university is a large and complex institution, and although I have always acted honourably and in the best interest of the university, the buck stops here," Spanier said in a statement. "In this situation, I believe it is in the best interest of the university to give my successor a clear path to resolve the issue before us."

Jewish war memorial unveiled on 11-11-11

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

Long before the solemn moment, the tears were evident everywhere.

Emotion is to be expected on Remembrance Day.

But there was a significant event on the 11th hour of the 11th day of the 11th month that added to the annual observance for those who died in the line of duty.

It was the official dedication of a monument honouring Canadian Jewish war veterans, some 570 names of those who died in battle during World War I and II, as well as the Korean War.

An overflow crowd, estimated to be in excess of 500 people – from veterans and their families to dignitaries and others who showed up to offer their respect and appreciation – jammed the Lipa Green Centre's main hall while others listened in another room via an audio feed.

About 12 years in the making, and despite setbacks caused by overly ambitious plans, administrative issues and financial shortfalls, the dream of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Toronto Post, finally became a reality.

Situated on the grounds of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Sherman Campus on Bathurst Street north of Sheppard Avenue, an eight-foot-long black marble structure with large granite rocks on both sides now memorializes those who gave their lives in battle.

Each was a human being

Although much is hidden in Richard Zimler's most recent novel, The Warsaw Anagrams, its essential core, its deeply purposeful message is not. Indeed he waves it before our eyes on the page before the Preface like a banner snapping in cold wind. Jarring our focus to the sole, plaintive line, he snares our attention and our company for the ensuing "difficult" literary journey.

"We owe uniqueness to our dead at the very least." (Erik Cohen)

From the editor's desk...

And thus, even before the first chapter begins, we have been introduced to the novel's key narrator, Erik Cohen. And we have been told why the narrative is so vital – it helps us understand profoundly that each victim of the Nazi atrocities, of every atrocity, was a living, loving, sentient, significant individual – although we have not yet felt its full impact.

Zimler is a superior writer. He has proven that to countless grateful and inspired readers around the world through his previous masterful works. The Warsaw Anagrams is his eighth novel. And like previous works, one of the most notable of which is The Last Kabbalist of Lisbon, his latest has already received accolades, awards and distinctions throughout Europe. The Warsaw Anagrams was named the book of the year in 2010 in Portugal where Zimler lives.

Thoughtful, respectful writers and readers of Holocaust-related stories always tread carefully and warily toward their subject. Given the subject, there is no choice.

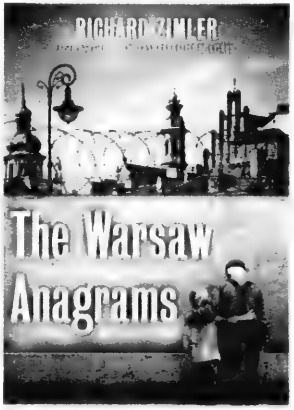
Zimler is no exception. His deference is evident from the page of dedication and acknowledgments.

But his deference has not deflected him from the sharply piercing insights he has recorded, from the multi-levelled architecture of the story, nor from the unsentimental, tightly written, spare, straightforward manner of his prose.

The story is centred in the Warsaw Ghetto in 1940-41. But it tells us more than one tale.

There is a tale of serial murder of children in the ghetto: chilling, detestable, abhorrent, grisly and grotesque. The narrator recounts his determination to find, unmask and bring the perpetrator to justice.

I describe no details of the murders, for the tale of the murders, told to frightening effect with intense, white-knuckle drama, is really but a vehicle by which Zimler takes us into the ghetto, as if we were passengers on an unsteady, yawing ship tossing painfully, tearfully, frighteningly in treacherous black waters.



There is thus also the tale of the life in the Warsaw Ghetto: chilling, detestable, abhorrent, grisly and grotesque. With impeccable loyalty to historical detail, Zimler imagines day-to-day life for the handful of characters he has created, coping with the terror of the murders within the terror of their Nazi imprisonment. At one point, the narrator asks himself: "We were back in the Middle Ages and the Nazis had dragged us there – which meant that the question we now needed to ask was: how far back in time would be enough for them?"

The very title of the book hints, too, at the devices of concealment and mystery that are at the heart of Zimler's haunting story. The anagrams refer to the twisting around of the letters of peoples' names in order to camouflage their true identities. But, of course, the melancholy of the fate of most of the ghetto inmates was that they could escape neither their identities nor their ultimate destinies.

I also provide no details concerning the narrator. Such details, along with the many horrific ones of the murders, are pieces that the reader must assemble. As the narrator, Erik Cohen, at one very sad point in the novel notes, there are no certainties.

"While gazing at myself in the real mirror in the bathroom, I repeated that small incitement to life over and over, but in truth I seemed to be just a vessel for one more breath and then another, an instant in time receding towards a quiet so deep it would never end.

"Our thoughts don't make us alive. Something else does. But what?

"The ghetto taught me to ask that question but never gave me the answer.

"If you want certainties, then I'm afraid you'll have to read about a different time and place. And different men and women. In Warsaw in 1941 we had none to give you."

We may not yet know the names of all who were killed in the Holocaust. Richard Zimler, however, helps us understand that, whatever their names, each victim was uniquely imprinted with the distinction of God's image. Each was an irreplaceable human being.

The Warsaw Anagrams is an exceptionally moving book.

Former Tory leader to be honoured by JNF

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Former Ontario Progressive Conservative Party leader and current talk-radio host John Tory is being honoured this weekend as the Jewish National Fund of Toronto's 2011 Negev Dinner honoree.

Tory, who ran for premier in 2007 on a platform that would have included allocating funds to Jewish and other faith-based schools, said he was "very flattered" by the JNF's request that he be this year's honoree.

John Tory

"I've been very fortunate as a community servant, business leader and as a politician to establish wonderful friendships with a whole lot of communities across Ontario, including the Jewish community," he told The CJN in a phone interview last week.

The JNF's annual dinner raises funds for various ongoing projects in Israel that it asks honorees to choose from.

Tory chose to direct funds from this year's dinner toward ALUT, the Israeli Society for Autistic Children, which has built 16 residential homes in Israel for autistic children and young adults.

Specifically, Tory will dedicate the money to the creation of the John A. Tory Memorial Autism Therapy Garden, in memory of his father, John A. Tory, who passed away earlier this year.

The garden, to be situated in ALUT's soon-to-be-built "home for life" in the Iris Village in Be'er Sheva, will help create "a restorative green environment" for the home's many residents, according to the organization.

"I have had a particular interest in autism since becoming a politician," Tory said.

He always read about the condition, but never realized how autism affected families. However, once he was elected to Queen's Park as the leader of the official opposition, he heard a fellow MPP – NDPer Shelley Martel – speak passionately about the need to help young people with autism in Ontrio.

As a result, Tory said, he started visiting autism treatment centres and families of children with autism, and became convinced the province needed to "do more" to help them.

"So when [JNF] presented this project as an option to me, I was very impressed that in Israel they have these residential facilities [via ALUT]. We don't have the equivalent here to any significant extent," he said.

Tory said the garden allowed him to pay tribute to his father, who he said led "an exemplary life helping others."

He said he's promised the JNF that he will go see the project in Israel in the near future.

JNF Toronto said it chose to honour Tory this year because of all the work he's done with the Jewish community in the province, and because of his interest in Israel.

Josh Cooper, president of JNF Toronto, said Tory has been "an outstanding and outspoken" friend of the Jewish community for many years.

"He's always supported the community personally, professionally, emotionally and financially. He's someone who we all felt was worthy of receiving this honour," Cooper said.

He noted that Tory has attended numerous JNF events over the years and has supported the organization for a long time. He added that Tory also made a "very generous" donation toward this year's dinner.

The 2011 JNF Toronto Negev Dinner takes place this Sunday, Nov. 20, at the Fairmount Royal York Hotel.

Archeology politicization common in Mideast

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Zionists have been accused of politicizing archeology, but that critique is hardly unique to the Jews, according to a prominent Israeli archeologist teaching in Toronto.

Archeology is "a very political science," acknowledged Dan Bahat, who is teaching several courses as a visiting professor at the University of Toronto. "Everyone wants to show his sources in the country and uses archeology as an excuse." Criticism of that practice, often levelled at Jews digging in Israel, is just as applicable to Egypt and Turkey, as those governments attempt to solidify their attachment to the land, he said.

Bahat is a distinguished and colourful archeologist with a particular interest in Jerusalem. He excavated the Western Wall tunnel that runs 1,600 feet alongside the ancient Jewish temple's retaining wall. He recently presented the first annual memorial lecture for Larry Levenstein at the Shaarei Shomayim synagogue on the subject of archeology and Zionism. Levenstein was an ancient Judaica and archeology buff.

Bahat suggested the governments of Egypt and Turkey use archeology to give them greater legitimacy and link them to ancient inhabitants of the land. Contemporary Turkish archeologists are excavating Hittite sites, but the Hittites were an Indo-European people who create an empire in the Bronze Age, about 4,000 years ago. The modern inhabitants of Turkey have no ethnic or linguistic connection to the Hittites, Bahat said.

They originated in the steppes of Asia – today's Uzbekistan, Tajikistan and Kazakhstan. The Turkish invasion of modern day Turkey is well documented, going back to the Seljuks in the 11th century and the Ottomans a few hundred years later.

In Egypt, the government attempts to draw connections between current residents and the people of Pharaonic Egypt, Bahat said.

"But today's Egyptians are not descendants of Pharaonic Egypt. Those are the Copts, and I don't have to tell you what they're doing to the Copts," he said.

The politicization of archeology and ancient history was a tactic undertaken by Yasser Arafat, Bahat continued. He made the "childish" claim that Palestinians were descendants of the Canaanites. Post-Oslo, the Palestinians staged a performance in Samaria claiming they were returning home. "It was a nice Purim," he said with derision.

In neighbouring Jordan and Syria, the biblical Moab, Western archeologists have been asked by local authorities not to refer their findings to the Bible, he said.

"Zionists also use archeology as a tool right to today," he said. "Every synagogue, ritual bath we discovered is important for us. To this very day every Israeli archeologist wants to find a new synagogue in his lifetime."

Bahat accomplished the feat in 1972, when he unearthed a house of prayer in Beit Shean. He also found evidence that a passage in the Gemarah, part of the Talmud, was corroborated in ancient stone.

The Gemarah, he said, asserts that people from Beit Shean, Tivon and other communities should not be called to read the Torah, as they cannot distinguish between the Hebrew letters aleph and ayin, and heh and chet.

"That's what I found in an inscription there," he said. The letters were mixed up and used improperly.

Bahat, who served as chief archeologist of the Jerusalem Region for the Israel Antiquities Authority, said excavations in Jerusalem can be traced back to the 19th century, but Jews didn't join the effort until just before World War I. "Intellectual Jews from France decided Jews should dig the place," he said. "The result was an excavation initiated by French Jews and for the work they took Raymond Weill, financed by Baron Rothschild."

The results were an impressive list of findings, including Hezekiah's tunnel and other water installations, "possibly royal tombs of the Davidic dynasty and ...a lot of excavations showing a Jewish connection to the city."

Archeology continues in Jerusalem with "a lot of excavations" demonstrating a Jewish connection to the city.

"Today," he continued, "we are completely objective and we dig with the same joy an Arab monument as a Christian or Jewish monument."

Why the change? "It started with the foundations of the state, because we achieved what we wanted."

A statement by Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, calling Israel the land of Mohammad and Jesus and denying Jews' ancient ties "are part of their effort to deny the Jewish rights to the country," Bahat said.

However, recent finds just add to the evidence of an ancient Jewish presence. A drainage ditch has been found dating back to Herodian times (2,000 years ago) along with cisterns that go back to the First Temple Period (3,000-2,500 years ago).

The warying taste of the French kiss

There were more ups and downs in France-Israel relations last week than a loopy roller-coaster. The disorienting spinning began with the vote by the French government supporting the application of the Palestinian Authority for full state membership in UNESCO.

Merely days later at the G20 summit, there was the behind-the-scenes, off-camera, but on-mike, gratuitous aspersion by French President Nicolas Sarkozy expressed to U.S. President Barack Obama, calling Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "a liar." Netanyahu's office offered no comment. But the embarrassment to Sarkozy was palpable.

In an obvious attempt to mitigate the discomfiture, Sarkozy told a delegation from the World Jewish Congress visiting the very next day that "France will always stand side by side with Israel against an Iran that threatens it by developing nuclear weapons." According to a JTA report, Sarkozy also added that Israel had no better security partner than his government but warned of unilateral actions by Israel against the regime in Tehran.

Later in the week, Ynetnews reported that the French government had issued a temporary passport to a dual French-Israeli citizen and listed the residence of the passport holder as the "Occupied Palestinian Territory." The individual lives in Ma'aleh Adumim, a community of nearly 40,000 people on the northeastern outskirts of Jerusalem. Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman was reported to be sending his French counterpart a letter of protest, demanding that France remove the words "Occupied Palestinian Territory."

As in relations between individuals, so too between countries: what matters are deeds, not rhetoric. Thus, Sarkozy's incontinent remark about the Israeli prime minister, though undignified and callow, is a temporary public relations blemish against the French leader. For the same reason, Sarkozy's platitudes about standing side by side with Israel against Iran are merely meaningless banal bromides. It can only be measured against the strong, true light of his government's actions, such as his decisions at UNESCO and in the offices of the French foreign ministry.

Both were harmful to Israel. The UNESCO vote adds to Israel's isolation and pushes it further into a legal and diplomatic corner. The passport designation prejudges, to Israel's detriment, one of the core issues regarding the disputed territory that was taken back from Jordan in the Six Day War nearly 45 years ago. There were no ambiguities or nuances in the French behaviour.

Sarkozy's profuse proclamations of support for Israel are tempered by the legendary reputation of the French kiss. It tantalizes, to be sure, but it also leaves behind a warying taste that betrays affection and lingers.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israel denied reports it had supplied weapons and spare parts to Iran as part of a U.S.-Israel-Iran arms triangle. The denial came as U.S. president Ronald Reagan defended the controversial arms deal as being part of an attempted strategic rapprochement with the anti-American regime in Tehran.

Wears poppy proudly

I was certainly touched by the beautiful tribute to the Canadians who have lost their lives while serving in Afghanistan ("Remembrance," Nov. 10). The list of names brought tears to my eyes. So often, our community tends to be isolationist, thinking only of the welfare of our "tribe," but we must give thanks to all who have fought and those who continue to do so to defend this wonderful land of Canada. I wear my poppy proudly. We will remember! They will not be forgotten!

Survivors' vigilantism

The article "Revenge and justice in postwar Germany" (Nov. 10) made me sad and confused. A quarter-million Nazis did the atrocities against the Jews, and the justice system at the time couldn't handle that many culprits. So the odd survivors' vigilantism is not equivalent to vigilantism here and now, where the justice system can handle the criminals. The survivors did not set fire to any German forests and wheat fields, which would have been easy for them to do. Any other group would have done far more and worse revenge acts. As this Holocaust Education Week presentation took place downtown at lunchtime, there were many non-Jews present. This negative press is not what we need as dark clouds are gathering.

Israel's public relations

Bravo to Murray Teitel for his spot-on article "Reversing the Israeli public relations disaster" (Oct. 10). I cringe at every Israeli public relations attempt, when some spokesperson humbly articulates reasons why Jews should not be killed, while Israel's enemies howl indignantly. Teitel puts it out there that fire is best fought with fire in the public relations arena, as Israel is getting burned. His article supporting the notion that the Israeli government should get over its arrogance and learn how to turn public relations into a useful tool, by responding to Israel's critics with a verbal attack, will make all of our roles in the Diaspora easier in supporting Israel socially, politically and financially.

Free Jonathan Pollard

Now that Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit has been freed after being kidnapped and held for five years by Hamas, albeit for a heavy price, Israel can devote its attention toward obtaining the release of another long-imprisoned and almost-forgotten Israeli, Jonathan Pollard. Pollard is the Jewish-American, U.S. Navy civilian analyst who has already served 26 years of an unprecedented life sentence behind bars in the United States for spying. Israel should now do its utmost in beseeching U.S. President Barack Obama, on compassionate grounds, to either pardon Pollard and/or commute his life sentence to time already served.

Peace camp

In the summer of 2010, I went to a camp called Kids 4 Peace in Toronto. The camp included 12 kids from Israel and 12 kids from Canada – four Jewish, four Christian and four Muslim from each country. During the 10 days of the camp, we went on trips to a synagogue, a church and a mosque, and we learned about one another's cultures. I've grown up in the Jewish community, and I attend Jewish day school and go to synagogue weekly. Most of my friends are Jewish. Before Kids 4 Peace, I had never met or talked to a Muslim and was in favour of peace, but I still thought of Muslims differently than I would someone Christian or Jewish.

You may say that your child knows all about many different cultures, but do they really? Have they ever spoken to someone who is Muslim or Hindu? In school, do they learn about the minority that are terrorists, or the innocent civilians? I most certainly hadn't. During my time at camp, I made the most incredible friendships. It was a camp experience I will never forget.

Now that Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit has finally been released, it is even more important to remember that although there are many terrorists, there are still many civilians who are looked on as terrorists because of their background. I wanted to get the message out there, because peace is not just a fantasy. It is real, but it will never happen if we don't try. Kids 4 Peace was my wake-up call.

Why does oil-rich Iran need nuclear fuel?

Dore Gold

The dramatic November 2011 report of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) comes after years that the agency has come close to concluding that Iran is seeking nuclear weapons without saying so explicitly. Since the Iranian nuclear program was first disclosed to the public in 2002, there have been growing suspicions that it had a military purpose, but no one could offer any definitive proof.

Many analysts asked why Iran, which had huge oil and gas reserves, needs to invest in a program to produce electricity from nuclear reactors? Iran could have used its budgetary resources more effectively if it had invested them in its oil production infrastructure. Analysts also asked why Iran needed to build a huge infrastructure at Natanz to enrich uranium for nuclear reactors that it didn't even have. After all, Russia had promised to supply enriched uranium for the sole reactor at Bushehr that it constructed specifically for the purpose of producing electricity.

Moreover, many countries with nuclear reactors imported enriched uranium. Why was Iran building an expensive uranium enrichment industry for itself? The limited size of the deposits in Iran's uranium mines was too small for producing nuclear fuel for all of Iran's electricity needs; Iran would have to import uranium in the future in any case. Finally, the question remained, why did it keep this industry secret if it only had civilian applications? Iran was forced to disclose its uranium enrichment facilities (as well as its heavy water reactor at Arak) because others made them public in the West in 2002 and again in 2009.

While France already in 2006 accused Iran of developing a nuclear weapons program, Iran continued to make the case that its nuclear work had only civilian applications. Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov would always demand that his colleagues in the UN Security Council provide him with the proof that Iran had a military program. In the meantime, Russia and China always defended Iran in the Security Council and sought to water down the six resolutions the council adopted against Tehran.

The United States discovered proof of the Iranian nuclear program in 2004. Former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton describes in his memoirs how secretary of state Colin Powell decided to reveal that he had seen new American intelligence about Iranian efforts to fit a nuclear weapon into the warhead of a missile. But in the years that followed, the credibility of the United States to convince the world that Iran indeed wanted nuclear weapons was impaired when the Bush administration argued that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction and none were found.

The importance of the reports of the IAEA grew partly because of how the assessments of the United States were perceived in international circles after the Iraq War. The IAEA argued right up to 2003 that Saddam no longer had weapons of mass destruction. If the IAEA would give "hawkish" assessments on Iran, then the world might listen.

A critical turning point in the IAEA's attitude to Iran occurred in February 2008 when its deputy director general, Ollie Heinonen, gave a briefing to representatives of more than 100 countries. According to the New York Times, Heinonen displayed Iranian documents that he stressed came from several member states of the IAEA – and not just from the U.S. Der Spiegel reported in June 2010 that the material came from a joint operation by German and American intelligence agencies that got hold of an Iranian engineer's computer.

The IAEA had the international standing to authenticate U.S. intelligence reports for those who doubted their veracity. When the IAEA said they were true, many more countries were willing to accept them. Sanger wrote that he believed that Heinonen hoped his classified briefing would leak – and it did.

The Iranian documents detailed how to design a warhead for the 1,300-kilometre-range Shahab-3 missile, which had been operational in the Iranian armed forces since 2003. While the Iranian documents made no reference to a nuclear warhead, they did show the arc of a missile's flight and that the warhead of the missile had to be detonated at an altitude of 600 metres. To the experts of the IAEA, a conventional explosion at that altitude would have no effect on the ground below. But 600 metres is the ideal altitude for a nuclear explosion over a city. Heinonen did not yet say that the Iranians were making nuclear weapons, but he left his audience in Vienna with many questions they were not asking before.

By May 2011, the IAEA had become far more explicit in its report on Iran than Heinonen had been. It raised its concerns about the "possible existence" of seven areas of military research in the Iranian nuclear program, the last of which was the most alarming: "The removal of the conventional high-explosive payload from the warhead of the Shahab-3 missile and replacing it with a spherical nuclear payload." The Shahab-3 missile has the range to strike Israel from Iranian territory. In May, the IAEA was not ready to say it had reached any conclusions. It only sought "clarifications" about its suspicions.

The November 2011 IAEA report showed that the IAEA no longer had "suspicions" about the Iranian weaponization program – it had what it called "credible" information. The annex of the report, moreover, devotes a whole section to the "credibility of information." It was not relying on the Iranian laptop that was at the heart of Heinonen's 2008 presentation, but also on a much larger volume of documentation. The IAEA report states that the agency had more than 1,000 pages of material to substantiate its claims. In case there were suspicions that this material came from U.S. intelligence agencies alone, the annex makes sure to clarify that the sources for the IAEA involved "more than 10 member states."

The material that the IAEA presented pointed clearly to the fact that Iran wanted to develop a deliverable nuclear weapon. There was documentation in Farsi detailing the safety arrangements that would have to be put in place for conducting a nuclear test.

The Iranians had also sought to obtain uranium for a secret enrichment program that would not be under IAEA safeguards. The uranium that would come out of this clandestine program would be further processed to produce the uranium metal required for a nuclear warhead. The planned warhead design also underwent studies that investigated how it would operate if it was part of a missile re-entry vehicle and had to stand up to the stress of a missile launch and flying in a ballistic trajectory to its target. The IAEA concluded that "work on the development of an indigenous design of a nuclear weapon including the testing of components" had been executed by the Iranians. That "indigenous design," however, required external help. The IAEA report discloses that aspects of Iran's nuclear weapons "design concept" came from a foreign country, presumably from a nuclear-weapon state.

Third, the IAEA report provided further proof that Iran's inventory of enriched uranium was continuing to grow despite the reported damage caused to Iran's centrifuges. If Iran had 839 kilograms of low-enriched uranium, according to the June 2009 IAEA report, it had 2,427 kilograms according to the May 2010 IAEA report. In September 2011, the IAEA report stated that Iran had enriched a total of 4,543 kilograms of low-enriched uranium. The November report put that number at 4,922 kilograms. If all Iran requires is a little over 900 kilograms of low-enriched uranium to produce sufficient weapons-grade uranium for a single bomb, then Iran already has enough uranium on hand for at least four or five nuclear bombs, should it decide to further enrich its stock of low-enriched uranium. Iran's smaller stock of 20 per cent enriched uranium also continued to grow, albeit in smaller quantities.

Finally, it is important to recall when reviewing this information that at the end of 2007, the United States published the "key judgments" of its National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iran. That document asserted with "high confidence" that Iran had halted the weaponization component of its nuclear program back in 2003. The November 2011 IAEA report shows how wrong the 2007 NIE document was. The later report specifically says, "Some activities relevant to the development of a nuclear explosive device continued after 2003, and that some may be ongoing."

The November 2011 IAEA report provides the details for what the agency has long suspected – that Iran is determined to obtain nuclear weapons and the means to deliver them to target.

Roughly five years have passed since the UN Security Council took up the Iranian nuclear issue and adopted its first resolution demanding that Tehran halt its uranium enrichment program. The new IAEA report should be used to ratchet up the sanctions on Iran. But it is doubtful that even with this new information, there will be a sufficient consensus at the Security Council for decisive measures that might cause Iran to change the course it has decided upon.

Cut in defence spending is a leap of faith

Public debate rages in Israel about statements made by influential government ministers and the erstwhile head of the Mossad concerning which measures, military or diplomatic, should or shouldn't be used to thwart Iran's nuclear weapon aspirations.

Minister-without-portfolio Benny Begin declared that public discussion of a possible Israeli strike on Iran was "utterly irresponsible," "madness" that "severely impedes the government's ability to make decisions" on the matter.

Conversely, retired Maj.-Gen. Giora Eiland, a highly respected former head of the National Security Council, noted that public discourse about a topic Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has declared as most important for the State of Israel is only natural.

Some things are certain. The threat of a nuclear Iran is increasingly ominous, and the world continues to sits idly by, making faltering gestures toward the Islamic Republic, which simply ignores them and plows implacably on.

This debate takes place while another related spat brews. Every fall, Israelis endure squabbles between our Finance and Defence ministries about the latter's share of Israel's annual budget, which is always the largest slice of the pie. Finance wants it reduced, while Defence wants it raised.

Annually, Finance makes public its displeasure with what it perceives as a lack of efficient management of the military's huge appropriations, adding that the thousands of men and women who choose professional military careers are overpaid, especially as they're allowed early retirement, much earlier than other public and private sector employees.

During these yearly wrangles, the Defence Ministry

Yair Lootsteen

explains the myriad security challenges Israel faces, saying the IDF has made effective cuts in manpower in the last decade and is constantly streamlining, and that the officers and NCOs who choose to make the military their vocation – sacrificing much personally in so doing – are its backbone.

This yearly Finance-Defence tango usually ends with an increase in the defence budget. However, examination of Finance Ministry stats reveals an almost constant drop in Defence's share of the entire budget during the past decade. In 2000, the defence budget accounted for roughly 16.5 per cent of the national budget. This year, it dropped to 14.8 per cent and was expected to hit 14.5 per cent next year.

And new players recently entered this fray. In the wake of this summer's massive social justice protests for fundamental changes in societal priorities, Netanyahu appointed a commission, headed by Prof. Manuel Trajtenberg, to propose remedies to the demonstrators' demands.

In its report, the commission recommended a series of socioeconomic reforms (none of which have started to be implemented) to be funded in part by a three-billion-shekel a year reduction in defence spending. In 2012, the defence budget was expected to be 55.8 billion shekels (roughly $15.4 billion Cdn). The proposed cut, approved by the cabinet, will slash a whopping 5.5 per cent of the ministry's annual budget.

The defence establishment's reaction has been swift. Defence Minister Ehud Barak, who supports reforms but not on his ministry's account, has called for expanding the general budget deficit to allow both an increase in his ministry's budget and funds to implement Trajtenberg's recommendations.

IDF Chief of Staff, Lieut.-Gen. Benny Gantz was insulted by the cold shoulder he and his objections received from Netanyahu at the cabinet meeting where the recommendations were approved. He has since been expressing his concerns, and while not directly addressing the Iranian threat, he recently spoke of the anticipated IDF budget cuts, noting that "at this time, when the State of Israel's strategic map is as unstable and as complex as ever… the army has an operational, professional and moral responsibility to maintain preparedness for any challenge."

Israel's defence budget isn't sacrosanct, and the IDF doesn't operate in a vacuum. It should participate in changes aimed at making life better for all Israelis. Trajtenberg hit the nail on the head when he noted that despite the many security threats Israel is facing, the social security of its citizens is as important as its military might.

Kudos to Netanyahu and his government for taking this leap at a precarious time. Let's hope their intentions are sincere. There are many skeptics.

One last thing: peace with the Palestinians. Overlooked within the context of the current debates is the possibility that genuine peace might actually diminish the Iranian nuclear threat and support a real defence budget cut.

That might well be a pipe dream, however, and at present, neither side has leaders willing to sincerely advance that leap of faith.

Gilad Schalit and Israel's moral imperative

On Oct. 18, the world saw a shy and pale Israeli soldier – 19 years old when he was kidnapped by Hamas – returning to his family and country after more than five years of hell in Gaza, and miraculously maintaining his human spirit. On the other side, hundreds of Palestinian murderers were welcomed by cheering mobs as heroes after killing and maiming thousands of innocent Israelis, and then boasting of their heinous crimes.

Most viewers around the world were drawn to and identified with the Israeli captive returning home with dignity, including during a final act of mental torture at the hands of a callous Egyptian interviewer.

Looking at the other side of the frame, many were repelled by the sight of gleeful terrorists such as Ahlam Tamimi, the Palestinian woman who cold-bloodedly prepared and guided the bomber to Jerusalem's Sbarro pizza parlour in January 2001 and waited calmly for the explosion that murdered 16 people, including many children. Tamimi is a cold-blooded mass murderer who boasted about her "accomplishments" in television interviews from an Israeli jail after she was sentenced.

One Arab commentator noted: "Outside Palestine, people see us as a primitive community and a Third World country, full of gangsters and terrorists."

But among the dark parts of society, others – including self-proclaimed human rights activists, journalists, pundits, and academics claiming moral enlightenment – continued to turn their sympathy to the terrorists. CNN, the BBC, wire services and many newspapers ran stories focusing on the suffering of the Palestinian families while the murderers were in Israeli jails. They enjoyed regular visits, took university courses, and had Red Cross medical checks, while Schalit had none of these things. In these stories, the inhuman acts of the 1,027 released Palestinian prisoners and the stories of their victims were largely erased.

In this morally upside-down world, Israelis are automatically portrayed as evil, and Palestinians, however vile their actions, are embraced as victims. These warped images are so strongly ingrained, after decades of propaganda, that Schalit's quiet heroism made no lasting impression.

Palestinian propaganda groups, funded by European governments, and masquerading as human rights supporters, allied with Israel-based organizations associated with the "progressive and enlightened" New Israel Fund, were particularly active in this abuse. The group Gisha repeated the immoral equation between "the Schalit family and the families of the prisoners who will be released." Similarly, in a joint statement, Adalah and the Arab Association for Human Rights claimed that "the release of 1,027 Palestinian and Arab prisoners from Israeli prisons a positive step." Again, the terrorism and extortion were erased.

The standard excuse for this moral meltdown is "the Israeli occupation," as if Arab rejectionism, war and terrorism didn't exist before the 1967 war, and as if Israel, and not Arab leaders, maintained the status quo by refusing to negotiate seriously. This false history is used to justify the most evil acts of violence, turning victims into aggressors and war criminals into resistance heroes. After hearing this version repeatedly, it's not surprising that young Jews and even marginal Israelis subscribe to the myth that the "occupation" is the source of wars, terrorism and demonization.

This excuse was also provided by ethical "watchdogs" such as Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International and dozens of other groups. For the most part, these pseudo-human rights groups largely ignored the violation of Schalit's rights for 1,941 days. (Four years after he was kidnapped, both Amnesty and HRW belatedly made brief statements on his behalf, but only after being named and shamed by NGO Monitor.) And after Schalit's release, Amnesty issued another blatantly immoral and fact-free press release entitled "Israel-Hamas prisoner swap casts harsh light on detention practices of all sides."

Schalit, the quiet hero, must be allowed to recover in peace. But the contrasting images of the young Israeli soldier returning with dignity from captivity on one side exchanged for 1,027 unrepentant Palestinian murderers on the other cannot be allowed to disappear. This juxtaposition between celebrating life and celebrating death, and between morality and immorality, must remain as the symbol of Israel's ongoing struggle for justice in an unjust and immoral world.

Israel's war of nerves with Iran escalates

Reports emanating from Israel suggest that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak have tried to muster a majority in cabinet for a preemptive strike against Iran's nuclear facilities.

These accounts, augmented by a chilling warning from Israeli President Shimon Peres that Israel may soon take military action against Iran, came to light about a week before the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) issued a damning report on Nov. 8 accusing Iran of working to build a nuclear bomb.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Despite assertions that its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes only, Iran has itself fed speculation about its intentions.

Last June, Iran declared it is planning to triple the production of nuclear fuel, thereby bringing it ever closer to a technical ability to manufacture enriched weapons-grade uranium. And for years now, Iran has declined to answer questions from the IAEA about its weapons design capabilities. Further, in two rounds of fruitless talks with six world powers sponsored by the United Nations, Iran has steadfastly refused to discuss a suspension of its nuclear enrichment activities, saying that neither sanctions nor the threat of a military attack will deter it.

By all accounts, Iran is building a militarized nuclear program with the objective of achieving dominance in the Middle East. With an eye on its glorious past, Iran has imperial ambitions in the region, striving to surpass Israel, Turkey, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Syria in terms of influence.

But since Iran categorically rejects Israel's very existence, regularly calls for and predicts its destruction and fervently supports militant groups – Hezbollah and Hamas – at war with Israel, one must at least wonder whether the Iranian leadership would consider using a nuclear device to destroy the Jewish state.

Reports out of Israel suggesting that Netanyahu and Barak are in favour of hitting Iran's nuclear installations should be viewed within the context of Iran's hostility toward Israel and Israel's escalating war of nerves with Iran.

In these reports, Israel is not necessarily signalling its intentions to bomb these sites, though this could happen one day under the most extreme of circumstances. Israeli sabre-rattling notwithstanding, Israel knows that an attack on Iran carries profound risks and would probably not succeed in attaining all its objectives.

Iran's possession of thousands of homemade long-range missiles means that an Israeli attack would invite immediate and furious Iranian retaliation, as Iran's chief of staff warned recently.

The Iranian response would dwarf previous Iraqi, Hezbollah and Hamas missile attacks on Israel. Property damage would be devastating and the death toll would be fearsome. Israel would likely respond, setting off a long and ruinous regional war with unforeseen consequences.

In all probability, Hezbollah, if not Hamas, would be dragged into the conflict, sooner rather than later.

Though some Arab countries, notably Saudi Arabia, would secretly welcome an Israeli bombing campaign, it would seriously isolate Israel in the region and might even prompt pivotal countries – Egypt, Jordan and Turkey – to sever their existing diplomatic relations with Israel.

The bombing of Iran, which would doubtless increase the price of oil by a hefty margin, would not go down well in the United States – Israel's chief ally – the European Union or Russia or China, and would damage Israel's global standing.

At best, Israel could inflict only some damage on Iran's nuclear infrastructure, since it is spread out widely in a huge country and lies deep underground. Within about two years, Iran could regroup and recover, experts believe.

And finally, foreign intervention in Iran – a country that has been subjected to colonial machinations – would indubitably rally Iranian nationalist opinion around an Islamic regime that had no compunctions in crushing a popular uprising in 2009.

So why, in light of these compelling theoretical factors, have Netanyahu and Barak reportedly attempted to achieve a consensus in cabinet that Israel should reduce Iran's nuclear facilities to rubble?

Netanyahu – who has compared Iran to Nazi Germany and promised to eliminate Iran's nuclear arsenal – presumably realizes that attacking Iran would be akin to ripping open a hornet's nest. Indeed, the former director of the Mossad, Meir Dagan, has said it would be a "stupid thing" to do.

Israel has bombed Arab nuclear reactors in Iraq (1981) and Syria (2007), but they were relatively easy, cost-free targets to obliterate. One must assume that Netanyahu is using the threat of military action to bring pressure to bear on the international community to upgrade economic sanctions against Iran, or to induce the United States to do the job.

Two weeks ago, as Israeli pundits reported on Netanyahu's supposed plans, he declared that Iran should be the object of yet more "diplomatic pressure and sanctions." Last January, in a still more revealing comment that may be indicative of his thinking, Netanyahu said that while sanctions have hurt Iran, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, will not bend to global pressure "without a credible military option."

In other words, while Netanyahu wants to keep the potentially destabilizing military option on the table, he might be satisfied with tougher sanctions, which Israel's former Israeli chief of staff, Gen. Gadi Ashkenazi, recommended as the best possible outcome for now.

Condoleezza Rice, the former U.S. secretary of state, agrees with that assessment. Last week, she said that only continuous sanctions would dissuade Israel from attacking Iran, echoing an earlier remark by U.S. President Barack Obama of the need to maintain "unprecedented pressure on Iran." The United Nations has imposed four rounds of sanctions on Iran in an attempt to induce it to halt the production of enriched nuclear fuel. The European Union, the United States, Canada and other countries have followed suit.

According to U.S. Secretary of State

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

Hillary Clinton and the former American chief of staff, Admiral Mike Mullen, sanctions have had a discernible effect, having slowed down Iran's nuclear program. Sanctions have apparently cut into Iran's oil exports, squeezed Iran's access to financial markets and excluded Iran's shipping line from some foreign ports

Ahmadinejad claims that Iran's economy has not been affected by sanctions. True or not, Iran has used dummy companies, murky financial transactions and concealed shipping methods to circumvent the bite of sanctions. Apart from the regimen of sanctions, Iran's nuclear aspirations have been hobbled by other means.

The Stuxnet computer virus, a joint U.S.-Israeli venture, wiped out a fifth of Iran's centrifuges and set back its nuclear program by up to two years. Dagan believes that Iran will not be able to assemble an atomic device until 2015 at the earliest.

Assassins, perhaps Mossad operatives, have killed several Iranian nuclear scientists in broad daylight in Tehran. This, too, has had an impact.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khameini, however, has apparently not yet decided whether Iran should proceed with the next momentous step: manufacturing a deliverable bomb.

Although Iran is methodically working on this project, years may elapse before it becomes a nuclear power, like Israel.

But Israel does not want to wake up to learn that Iran has already acquired the atomic bomb.

Honorees recognized for community work

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Thornhill MP Peter Kent and Dr. Gideon Cohen, a cardiac and vascular surgeon, were honoured for their contribution to the Jewish community last week at the Sephardic Kehila Community Centre's first gala tribute dinner.

Hundreds of community members gathered at the Thornhill synagogue to pay tribute to Kent, Canada's environment minister who is often lauded for his pro-Israel stance, and Cohen, a surgeon at Sunnybrook Hospital's Schulich Heart Centre.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, delivered the keynote address, framing both the honorees as men who make extraordinary contributions to Canadian society and the Jewish community.

The centre's president, Max Benaim, said both Kent and Cohen "continuously surpass their expectations and are a testament to the values of loyalty and commitment."

Benaim commended Kent for being part of a government that has become a "moral compass of the international community, a beacon of hope, a light unto the nations when it comes to the vital importance of Israel's peace and security."

He compared Cohen to a "soldier on the battlefield [who] rails against the world's leading killer; heart disease, adding that "the chesed you perform and the manner in which you carry out your good works acts as an example to others."

Each honoree was treated to a surprise video tribute highlighting his accomplishments and contributions as well as good wishes from family and friends.

In a video message he prepared for Kent, Prime Minister Stephen Harper said, "Peter brings an unwavering personal commitment to the most fundamental values of our government: freedom, democracy and justice."

Supporting these principles is not an option, Harper added.

"It is not an option for Peter Kent, it is not an option for this government. It is a solid duty to support these values, and it is a duty that we embrace… because it is the right thing to do.

"You will find no stronger proponent of these fundamental principles that we share than Peter Kent."

Kent said he was pleased to share his honour with Harper's government, which protects human rights and stands with Israel – not always a popular stance, he acknowledged.

People often need to be reminded of the importance of democracy and how "long and hard we've struggled" to achieve it, he said.

Referring to Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit's kidnapping by Hamas in 2006, Kent said when our "brothers and sisters in Israel are kidnapped by the world's most dangerous terrorist and destructive regimes, it's because the enemy has refused to accept the idea that the Jewish state has a right to exist."

He said Canada's support for Israel is something "we will never apologize for."

Kent also condemned the decision to approve Palestinian membership to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

"Without a negotiated peace agreement with Israel, this is ultimately unhelpful at best and destructive to building trust and a future for peace," Kent said.

"Under no circumstances, and I can say this as a guarantee, will Canada be contributing more money to cover the significant budgetary shortfall that will result… because of that ill-considered decision."

Cohen's address emphasized his dependence on his family and friends, and downplayed his achievements, which include receiving the Charles H. Bryan Prize for Clinical Excellence in Thoracic and Cardiovascular Surgery, and performing the first port access mitral valve repair in Toronto.

Cohen, who jokingly labelled Kent "a better Jew than I am," said he is "truly proud to be part of this community and certainly proud of my Sephardic roots."

He explained that his father's Sephardi roots date back to 15th-century Spain.

"Back in the late 1400s, after the Spanish Inquisition, all the Jews were expelled, and many went to North Africa, including Morocco, they went to the Middle East, the Far East, and some, including my father's descendants, went directly from Spain to the land of Israel."

Cohen, who said he loves being a surgeon, thanked his parents, friends and family for keeping him grounded, and "reminding me that I'm not all that special."

Analyst sees rise of radical Islamists

Linked to uprisings throughout Arab world

Michelle Bitran
Intern

The future of the Middle East looks grim to Barry Rubin.

"We face an increasingly radical Islamist region, and that means some very nasty things in the months and years to come. Make no mistakes about it," Rubin, director of the Global Research in International Affairs Center at the Interdisciplinary Center Herzliya and editor of the journal Middle East Review of International Affairs, said in a lecture at Beth Tikvah Synagogue last Thursday evening.

Although Rubin called his assessment of the recent Arab uprisings "optimistic," he had many words of warning for the audience.

He said many of the revolutions are being portrayed by the newsmedia as being led by young, secular social media enthusiasts, but in reality, those people are often in the minority, and Islamist power is growing despite them.

"That's what we were told... that this is the triumph of democracy, that young people using Facebook and Twitter had toppled these regimes, and that everyone was going to live happily ever after," he said, adding that many western governments and people believe this story out of ignorance or wishful thinking.

Rubin pointed to Libya, Egypt, Tunisia, Turkey and Iran, among others, as examples of the spread of Islamism in the region. He explained that moderate groups in these countries tend to not be united or strong enough to lead. "If political Islam is ready to kill and intimidate people, and the moderates aren't, it gives [moderates] a disadvantage," he said.

Rubin told the audience that western policy has largely been supporting or ignoring Islamism, and that the U.S. government is concerned primarily with eradicating Al Qaeda, but not other Islamist threats. "This is an incredible defeat for western interests, and it's a defeat that people don't seem to notice," he said of the upheaval of the Arab world and its trend toward political Islamism.

Rubin suggested that moderates and western governments should work together to prevent the takeover by Islamism, as it will likely lead to civil wars, further economic ruin in Arab countries and extreme repression of minorities and women in the places where it takes hold.

"You have to unite all the forces that do not want radical Islamist regimes running their countries and their lives and attacking them," he said.

A small bright spot in Rubin's analysis was his assessment of the effect the uprisings and regime changes are likely to have on Israel.

While Israel will have to strengthen security on its border with Egypt and be prepared for Iran's possible attack in the future, he said, ultimately, the chaos in the region will probably not have a major negative impact on Israel.

"They will be very divided and not so able, or perhaps even interested, to attack Israel," Rubin said of Islamist-led Arab countries, adding that he believes Israel is unified and prepared to defend itself in the event of a security threat.

Rubin ended his lecture with the optimistic assessment he promised when he started. "The advantage of threats, the advantage of bad things, is that they wake people up."

His talk was sponsored by the Speakers Action Group and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association, in partnership with the synagogue and several other sponsors, including a number from the Christian community.

Israeli institute promotes aeronautical science

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Herzle Bodinger was a warrior of the 20th century – not very tall, with a slight build and a handshake in no danger of crushing anyone's fingers. Yet in his heyday, he flew French-made Vautours and Mirages for the Israeli Air Force (IAF), fought in the 1967 and 1973 wars, commanded Israel's most prestigious and first squadron – Squadron 101 – headed the air force's flying school and served as chief of the IAF from 1992 to 1996.

Today, at age 68, he is still plenty busy, though he's put his days of active service far behind him. Instead, he serves as president and chairman of the board of RADA, an Israeli high-tech firm that produces sophisticated avionics installed in all new F-16s.

He's also retained a soft spot in his heart for the airforce, as he is president and spokesperson of the Israel Air Force Association, a support group for the families of air force veterans killed in the line of duty. And he's heavily involved with the Fisher Institute, a volunteer organization that, among its other works, operates the Fisher Institute for Air & Space Strategic Studies. The Institute is considered Israel's leading agency for interdisciplinary study and discussion of air and space issues. It holds international conferences, symposia and workshops, conducts research, and publishes position papers on its findings.

Bodinger was in Toronto last week to tell his story and meet members of the community.

"We want to establish a relationship here," he said. "It was done in the past, but I think we can enhance and improve it."

Bodinger, who held the rank of major-general, said the Fisher Institute conducts research in conjunction with the Boeing Company on issues that have a profound implication on civilian aviation.

They are looking into the "glass cockpit," the contemporary cluster of digitized instruments whose arrangement, he said, has been found to contribute to accidents. The institute is also examining the question of "the golden hour," the 60-minute period after a catastrophic injury in which medical intervention is considered crucial to the victim's survival. Research on the subject, which should be concluded shortly, will lead to recommendations that can be done "in the field" to help survival, he said.

The Israel Air Force Association, he continued, is active in providing bereavement support to the families of soldiers killed in the line of duty. Among the activities sponsored by the association are annual get-togethers, a bar and bat mitzvah program in which youngsters visit an air base, fly in a helicopter and receive memorabilia, and the provision of financial assistance to veterans in need.

The Fisher Institute also sponsors several conferences each year. Among them is the recently concluded Fourth Civil Aviation Conference, held in cooperation with the Israeli Ministry of Transportation, the country's civil aviation authority. Held in Israel, the confab tackled issues like aviation safety and the future of Israeli aviation.

One of the institute's high profile events is the Ilan Ramon Annual International Space Conference. Named for the former IAF pilot and astronaut, the conference brings together international experts in space transportation to discuss current technologies, programs and strategies related to space exploration and space sciences. The conference is held with the participation of NASA, the European Space Agency and the Canadian Space Agency.

As a result of the success of the annual space conferences, the Fisher Institute is planning to establish a space research centre in Israel to examine in detail issues related to space and space sciences.

Bringing together the work of the Air Force House Association and the Fisher Institute is the Institute's Digital Space Library. Its goal is to create a historical and educational legacy by putting in digital form the Air Force House's collection of books, periodicals, videos and archival documents. Once uploaded, the Digital Space Library would provide access to information and historic materials to the public around the world.

IDF soldiers get some 'peace of mind'

Michelle Bitran
Intern

When Lior Ben Porat stepped off the plane from Israel to Canada at the end of October, he had no idea what to expect.

Ben Porat, 28, is a former Israel Defence Forces (IDF) commander who served in the Second Lebanon War. He and his unit in the Golani 51 Battalion spent a week in Toronto as part of a three-month therapy program for combat soldiers called Peace of Mind (POM).

The program, run through the Israel Centre for the Treatment of Psychotrauma (ICTP) at the Herzog Hospital Latner Institute in Jerusalem, helps treat released soldiers who have experienced traumatic events during their mandatory army service. It was established by the ICTP's director Danny Brom.

For one week, each group of soldiers travels to a city in Europe or North America, where they are hosted by the local Jewish community. For this group of 15 Golani soldiers in Toronto, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda was the host synagogue.

"It's still hard to believe that something like this exists. I mean, people and families and the community are treating us so well and embracing us and giving us so much love. The atmosphere here makes it possible to deal with and to speak about things that, otherwise, we would have carried with us as burdens for many more years," said Ben Porat.

Ben Porat's unit fought in one of the main battles in the war, the battle of Bint Jbeil, in southern Lebanon, where his battalion lost eight men. He said the hardest time for him is each year during the memorials for his friends' deaths and during his reserve service.

The Golani 51 unit with community members and Peace of Mind co-ordinating director Linoy Hazan, second from left, went bowling in Toronto recently.

Like Ben Porat, another soldier from the unit Ohad Dayag, 26, has trouble dealing with the memories of his fallen friends. As civilians, they have had to ignore their pain in order to keep living their daily lives. "When we're released from the army, we put it on the side," said Dayag.

Their unit is the 11th to go through the program and the third group to come to Canada. Linoy Hazan, the co-ordinating director of POM in Canada, hopes to bring another group in April. "If I could give this project to every single soldier, it would be my dream," she said.

During their weeklong stay, the soldiers visit tourist attractions such as Niagara Falls, attend events with the community and at their host synagogue and visit Hebrew day schools. This group was also treated to a hockey game by Maple Leaf Sports and Entertainment chair Larry Tanenbaum and his wife, Judy.

For many of the soldiers, visiting the children at school was extremely emotional. "Entire schools prepared presentations and songs – it really surprised me. It shows you that you're really appreciated," said Ben Porat.

According to Sason Rahabi, the program's manager in Israel and one of the social workers who accompanied the group to Toronto, it's the feelings of love and appreciation that are the most significant for the soldiers. "It is very important that the Jewish community values them and allows them to feel that what they are doing for the good of the country is actually for the good of all Jews," he said.

For Ben Porat, learning just that was eye-opening. He said that in Israel, where political opinions are extremely polarized, it can be difficult to feel any kind of unified support as a soldier. "When you come here and you see the entire Jewish community behind you, it's really surprising to me," he said, adding that it made him realize how important Israeli soldiers are to Diaspora Jews.

For each unit selected to participate in the program, it costs about $55,000. The funds are raised through private donations and sponsoring Jewish institutions. "The more it grows, the more people know about it and want to support it," said Hazan. She added that there are about 5,000 combat units who need a program like this to process their experiences during their service.

Hazan said that she sees the difference the program has made for each group, something that is tracked through long-term research at the ICTP. For her, the Peace of Mind program promises much more than just a name. "When you pick up the soldiers at the airport, they're very reserved. When they're done, they're completely different people that you bring back."

Diversity centre honours power couple

Sheila Dropkin
Special to The CJN

Judy Feld Carr and her husband, Donald, recently received the Canadian Centre for Diversity's Human Relations Award for 2011 at the centre's 64th awards gala.

Feld Carr's daring rescue of more than 3,200 Syrian Jews over almost three decades is well-documented and has earned her numerous awards, but it was news to many people who attended the Nov. 3 event.

Donald Carr

The event's attendees reflected the centre's membership and supporters, including men wearing turbans and others with kippahs, several women in colourful saris or head scarves, and at least two others in burkas. In the audience were rabbis and ministers, Muslims, Jews and Christians, ranging from high school students to retirees.

Feld Carr, noting that the event took place during Holocaust Education Week, told the audience that the Holocaust was "an outgrowth of the hatred of those who are different," and is in many ways a parallel of the decimation of the 3,000-year-old Syrian Jewish community when "Syria was bent on destroying diversity."

Under the regime of president Hafez Assad, father of Syria's current president, Bashar Assad, Jews were forbidden to leave the country, in part, to prevent their settling in Israel. They were castigated, marginalized, jailed, tortured and even killed. Many escaped before the 1948 crackdown, and by the time Feld Carr became involved in 1973, the once vibrant Jewish community that had numbered about 40,000 people 25 years earlier was down to 4,500.

Feld Carr said that she lived two parallel but distinct lives during the 28 years in which she worked at the rescue – the first as a wife, mother and sometime lecturer in music at York University, and the second as a smuggler involved in foreign intrigue and in constant fear for her life.

"I managed to break the barrier," she said, explaining that she found Syrian government officials who could be bribed "and [who] arranged with smugglers to take them [the Jews] out over inhospitable borders. Jews were bought and sold like cattle."

She thanked her husband for his support in what she said was a "terrible mission, which I feel was ordained. The rescue is a legacy that I leave to my children and grandchildren."

The last Jewish family smuggled out as a result of her efforts arrived in New York on Sept. 11, 2001, an hour before two hijacked planes flew into the World Trade Center.

Donald Carr was recognized by the centre for his involvement in a wide range of causes, including the United Way, Toronto Jewish Congress and ORT. An attorney, he received the Order of Ontario in 2006, in recognition of his service as counsel and adviser to numerous charities and not-for-profits, and for his pro bono work.

Judy Feld Carr

Contradictions "spill out from this building, across the city and the country in which we live," he said. "What was good is now bad. The oppressors are now the oppressed. Hatred accelerated by terror stalks this planet. Fear, abhorrence, hatred live on. Multiculturalism is now blamed for this turnaround."

He contradicted those who describe multiculturalism as a system in which groups live and work peacefully and in acceptance of each other but in separate enclaves. Rather, he said, multiculturalism is "predicated on each group contributing to Canada and engaging in Canadian society. We must not just tolerate [others]. We are obliged to revel in them, to embrace them."

The Feld Carrs were one of two couples honoured at the gala. The other recipients of the Human Relations Award were Don Morrison, the recently retired chief operating officer of Research in Motion, and his wife, Debbie, co-founder of the Morrison Family Foundation, which aims to "aid in development and health of youth." The Morrisons recently donated $10 million to the Hospital for Sick Children to study childhood asthma.

Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto graduate Marty Rotenberg, a medical student at the University of Toronto, and Raduyah Chawdhury, a senior at Blessed Mother Theresa High School in Toronto, described how being involved with the Canadian Centre for Diversity's Young Leaders Forum has made an impact on their lives.

As an undergrad, Rotenberg founded Tzedakah Tzedakah (pronounced differently in Hebrew and Arabic, the word for charity is basically the same in both languages). Members of this organization of Jewish and Muslim students volunteer together at soup kitchens in Toronto. The program has expanded to several schools.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Recalling a great rabbi

Rabbi David Cadoch

The Torah world, and specifically Montreal, has lost a sage of profound depth and integrity in the person of Rabbi Aryeh Leib Baron on Oct. 3. On this sad day, we lost a spiritual guide and leader who led many to Torah knowledge via the study of Talmud and the Shulchan Aruch.

Rabbi Baron built up Montreal's Yeshiva Merkaz HaTorah, offering a curriculum on Torah and secular studies for boys. For those interested in rabbinic careers, it prepared and ordained rabbis to serve Canada and abroad.

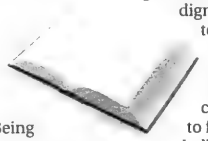
After retiring from Merkaz HaTorah, the rabbi opened his private rabbinic seminary, Merkaz HaTalmud, and personally taught and trained future rabbanim. He earned the esteemed title "Rabbi's Rabbi" among those that sought his advice and wisdom.

Rabbi Baron authored nine books on Halachah, elucidating talmudic difficulties and rendering them with clarity by adding his own chiddushim (novelties) to better understand the words of our sages. His final book was his chiddushei on Torah Hashkafah (Torah thoughts) on each parshah of the week. This final work, entitled Dat Yehudit, was dedicated to his late mother, who was instrumental in imbuing him with yirat Shamayim (fear of Heaven).

Our sages teach us in Ethics of the Fathers (Pirkei Avot) that one should acquire for oneself a rabbi to learn and acquire shimush talmidei chachamim (serving the sages – an apprenticeship).

I had the privilege of learning with Rabbi Baron for nine years and acquired beit din experience for more than four years. Being ordained by Rabbi Baron was a very emotional moment in my life, and today I realize the precious teachings of this major personality. Rabbi Baron's stature as a mentor and leader has shaped the very fibre of my being.

Rabbinic Reflections



Rabbi Baron guided the Montreal community for more than 40 years, teaching Talmud to people of all walks of life and professions. He instilled the principal of sanctifying Heaven's Name (kiddush HaShem).

The rabbi taught that one's life and daily activities should always sanctify the Name of Heaven. I recall the conversations he would share with his students, recounting in amazing detail the stories of his own rabbanim and his life experiences in Europe and in Shanghai, where the Mirrer Yeshiva had been relocated during the war.

Rabbi Baron loved everyone and opened his doors to the whole community. He treated every human being, Jewish or not, with respect and dignity. He offered advice to all who would ask. I personally witnessed how those seeking his advice would leave comforted and resolved to face their respective life challenges. Such was this leader – a most modest man with a tremendous repository of Torah wisdom and worldly knowledge.

The greatest lesson I remember was that Rabbi Baron taught by example. This is what a rabbinic leader should be – an example.

Why read books?

Where is time to be found for reading? This is a constant concern in our frenzied society. It is helpful, however, to keep in mind a simple reckoning. The average reader, dealing with material of average difficulty, can absorb about 300 words a minute. In 15 minutes, this comes to about 4,500 words. Fifteen minutes a day over a year give us 1.5 million words, the equivalent of 20 books averaging 75,000 words each. Fifteen minutes a day over a period of 50 years of reading means that we can read 1,000 books in our lifetime.

Imaginatively considered, a book is a miracle. By means of 26 letters, intricate symbols of communication, abstract thoughts and ideas are conveyed. Across the span of centuries, without regard to geography, the book speaks. It has power to teach, inspire, activate and delight. It can open windows on new horizons, foment revolution and sustain the troubled spirit.

There are times when one feels the need to escape from the ubiquitous computer, the realm of e-mail, Facebook, television and the cinema. In our environment, increasingly conditioned to irrationality, books offer a way of staying human. They are life lines to those in a sea of futility and meaninglessness. Books are able to perform this service because they remain private communications from one individual to another. Our general environment may be beyond our control, but in our reading we are still our own master.

A few years ago, a shrewd observer of the mass media put the following conversational exchange into an inspired cartoon:

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

One woman asks: "Have you read such and such a book? And the other responds, "Not personally." The ludicrousness of the reply derives from our assumption, happily still unchallenged, that reading at least remains a private action which one performs "personally" or not at all. And it is through just private communications that we tap the vast resources of our heritage from the past.

A doctor friend once told me of an unusual practice. Whenever he visits the home of new friends or patients, he tries to look into their medicine cabinet, which tells a great deal about the family: whether they are hypochondriacs or normal, healthy or ill.

I have a confession to make. I do the same thing. The only difference is that instead of the shelves in a medicine cabinet I make my way to bookcases.

Books on a shelf may not reveal much about health, but they do speak mightily about ones essential being. They indicate interests, intellectual and cultural; major concerns and points of view.

There is one supreme consolation about books. The joy we are describing is safe, as well as enduring. Many people have exercised themselves to death, many have played themselves to death, many have worried themselves to death - no one have ever thought himself to death or died from the ecstasy of learning. Our body gradually dies, our emotions become dull, but the mind continues to live, and can grow ever more alive, volatile and encompassing.

We need stronger faculty voice

My View

Lawrence Hart

When considering what most causes a chilled academic environment for Jewish students and faculty on university campuses, the slur that equates Israel with apartheid – ritualized each March during so-called "Israeli apartheid week" (IAW) – ranks highly. But the vernacular that seeks to demonize and delegitimize Israel is far from limited to IAW. It also finds expression in a variety of other programs that pollute our campuses throughout the school year. And of added concern is the evident hijacking of class time when anti-Israel prejudices become embedded, often insidiously, into curricular content.

The extent to which Jewish students are equipped, and willing, to stand up against such abuses varies widely. In some instances non-engagement is the preferred strategy. At other times, advocacy or measured confrontation is considered appropriate. Much depends on the circumstances.

What is obvious, nonetheless, is that Jewish campus groups are subjected constantly to a toxic atmosphere of intimidation by hostile and increasingly emboldened anti-Israel agitators who have quickly learned how to exploit academic freedoms to promote their hateful agendas. Within Canada, the national Hillel organization and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs's university outreach committee (UOC) are meant to provide the guidance and resources to counter anti-Israel, or more broadly anti-Jewish, incidents on our campuses, which is all well and good. Students are aware of this and usually embrace it.

However, what is missing on most campuses is a pro-active and dedicated faculty structure that ought to be actively promoting Israel, countering the delegitimizers, and assisting students when they feel threatened. Yes, there is a UOC-directed faculty organization, namely Canadian Academics for Peace

(CAP), that has representation on several campuses across the country, but there has been only limited success in attracting more faculty members to get involved with it.

For the most part, we still have much of what we've had before, a mostly ad hoc arrangement where individual professors on particular campuses take a stand in times of crises or make themselves available to students only when required.

This is not the case at Hamilton's McMaster University, where a Jewish Faculty Association (JFA) has been active for the past four years. With the principal objectives of supporting Jewish students and promoting Israel on campus, the JFA has developed strong, trusting, and enduring relationships with successive leaderships of McMaster's Jewish Student Association (JSA) and its Israel on Campus affiliate.

Student leaders and their JSA director (and also the chair of UJA Federation of Hamilton's campus services committee) meet regularly with the JFA executive. Most campus programming on Israel is collaborative, with outreach from campus to community that has resulted in highly successful and extraordinarily well-attended events. Demonstrating student-faculty unity has also been very effective in dealings with the university administration, especially on issues as contentious as IAW.

Different campuses have different priorities, and Jewish faculty members need to position themselves accordingly. The McMaster model can be easily emulated, and there may be others that are similarly successful. But what is abundantly clear is that as the aggressive and egregious attacks on Israel and its supporters escalate on our campuses year by year, there needs to be a more cohesive, resolute and powerful voice from Jewish faculty

New iPhone and iPad apps

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

It's time to look at the best free (and almost free) Jewish and Israeli apps waiting to be downloaded onto your iPhone and iPad.

Gene Screen (free): Jews are no strangers to many genetic diseases that occur at rates higher in our community. Created in association with the Victor Center for the Prevention of Jewish Genetic Diseases in Philadelphia, this app explains in clear terms the basics of genetics using diagrams and maps, and surprising comparisons to put prevalence in perspective. For example, Walker-Warburg Syndrome has a rate of 1 in 49, "similar to the odds that a cheerleader will be injured while cheerleading in a year." [http://bit.ly/jhapp17]

Write to the Rebbe's Ohel (free): Ever since the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, passed away in 1994, his resting place has attracted followers and admirers who leave notes asking for spiritual guidance and material assistance. If you'd like to make the trek to the Ohel (the "tent") at the Montefiore Cemetery in Queens, New York, but can't, this app is for you. [http://bit.ly/jhapp18]

Protest Tents (free): Speaking of tents, protesters in Israel pitched tents this summer to protest high living costs and the gap in earning. Although most tents have been folded and placed in storage, the protest continues. The Hebrew language Protest Tents app allows anyone to pitch a virtual tent on a map of Israel and state what they are protesting. I found people upset with high prices, uncaring nurses and doctors, limits in disability payments, and from a resident in Ashkelon, Grad rockets. "Enough. Let the South rest!") [http://bit.ly/jhapp19]

English Israel News ($0.99): If you want your news from Israel in English and you want it quick, then this app is for you. You can customize feeds from the Jerusalem Post, Ha'aretz, Ynet (Yediot Achronot), Globes Business and JTA. You can even choose to have the app display only types of stories such as breaking news, culture or Jewish life. [http://bit.ly/jhapp20]

Jewish Radio ($0.99): What English Israel News does for news, Jewish Radio does for audio. There are dozens of radio stations on the web that carry Jewish music and classes about Judaism. Finding them online is another matter. Jewish Radio simplifies that by gathering them up and letting you scan which are on air right now. In a matter of moments, I was able to tune in to RadioShalom, YidishMusic, Mizrahit, Jewbox Radio and many others. [http://bit.ly/jhapp21] (Thanks to David Stolzman for tipping me off about this app.)

Treyf Invaders ($0.99): A mass attack by porcine provocateurs on your iPhone? You better believe it! Based on the classic video game Space Invaders, you are challenged to vanquish non-kosher animals (camels, shrimp, whales) that are plummeting toward you while sparing those kosher cud chewers, cows, goats and sheep. And remember, let just one piece of bacon find safe haven and it's game over. [http://bit.ly/jhapp22]

Once again, I want to give a big thank-you to JewishiPhoneCommunity.org. This is the site to find Jewish software for your iPhone and iPad, as well as for your Android and BlackBerry-based phones and tablets.

Interfaith group celebrates silver anniversary

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

What happens when a rabbi, an imam, and a priest gather together to lead a prayer service? It may sound like the start of an old joke, but earlier this month Toronto's Neighbourhood Interfaith Group found the answer to that question by hosting an evening of interfaith prayer at Grace Church on-the-Hill.

"Our goal is definitely not to proselytize, but simply to demystify each other's worship," explains Bryan Beauchamp, the group's chair. "When you have understanding, you invite harmony, calm observances, and confidence in one another."

The evening, titled "Abrahamic Faiths Together at Worship," led by Rev. Canon Peter Walker and Rev. Rachel Kessler, with additional readings and speeches by Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum and Imam Habeeb Alli, featured prayer in the French Taize tradition.

A Taize ceremony is a monastic order among traditional medieval lines that represent the Anglican, Catholic, Lutheran and reform faith traditions. The service started with silence and a call to worship, followed by readings from Deuteronomy and Psalms and songs of meditation.

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, founder of the new Canadian Yeshiva and Rabbinical School at the University of Toronto's School of Theology, also gave a short speech to the congregation.

"We have so much in common, so many similarities in the structure and even format of our services," he said.

"For instance, we all start with a call to worship, whether it's the barechu [public call to prayer] or a call from the minaret. Then in terms of prayer form, we all pray for thanksgiving, atonement, and mix prayer with study."

Rabbi Tanenbaum, an active participant in the interfaith group, believes it's important for Jews to participate in these kinds of events. "We live in a community that we share with others, and interacting is appreciating. We need to support each other rather than be strangers."

Rabbi Tanenbaum added that the dialogue between Jews and other faiths has evolved over the last decade.

"When we first started, we would talk about what we shared in the Bible. As the dialogue has progressed, we've been able to discuss other things like problematic texts in each of our faiths, and the mutual issues we face living in a secular society."

Imam Alli, an author and current secretary of the Canadian Council of Imams, said he was elated to be part of such a dynamic group that respects his tradition.

"Even though we are different, there's definitely relevance here. For instance, the silence, asking for peace, singing, we do that too. We recite the Quran melodiously."

After the service, guests were invited for a joint reception with refreshments.

"Only in Toronto will a Catholic caterer serve food at an Anglican church for a Kosher-Halal reception," Beauchamp joked.

The event also marked the group's 25th anniversary "of fighting bigotry, bias and racism in Toronto and the world."

This month, the group also hosted events to mark Holocaust Education Week, bringing in Susanna Kokkonen, the director of Christian Friends of Yad Vashem, to teach at the Bishop Strachan School and deliver a presentation on Christian responsibility for the Holocaust at Grace Church on-the-Hill.

Earlier this year, they also honoured Victor Kugler, the man who hid Holocaust victims Anne Frank and her family.

"Religion is often seen these days as just a source of conflict, but I pray our friends and neighbours will see how religion can be a focus for peace and goodwill," Beauchamp said.

Pennies for remembrance

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Even following her mother's death in June, Sarah Shapiro Goldberg was still learning new things about her.

Fela Shapiro, a Holocaust survivor from Lodz, Poland, who was liberated in 1945 from Bergen-Belsen, had acquired a penny collection – about 8,000 of them.

Holocaust Education Week

It wasn't until after the shivah that Goldberg and her sister, Marilyn, discovered them.

"She was meticulous in rolling them. There they were, all rolled up," Goldberg said.

The pennies remained in her mother's condo, "just sitting on the kitchen counter, maybe tucked away in drawers. I didn't pay attention to them at all."

But when her sister stumbled across an article in the Globe and Mail about a school project to raise awareness about the Holocaust, they discovered that their mother's penny collection could serve a special purpose.

They decided to donate the coins to the Penny Project, an initiative launched in 2008 by St. Marcellinus Secondary School teacher Susan Carey to collect 13 million pennies – one for each of the victims of the Nazi genocide.

Carey, who did not respond to requests for an interview, told the Globe and Mail in September that the project was born out of a question from a student in her Grade 10 history class in the Mississauga school.

"He said, 'Miss, what's the Holocaust and who is Anne Frank?' I was just so shocked and thought how could you possibly not know this?" Carey recalled.

Goldberg, who met with Carey to deliver the bags of pennies "that weighed a ton," said Carey explained that the question "horrified her, and she made a pledge to herself that she wanted to teach these kids about genocide and Holocaust awareness."

Three years later, Carey and her students have collected more than 800,000 pennies and have received donations from churches and synagogues. Some donations have come from as far as Winnipeg, Ottawa and the United States.

The Penny Project is similar to the Paper Clip Project – a campaign initiated in 1998 by the staff and students of the Whitwell Middle School in Tennessee to collect a paper clip for each of the six million Jewish victims of the Holocaust.

The campaign was such a success that an award-winning documentary called Paper Clips was released in 2004, and to date, more than 30 million paper clips have been collected.

"These kinds of projects have been done before, but I was just really interested in how a Christian woman – how it became a passion of hers," Goldberg said. "How she inspired them and how she wanted to expand their view."

For the Penny Project, Carey's students meet each Wednesday, group the coins into rolls of 50, and place them into boxes.

The boxes of pennies are being used to build a wall in the Catholic school's foyer that will serve as a memorial to the victims of the Holocaust, as well as recognize Canadian veterans who fought in World War II.

Once the goal of 13 million pennies, or $130,000, is reached, the money will be donated to genocide relief organizations and genocide education programs.

Goldberg said that when she and her sister found their mother's penny collection, they felt that donating it to the Penny Project was "an appropriate way to use those coins."

Although her mother was a Holocaust survivor, Goldberg said she wasn't vocal about her experience.

"Whatever stories my mother told us were stories that people she survived with – a sister and three cousins and an uncle – told her," she said.

"My mother effectively erased, repressed her own experience entirely… It was her way of coping."

With this project, Goldberg's mother can be a part of the Holocaust education campaign.

Aish Gala Dinner Hits an Inspirational Note by Honouring Four Moms

Pamela Bielak states her mission as 'Global Domination: To make every child smile' and through her organization, Crafting for a Cure, she is achieving just that. Her drive to see success for her project is mirrored in the other honourees at this year's Aish Toronto Gala Dinner.

The Jewish Women's Renaissance Project, co-created by Rebecca Lambert, recently took 75 Toronto moms to Israel on a 'birthright' style' mission of touring and Jewish education specifically tailored to successfully raising strong Jewish families.

Ellen Schwartz's philanthropy based program, Project Give Back, for chidren in grades four and five, is now in many schools across the GTA. This project is in addition to Ellen's own charity 'Jacob's Ladder', that works to develop therapy and cures for neurodegenerative diseases.

Nancy Weisbrod, founder of the Village Shul, has watched her project grow from a home-group around her kitchen table to a major synagogue. Even though it has become one of the most successful outreach shuls in the world, the Village Shul remains known for being as open and welcoming as Nancy's own home.

In addition to highlighting the honourees, Aish Toronto is using the dinner to launch a groundbreaking Women's Leadership Initiative with seminars, coaching, speakers and missions that will service the growing number of female-led non-profit organizations in Toronto as well as empower more women to step up and take a leadership role.

While every honouree and their respective projects are completely different, Aish Toronto has once again hit upon a common thread that resonates across the community: the power of women to positively impact the world.

Aish Toronto's 30th Anniversary Gala Dinner is on the 22nd of November at the BAYT. Tickets for the dinner can be purchased at aishgaladinner.com, by emailing shaindy@rogers.com or by calling 905.764.9340.

Prosecutor's daughter recalls Eichmann trial

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Tami Hausner-Raveh was only a teenager when Adolf Eichmann walked into her family's life in a way she would never forget.

Hausner-Raveh's father, Gideon Hausner, was the chief prosecutor for Eichmann's trial in Jerusalem in 1961.

As the attorney general of Israel, he chose to appear in court personally for the important trial of the infamous Nazi war criminal.

Holocaust Education Week

"The decision of my father [to be prosecutor] changed at once his life and our family life," Hausner-Raveh told the audience at the closing program for Holocaust Education Week on Nov. 9 at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

She was chosen to be the keynote speaker because this year's Holocaust Education Week marked 50 years since the Eichmann trial and focused on the issue of accountability in the Holocaust.

The closing event also fell on the 73rd anniversary of Kristallnacht, and close to Remembrance Day, so the program included a Kristallnacht memorial candlelighting ceremony and also paid tribute to Canadian and Jewish war veterans.

Hausner-Raveh's memories of the Eichmann trial offered a personal insider's perspective on the historic moment for Jews and Israelis. In her talk, she included clips from the film Ani Eheye Lahem Lepe (meaning, "I will speak on their behalf"), a 2005 Israel Broadcasting Authority film about her father and the trial. Outside the Beth Tzedec sanctuary, there was a special exhibit from Israel of photographs and information about the Eichmann trial, presented by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

"Father decided from the very beginning that the Eichmann trial would be very different than the Nuremberg Trials," said Hausner-Raveh, a former assistant attorney general in Israel's Ministry of Justice and now chairperson of Israel's Channel 2 News.

She explained that her father was determined to make the Eichmann trial more about witnesses and personal testimony rather than documents. Accordingly, 100 witnesses, including some 90 survivors, testified at the trial.

"Finding the witnesses was not an easy job, not at all," said Hausner-Raveh, recalling her father's tireless efforts to find witnesses and persuade them to testify.

"So many of them were reluctant to come forward and testify," she said, explaining that before the trial, many survivors in Israel found that even their friends and family had trouble believing the horrible experiences they endured.

Hausner-Raveh recalled the long evenings her father spent speaking to witnesses in the family's living room and reading endless documents in preparation for the trial. She remembered overhearing the horrifying stories of survivors, and watching her father gather the information to write his memorable opening speech for the trial.

"He thought and rethought of every word," she told the audience, adding that she suspects he barely slept the night before the trial.

"We could watch him change as the trial went on," she said, explaining that his usual sense of humour was subdued as he became immersed in the proceedings. The Israeli public followed the trial by radio at every opportunity, absorbed by the testimonies.

The trial ended Aug. 14, 1961, and Eichmann was executed on May 31, 1962.

When Hausner received a phone call to inform him of the execution, "he just wiped a tear and said very quietly, 'Justice has been done, but so little and so late,'" said Hausner-Raveh.

Tami Hausner-Raveh addresses the audience at the closing program for Holocaust Education Week.

Hausner continued to work to preserve the memories and thoughts of survivors even after the trial.

"The Holocaust never left him and he never left the Holocaust," said Hausner-Raveh. Hausner went on to be the chairman of the Yad Vashem Council before he passed away in 1990. Now, Hausner-Raveh is a member of the same council.

She told the audience that many of the witnesses wrote about their experiences and sent letters to her father after the trial, leaving him with a collection of Holocaust memories in the family home that his grandchildren would read through many years later in preparation for a March of the Living trip.

"When Eichmann stepped into our home," Hausner-Raveh said, "he never really left us."

The role of the railways in the Holocaust

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Holocaust Education Week

Representations of the railway cars that transported people to concentration and extermination camps during World War II are ubiquitous in Holocaust memorials worldwide.

At a Nov. 5 Holocaust Education Week lecture, Hans de Vries, head of the department for correspondence of the Netherlands Institute for War, Holocaust and Genocide Studies, and Robert Jan van Pelt, professor of architecture at the University of Waterloo and a world authority on Auschwitz, spoke about the role played by the Dutch railways and the people who ran them during the Holocaust.

Their talk at Temple Emanu-El was titled "The Road to the Concentration Camps: The Role of Complicit Bystanders."

"The way we tell the story about the Holocaust is through the journey. The journey to the camps – and for the survivors – the journey back," van Pelt said.

"Because the journey is central, the railway car is central," he added.

Robert Jan van Pelt

About 75 per cent of Dutch Jews were exterminated in the Holocaust, and train transports played an important role. De Vries said that when the Germans invaded the Netherlands in May 1940, they set up a supervisory government that created policy and put the Dutch bureaucracy in charge of implementing it.

And instead of trying to negotiate with the Nazis, the Dutch carried out their policies to keep Dutch society running as smoothly as possible. The state-owned railway company was no exception.

De Vries said the 30,000 people employed by the railway turned a blind eye to the deportation of Jews. And although some claimed they didn't know exactly where the Jews were being sent, they were obviously headed to a miserable fate, he added.

"The Nazis could not have carried out these transports alone, they needed helpers, and these helpers can surely be held accountable for all they did," said de Vries.

The vast majority of workers continued to send the transports on their way without protest, sometimes for fear of dismissal from what was a considered a good company to work for, he said.

In 1953, an investigation looked into the railway's cooperation with the Nazis.

"For me, half a century later, the answers are still shocking," said de Vries, explaining that workers, among other justifications, said they were too busy to notice the Jewish transports, or that the Jews would have been even worse off without them. Many said they were just doing their jobs.

"Suggesting that one didn't know is not good enough. This is just a line of defence that gives people some psychological comfort and seems to get them off the hook," de Vries said.

Van Pelt added that out of the 250,000 trains travelling each day in German-occupied Europe, on average, only 10 of them were used to transport Jews.

This tiny fraction amounts to only 0.004 per cent of the trains, yet, he explained, the role of keeping those trains running was still very significant. "It is exactly those 10 trains which are the trains that matter, morally."

Polish historians learning new Shoah details

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The discovery of millions of pages of new archival material is giving Polish historians fresh insights into the Holocaust in Poland, says a leading scholar.

Jan Grabowski

Jan Grabowski, a professor of history at Ottawa University, said that this data, gleaned from Jewish survivors after World War II, sheds light on Jews who went into hiding after Nazi Germany occupied Poland in September 1939.

Their testimonies suggest that about 230,000 to 240,000 Polish Jews, representing 10 per cent of Poland's pre-war Jewish population, tried to save themselves by fleeing into forests, noted Grabowski, a member of the Polish Centre for Holocaust Research in Warsaw.

Grabowski, the author of two books about Jews who avoided Nazi deportations, tracked the fate of 300 Jewish men, women and children who fled before they could be rounded up by the Nazis.

Holocaust Education Week

The vast majority of escapees were caught and sent to the Belzec death camp in Poland, said Grabowski, who spoke at a Nov. 7 Holocaust Education Week event at Kehillat Shaarei Torah synagogue co-sponsored by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada.

In his closing comments, Grabowski said that while the Nazis found no shortage of collaborators in Poland, Jews who survived the Holocaust owe their lives to Poles and ethnic Ukrainians who helped them in their hour of duress.

The second speaker, Jan Gross, a professor of history at Princeton University whose books have prompted impassioned debates in Poland, said that the newest generation of Polish historians are delving deeply into the Holocaust.

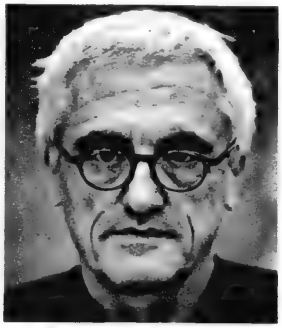
"The landscape has changed dramatically in Poland in the past 10 years," said Gross, the author of Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne, Poland and Fear – Antisemitism in Poland after Auschwitz.

"We're in a completely different place. There is a huge airing in Poland of the Holocaust. It's all out on the table."

According to Gross, these historians are increasingly drawing on the personal testimonies of Jewish survivors and Polish bystanders and perpetrators.

"They give us an insight into the mechanics of the Holocaust," he observed.

Reprising the theme of Neighbors, Gross said the genocide of Polish Jews would have been impossible without the participation of Polish Catholics, who were able to pick out Jews for the Germans.



Jan Gross

In a swipe at Poland's Roman Catholic church, Gross described its influence in Poland before and during the Holocaust as "pernicious," saying that its leaders did not really speak up in defence of Jews.

"This is an issue the church has to deal with," he said.

Grabowski and Gross were introduced by Piotr Wrobel, a professor of Polish history at the University of Toronto, and Peter Jassem, chair of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada.

Accuracy called essential when teaching kids

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The first challenge in teaching the Holocaust to children is to define it accurately, says Holocaust Education Week 2011's educator in residence.

Kay Andrews, a leading Holocaust educator in the United Kingdom and co-ordinator of the national outreach program of the Holocaust Education Development Program at the University of London, was speaking Nov. 8 at Beth Torah Synagogue as part of Holocaust Education Week.

Holocaust Education Week

She said that if teachers use different definitions of the Holocaust, students will get confused. "We have to [ensure] we are historically accurate."

She said that in England, where it is mandatory to teach the Holocaust to students between the ages of 11 and 14, it's taught in a number of subjects, including history, English and religious studies. "There is a huge government commitment to Holocaust education."

Her program developed a survey and issued it to 2,108 teachers, who were given a list of 35 areas from which they could choose what to teach.

She said that the number 1 area the teachers chose was Hitler's rise to power. "This gives kids a Nazi perspective, and no contextual information about Jewish life before the Holocaust. It is a perpetrator-centred narrative.

"[The teachers] missed out on the [importance] of Jewish resistance, and the experience of Holocaust survivors before 1945. We are addressing these issues."

Her program runs workshops that focus on the Jewish narrative, she said. "We try to ensure that the survivor's voice is there."

She said that when teachers were asked about the biggest challenge surrounding Holocaust education, they "responded it was time. There is not enough time to do the Holocaust justice. They need to have the commitment of teachers in every department."

Andrews said her program is looking at creating a beacon school where Holocaust education is woven into every area of study. "We hope that this would encourage other schools to [do the same]."

When teaching the Holocaust to younger children, it's important to avoid graphic images, she said. "Subject matter needs to be age-appropriate. Why should we put shocking images in front of children? We have a moral responsibility for the material we put in front of them."

Kay Andrews

We also have to think about the subtle difference between learning and remembering, she said. "Remembering is so important, but it is another level of learning. We have to think about how the two things are tied together."

It's also important not to use the Holocaust to address social phenomena such as bullying. "We are trivializing the Holocaust if we use it to educate children about bullying."

Royal Society honours three Jewish scholars

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Royal Society of Canada's (RSC) recognition of three Jewish studies scholars this year suggests that the field of Jewish studies is gaining respect and credibility in the world of academia.

McGill University's Gershon Hundert, as well as University of Toronto professors David Novak and Derek Penslar, all of whom are Jewish studies experts, have been elected by the fellows of the RSC to join their ranks.

Hundert, Novak and Penslar join 75 other fellows this year, and the nearly 2,000 others who were elected in previous years for their outstanding achievement in their respective fields.

Founded in 1882, the RSC is a national body of distinguished Canadian scholars, artists and scientists established to recognize academic excellence and outstanding contributions to Canadian culture.

Penslar, who was recognized for his work on controversial subjects including Zionism, the Arab-Israeli conflict, Jewish economic and political power and anti-semitism, said he is thrilled to have received the highest honour a scholar can achieve in Canada.

"It is a great honour for me personally, and I also think it is a sign... when three scholars of Jewish studies get elected in a single year... that [the RSC] are willing to consider on equal terms scholarship in subjects that in the past may have been considered peripheral or so highly controversial that they didn't want to deal with it," said Penslar, the Samuel Zacks professor of Jewish history at U of T, who will take up his post in 2012 as Oxford University's first professor of Israeli studies.

Derek Penslar

Penslar added that in most universities, U of T included, Jewish studies does not have a department. McGill is the only Canadian institution that boasts a Jewish studies department, rather than a centre.

"A centre integrates 20 to 25 different departments and units. But people who do Jewish studies are full-fledged scholars of a discipline," he said.

"We were trained at secular universities, we know how to talk to our colleagues in a certain disciplinary vocabulary, we know how to reach students of any background."

Although Hundert said he couldn't be sure how many other Jewish studies scholars have ever made the RSC fellows list, if any, he agreed the inclusion of three Jewish studies scholars on this year's list "signals the maturation of the field of Jewish studies in the Canadian academy."

Hundert explained that as a discipline, Jewish studies is quite young, having been established at McGill and U of T in the 1960s.

"This is a signal that we've come of age and we have a place in the academy."

Hundert said that one of the most "satisfying" parts of being honoured by the RSC is that the nominations come from their colleagues.

"People at McGill put my name forward and suggested that I was worthy of this. That is especially satisfying."

Hundert suggested that he might have been recognized this year because of his role as the editor-in-chief of the YIVO Encyclopedia of Jews in Eastern Europe, which is now available free online at www.yivoencyclopedia.org.

"I had 450 scholars contributing from 17 countries – it's massive."

Novak, who holds the J. Richard and Dorothy Shiff Chair of Jewish Studies as a religion and philosophy professor at U of T, has also been honoured by the society for his research in natural law theory, Jewish-Christian relations and biomedical ethics.

Novak said the honour is significant because not long ago, "Jews were not all that welcome [on university campuses] let alone Jewish history being welcome."

He said it's important for people to know that Jewish studies isn't reserved for Jewish students, adding that a vast majority of his students are non-Jews.

"If we only appealed to Jewish students... we would be very marginalized. The fact that we have this wide appeal indicates that we're not," Novak said.

He said that while he's honoured by the recognition, what is most significant is the fact that Jewish studies are "not foreign in the larger Canadian cultural context."

This year's new fellows will be inducted to the RSC during a ceremony on Nov. 26 at the Ottawa Convention Centre in Ottawa.

ISRAEL TENNIS

Now serving 21,500 kids weekly - thanks to

Established in 1976, the Israel Tennis Centers / Israel Children's Centres have been promoting the social, psychological and physical development of Israeli youth for 35 years.

21,500 kids participate weekly in programs that give EVERY Israeli child, regardless of background, religion, socioeconomic status or ability, a chance to become a champion - at tennis - but more important - in LIFE. Located from Kiryat Shmona in the north of Israel to Beer Sheva in the south, most of the 14 Israel Tennis Centers are located in economically-challenged neighborhoods and outlying development towns throughout Israel.

The ITC's Arab/Jewish Co-Existence Program, Kindergarten, Immigrant Assimilation Initiatives, and programs for the Developmentally and Physically Challenged focus on tolerance and the virtues of teamwork, using the game of tennis as a framework. The fact that the ITC turns out world class Israeli tennis champions is a fortunate and exciting by-product. Every Israeli kid can be a champion, given the chance.

Two new Coexistence Kindergarten Programs begin at The Israel Tennis Center in Akko

Akko, Israel, October, 2011 The Israel Tennis Centers are pleased to announce the launch of two new coexistence ("Twinned") kindergarten projects in Akko, in the north of Israel.

The ITC's Twinned Kindergarten programs bring Jewish and Arab kindergarten classes together weekly at the Israel Tennis Centers, to engage in social and sport activity under the guidance and leadership of accredited Israel Tennis Centers physical education teachers. The program, which will continue for the duration of the school year sees Jewish, Christian and Muslim children participating in all activities as one group and celebrating holidays together..

The Israel Tennis Centers' Twinned Kindergartens have been operating successfully for 7 years, and in 2011/2012 will operate in the Akko and Jerusalem Centers. Twinned Kindergarten Programs at the ITC rely on donor funding to bridge the gap between program costs and support from local Israeli municipalities and the Department of Welfare and Education. The two new Akko Kindergartens were generously funded by The Tennis Legends Israel Trip 2012, and Raya Strauss Holdings. These two new projects will serve 140 Jewish and Arab children from the Akko area, and provide a lifetime perspective of cooperation and equality.

A donation or sponsorship of $25,000 supports 70 children (one Jewish and one Arab Kindergarten class) for one school year. For more information, please call 416 444-5700 or email info@israelchildren.ca

Ali Baghbani, whose son needs a bone marrow transplant, attended a "Get Swabbed" drive at Carleton University last week. [Cara Stern photo]

Ontario campuses compete to register bone marrow donors

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Ali Baghbani has spent months hoping for a bone marrow match for his son, Tymaz. He's visited Get Swabbed drives at universities across Ontario, as well as one in Montreal.

"[Tymaz] has been for multiple chemotherapy treatments, but he's still looking for his bone marrow match," Baghbani said.

The 15-year-old Torontonian's face was on posters all around the University Centre at Carleton University on Nov. 4, though he is just one of the almost 1,000 patients in Canada waiting to find a match.

The Get Swabbed drive began with a single event at McMaster University in 2009. Each year, an increasing number of schools have taken up the challenge, and there has been a huge surge in support this year, with 20 schools participating, almost double compared to last year, said Jessica Stergiou co-ordinator of donor management for Canadian Blood Services' OneMatch Stem Cell and Marrow Network.

The Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi was at the helm of the drive in Ottawa, focusing its event on three patients, including Tymaz.

The universities compete for a trophy that will go to the school with the most male registrants per capita, Stergiou said.

This year, she said, the drives targeted men, particularly those from non-white backgrounds, since this group is significantly underrepresented in the database.

"Males make the best stem cell donors, with better patient outcomes," Stergiou said, adding that in the unlikely scenario where a patient has multiple matches, the doctor will go with the youngest male available.

Volunteers rounded up men as they walked through the atrium at Carleton to convince them to join the international OneMatch database.

In total, the Ottawa drive registered 337 males, four females and 15 online female registrants, according to Ayal Sadeh, vice-president of the Ottawa AEPi chapter.

The disparity comes from a lack of resources, he said. They were given 600 swab kits and had a limited number of volunteers, so they spent the time registering men, directing most of the women who approached the tables to a computer where they could register online for a mail-in swab kit.

Sadeh said it's ideal to get young people registered since they are fit for a potential donation for the longest possible time, so this was perfect for a university event.

For the second year in a row, the McMaster chapter of AEPi ran a 24-hour drive and broke the Guinness World Record for the most registrants in a day, registering 1,162 people.

Although the University of Guelph beat that number, collecting 1,560 cheek swabs, they didn't qualify for the Guinness record because their drive lasted 12 hours, instead of the continuous 24-hour period required to qualify for the record.

Only about one-third of Guelph's registrants were male, but it must be considered that the university has almost eight female students for every male student, Stergiou said.

It was exciting to see everybody's reactions when they heard the total, said Sarah Paolucci, co-organizer of the drive at Guelph. "We never really thought we would hit anything near this number."

Many volunteers were directly affected by the cause. Gina Parker was one volunteer at Carleton who spent the day helping registrants fill out the necessary questionnaires. She said she was hoping to help find a match for her younger brother, who was diagnosed with leukemia in May.

Though the drive doesn't aim to match specific people, she said, widening the database would increase her brother's chances of finding a match.

Many of those who volunteered, however, had no personal connection.

"There's nothing bad in helping to save a life, so the more I can do, the better," said Jesse Smiley, a first-year student at the University of Ottawa, who is in the process of joining AEPi.

Baghbani said he had hoped there would be more Lebanese registrants, since a person is much more likely to find a match from those with a similar background. But he was thrilled with the turnout.

In the end, Ottawa's AEPi were pleased with both the number of registrants and the chance to show the philanthropic side of the fraternity, although Sadeh said he hopes next year's event will allow them to register both men and women.

"The interest on campus exceeded our wildest expectations," he said. "It was truly successful in every way."

Dealing with Iran's nuclear ambitions

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week's According To Reports column ended on a sombre note that military action against Iran, however unpalatable and risky, may be the only option available to try to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. Or at least greatly slow its progress to that end.

That column was written against a background of a flurry of news reports about heightened Israeli military activity and related co-ordination between Britain and the United States involving the possibility of a U.S.-led missile strike on Iran's nuclear installations.

A couple of days later Barry Rubin, a prolific author and the director of the Israel-based GLORIA Center, argued (in a National Post opinion piece and in a Globe and Mail story by Patrick Martin on Nov. 4) that media reports of looming military strikes against Iran have been vastly overblown and amount to sensationalism.

The reality, which has consequently been obscured, Rubin maintained, is that Israel has decided against a military strike "in the near future" and instead is planning for "a longer range strategy": "This policy… consists of preparing both offensive and defensive forces to act decisively if Israel ever feels that an Iranian nuclear strike is likely," Rubin wrote in the Post. In private conversation, Rubin calls this neither deterrence nor containment but rather "a flexible response."

Numerous analysts have pointed out that Iran hasn't just been sitting around for the past several years in expectation of an attack. It has been very busy burying its nuclear assets deep under mountains impervious to conventional bombing, and even in densely populated centres to deter military assaults. It has also armed Hezbollah in Lebanon with more than 50,000 rockets to be launched against Israel in case of an attack (a deterrence of its own), and it threatens precious oil fields in eastern Iraq as another means of deterrence: the capacity to force world oil prices through the roof.

"Israel understandably has plans for a possible attack against Iran if needed and its military trains for that contingency," Rubin says. "Israel leaks this fact to unnerve Iran and give western countries incentives to increase sanctions and work harder to block Tehran from getting nuclear weapons."

On the matter of sanctions – the sort of sanctions, directed against Iran's energy sector, that would really hurt – there's little chance of that happening while Europe, which relies on crude oil from Iran in addition to other sources, is in the midst of economic turmoil and is facing a recession. The last thing Europe needs now is higher energy costs.

China, which surpassed the European Union last year as Iran's largest trading partner, and Russia, with major investments in the oil and gas fields in the Islamic Republic, oppose another tougher round of United Nations Security Council sanctions. Europe and the United States could impose their own biting sanctions, but are even more unlikely to do so while Russia and especially China offset any losses for Tehran and profit in the meantime.

Just last week, it was reported that even the Obama administration which promised to push for stinging new sanctions, has backed away from a Congressional committee-approved plan to move against Iran's central bank, since the effect could be to disrupt oil markets and force a steep rise in prices.

The Nov. 9 release by the International Atomic Energy Agency of its long-awaited report on Iran's nuclear program received a lot of media attention, but came as no surprise to Israeli authorities. It asserted that over the past several years, Iran, in violation of its non-proliferation treaty obligations, has been pursuing the enrichment of nuclear fuel and the (secret) development of nuclear weapons technology.

The estimation of when Iran will be capable of actually producing a nuclear weapon that can be placed on a ballistic missile varies between one and several years, according to "experts." But very little doubt now remains that Iran will achieve this.

Despite the flood of rhetoric and analyses, the bottom line is that no one, it seems, has a viable answer to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Paul Michaels is director of research and media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Canada casts 9 votes defending Israel at UN

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canada last week stood up once again for Israel on the world stage.

Member states voted on a series of resolutions at the United Nations General Assembly Nov. 10 that were explicitly or implicitly critical of Israel, and Canada voted "no" or abstained on all of them.

John Baird

One of them, from the UN special political and decolonization committee – which deals with a variety of subjects, including the Palestinian refugee issue, human rights and peacekeeping – contained a resolution with numerous criticisms of Israel and no mention of Palestinian obligations in the peace process.

The special committee had submitted a report from another subcommittee that was charged with investigating "Israeli practices affecting the human rights of the Palestinian people and other Arabs of the occupied territories."

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird said that this resolution was "one-sided, unbalanced and does not address the complexities of the issues, nor seeks to address the true actions and responsibilities of all parties."

He added that Canada remained "frustrated" with the UN's process on Middle East peace.

Canada, Baird said, believes Israel and the Palestinians must resolve all "final status" peace issues in bilateral negotiations, not at the UN.

"Canada has long been concerned by the sheer number of UN resolutions critical solely of Israel. No other conflict area in the world draws even a fraction of the time and energy of member states."

Baird said the committee's resolution package on Israel was prejudiced and lacked "references to terrorist activities carried out by Hamas, Palestinian Islamic Jihad and others against Israel and are, thus, ultimately unhelpful to the cause of a lasting, negotiated peace."

As a result, Canada voted "no" or abstained from voting last week on nine of what it decided were biased, anti-Israel resolutions, including the special committee's report.

The other resolutions, along with Canada's vote, were: Assistance to Palestine refugees (abstained); Operations of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (no); Persons displaced as a result of June 1967 and subsequent hostilities (no); Palestine refugees' properties and their revenues (no); Applicability of the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of 12 August 1949, to the occupied Palestinian territory, including east Jerusalem, and the other occupied Arab territories (no); Israeli settlements in the occupied Palestinian territory, including east Jerusalem, and the occupied Syrian Golan (no); Israeli practices affecting the human rights of the Palestinians in the occupied Palestinian territory, including east Jerusalem (no); The occupied Syrian Golan (abstained).

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) praised the Canadian stance.

In a statement, CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel welcomed Prime Minister Stephen Harper's and Baird's "principled" support of Israel at the world body.

"The cumulative volume of anti-Israel vitriol these resolutions contain hinders credible UN involvement in moving the conflict toward a peaceful resolution," Fogel said.

"Canadians believe the UN should take a constructive approach to the conflict and focus on peace and reconciliation, not blame and vilification. We can all be proud that these are the values Canada upheld at the UN today."

'Each name has a story'

Two eternal flames, symbols of the link between the past and the future, flank the list of the deceased – dozens of names inscribed along with the remembrance of 18,000 Jewish men and women who served in the Canadian armed forces during World War II.

The memorial, gifted by the veterans to UJA Federation to administer, also recognizes the 1.5 million Jews who served in all the Allied armed forces.

Donations from more than 500 people, including many veterans, added to corporate contributions toward the cost of the monument.

"Each name has a story we will pass on to generations to never forget," said Martin Maxwell, a member of the veterans' board of directors. "We remember them. We thank them all for the tomorrow they gave us."

But Maxwell said Jews shouldn't overlook current problems.

"We see… hatred, and there is a rising tide of antisemitism that should worry us," Maxwell told the crowd. "It's not hard to avoid [hearing] it. Look at Iran, as an example. [The Jewish People] need friends, and the biggest one we have is the prime minister of Canada, Stephen Harper."

After applause for Harper eventually quieted, speaker after speaker paid tribute to the veterans and the memorial, which is intended to become an outdoor classroom.

The other side of the monument has a partial list of those who fought but also returned home from battle. Some are no longer alive, such as Sam Levinson, who died last December. His brother, Alex, a messenger boy at an army field hospital, made sure his 85-year-old brother was recognized for his duties in Europe.

"Young people, the generations who follow us, need to remember that there were Jewish soldiers who didn't hide – they fought the Nazis," said Levin, formerly Levinson, who was born in Poland and lived in the forests of the Ukraine for 18 months.

"I'm free, I'm happy and living in a wonderful country of Canada – but I am also a strong person and need to keep sharing the story of my brother, our family killed by the Germans and what it was like being a Holocaust survivor. One day, my name will be on that monument, too."

Joseph Warner, chairman of the Toronto Post, said he was overwhelmed by the large turnout to see the project become a reality.

"Whether it was Dieppe, Normandy, across Europe and other places, I was part of the 10 per cent of Canada's 160,000 Jews who went to war," said Warner. "The good guys won, the job was accomplished. No memorial can begin to do justice to their sacrifice. What we're doing is a small tribute to them and a promise that they will not be forgotten."

Warner had a message for the younger generation.

"Young people talk about wanting to make a difference, fix the world – I hear it all the time," said Warner. "It was 70 years ago when other young people were called upon to fix a world that went off its rails. The least we can do is remember those people, honour them and treat them with respect."

Montreal schools shelve merger plans

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The plan to merge the two largest Jewish schools in Montreal has been officially abandoned, less than a year after it was announced with high hopes of creating an improved educational system suited to the community's changing demographics.

The decision was made by the boards of the schools: the Jewish People's and Peretz Schools/Bialik High School (JPPS/B) and United Talmud Torahs/Herzliah High School (UTT/H).

The plan, which had the backing of Federation CJA and the schools' boards, will not be revived for the foreseeable future, even though all parties recognize that sustaining two separate mainstream school systems may not be feasible over the long term. Population decline and the attraction of other non-Jewish private schools are the main reasons.

Federation president David Cape said the schools are independent and "ultimately responsible for making the decisions that they believe best serve their students and parent bodies."

JPPS/B and UTT/H were to become one affordable, bilingual "community" school, with the elementary school at what is now the UTT/H Snowdon campus, a middle school to be built next to the nearby YM-YWHA, Bialik in Côte St. Luc to be the senior high school, and a new full high school to be built on the West Island.

Although the schools say they'll try to cooperate more with each other, there will be no administrative merger at any level, officials said.

"The consultation process highlighted the importance of the schools working together, rather than treating each other as competitors," Neil Creme, co-president of JPPS/Bialik with David Shapiro, told the CJN.

Both schools say they are going to concentrate on improving their own pedagogy and governance. UTT/H closed its St. Laurent campus and consolidated at Snowdon this August, which has improved its financial picture, and JPPS/Bialik has made major changes in its senior staff and is reviewing its French section.

Both schools are seeking heads of school, a senior-most professional position recommended by Canadian Accredited Independent Schools (CAIS), a St. Catharines, Ont.-based organization seeking to set best practices for private schools across Canada. The federation is urging all Jewish schools to be accredited by CAIS (formerly CESI).

The merger plan had been opposed or questioned by many parents and teachers. Most were taken by surprise when the school leaders, along with the federation, announced the plan in January. By that point, a detailed course of action, including architectural drawings and a mission statement, had been drawn up. Parents were told that "tens of millions of dollars" from philanthropists who support a major overhaul to Montreal Jewish education hung in the balance.

"While the concept of the merger has much merit and deserved to be explored, after much consultation, feedback and consideration and listening to your views, we have determined that our singular focus at this juncture should be on strengthening our own school to ensure we continue to thrive," Creme and Shapiro wrote to parents Nov. 8. They urge more "arrangements and relationships" with other Jewish schools, not only UTT/H, "while fully maintaining our own distinct identity."

In a Nov. 8 letter to parents, UTT/H president Charles Leibovich wrote: "Although we are, of course, disappointed [about the end of merger discussions], we have been aware since the outset that this was a potential outcome and have simultaneously been heavily engaged in our own institutional strengthening process…

Leibovich declined comment for this story.

As for the fate of the federation's "superfund," JPPS/Bialik told parents – in an apparent reference to the philanthropic support for the merger – that "the initiative is aimed at raising donations from the community on an unprecedented level to provide tuition assistance support for families of all mainstream Jewish day schools. This initiative is independent of the merger talks" between JPPS/B and UTT/H.

In a statement, Cape said, "Federation's role is to ensure accessibility to and excellence in Jewish education in Montreal, and to strive to ensure the long-term viability of the day school system. In this regard, we remain committed to working with our schools to explore all options that would increase accessibility, improve standards of excellence and strengthen their long-term financial sustainability. We will continue to work with our partners to develop innovative ideas for the future of Jewish education in Montreal."

Zaka seeks to create support group in Canada

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Zaka came to international attention 10 years ago when the world looked on in admiration as the vest-clad volunteers busied themselves among the debris of suicide attacks to tend to the wounded and gather human remains, no matter how tiny.

At the time, little was known about the organization, whose primary aim was to provide a proper burial in accordance with Halachah, or Jewish law, to victims of terrorism.

People witnessing their devotion to a sad but necessary task opened their hearts, and their wallets, to support the work. Since then, Zaka, the Hebrew acronym for Disaster Victim Identification, has continued to function, but with the drastic reduction in terrorist attacks, its members spend more time on Israeli highways tending to the victims of road accidents – about 10 per week.

"We save those who can be saved; we honour those who cannot be saved," said David Rose, Zaka's director of international communities liaison.

Rose is expected in Toronto next week to raise awareness about the organization and lay the groundwork for a permanent support group.

The visit will mark Rose's second trip to Canada since May. On that occasion, he met with a number of local rabbis and other potential supporters.

"We'll have small public meetings with businessmen," he said of the upcoming visit.

Rose said Zaka continues to offer contributors a tax-deductible receipt but "it does not have much of a presence in Toronto and Canada. I'm here to teach what Zaka is about, what we do."

"It's a good story," Rose continued. "It's one of the few Israeli organizations recognized by the UN as an NGO, a humanitarian organization to assist in the case of disasters around the world and in Israel."

With more than 1,500 volunteers, 34 ambulances and 162 motorcycles deployed around the country, Zaka offers its service free of charge.

Rose said in recent years Zaka has expanded its mandate and gone international. It has become expert in search and rescue and it sent teams to Japan following the earthquake and tsunami in March. Before that, it dispatched personnel to Haiti following the January 2010 earthquake and it was able to locate the remains of a Montreal Jewish businessman, Alexander Bitton, in the rubble of the Montana Hotel there.

So far this year, Zaka has raised about $15,000 in Canada.

"Ten years ago, when images came through TV of the yellow-jackets of Zaka, people sent [more] support," he said.

Zaka operates on an annual budget of $5 million U.S., the majority of of which is raised in the Diaspora. Rose believes Toronto is a good location for a support group and he anticipates the community could raise as much as $150,000 annually.

Zaka has established "friends of Zaka" groups in Britain, France and the United States. There are similar organizations in Hong Kong and Singapore, he said.

Zaka trains volunteers in Israel and from its associated communities around the world in basic first aid and in the halachic disposition of bodies.

"I don't want to alarm anyone, but we do have experience and we offer training" to assist terror victims or people caught up in natural disasters and even in searching for missing people, he said.

Rose proposes something similar for Canadian Jews, a program that will include training in CPR, search and rescue "and what to do in a trauma situation."

"If God forbids something happens, they'll know what to do and can respond."

Options for kids seeking legal help and for parents denied access

Question: I am fifteen years old. I am currently living with my father and stepmother. I do not live with my mother because of a drug addiction she has had in the past and her failure to appear in court over custody of me. My mother has no custody of me, only visitation rights. I am truly unhappy living with my father because he emotionally abuses me, yet I do not want to live with my mother either. I would really love to live with my grandmother but it doubt it's possible.

I have seen many counsellors and psychologists, yet nothing helps me. I have even contacted children's aid and they do not want to bother with my case either. I just need a place to live where I can feel safe and loved, which is why I would like to live with my grandmother. I feel like my feelings do not matter and I cannot understand why it is so difficult for me to just be happy. Please help me.

Answer: Youth between the ages of 12-17 who need their own lawyers in certain family law situations or in criminal law matters can turn to Justice for Children and Youth, an agency of the Ontario Ministry of Children and Youth Services, by calling 416-920-1633 to see if they can help. They are very kind and helpful.

Question: I have court papers saying that I am allowed to have my son every second weekend. One day my son, who is 10, decided he didn't want to see me anymore. The last time I went to see my son he was not there. My ex told me that the next time I come I have to make an appointment to see him. I called him during the holidays and was talking to him for a few seconds, then the phone went dead. I called back right away but nobody picked up the phone.

I pay a lot for child support. Why bother paying the support if I cannot see my son? Is there anything I can do?

Answer: In law, you've got to pay child support even if you are denied access. But I would recommend that you ask a judge to cite your wife for contempt of court for breaching the court order and threaten her with jail or a large fine if she continues to prevent you from seeing your son. The court could also ask a child therapist to investigate your son's true wishes.

Moldaver named to highest court

He combines an excellent analytical mind, personal integrity and strong writing ability, said Cotler, who was one of five MPs from three political parties who vetted a list of candidates before recommending the final two. The panel held extensive consultations with lawyers and judges to help in their assessment of the candidates.

Bert Raphael, president of the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada, applauded Moldaver's nomination.

"I think it's a great tribute to Canada that religion shouldn't matter, and it's a compliment to our prime minister that he wouldn't be concerned that he'd be criticized for appointing four Jews," said Raphael.

In the 1960s, when he entered the practice of law, Jews could not join the Lawyers Club of Toronto, Raphael said. Many established law firms did not hire Jewish students, and Jewish attorneys often banded together to create their own firms, or they hung up a shingle and went into practice on their own, he said.

Ed Morgan, a law professor at the University of Toronto, called it "a great appointment. He's an excellent judge. The Supreme Court needed strength in his field [of law], criminal law and the constitution."

"I think he's got the right temperament, a kind of middle view… He has a mildly conservative judicial temperament. He's right in the mainstream of Ontario judges."

Moldaver is particularly known in the legal community for his role in the Steven Truscott and Romeo Phillion cases, in which the Ontario Court of Appeal overturned wrongful convictions for murder, Cotler said.

"He wrote the judgment in the Phillion case, and he was a member of the court in the Truscott case and participated in the writing [of the judgment] by Roy McMurtry. Both were exemplary judgments," Cotler said.

The written decision in Phillion "was a masterpiece in terms of the way he addressed questions of fact and law and matters of fresh evidence. It was a masterful judgment," Cotler added.

Moldaver's writings "reflected whatever we heard about him in our consultations, that he had a brilliant legal mind, that he was one of the foremost experts on criminal law in the country, that he was a very clear writer, that his judgments were models of clarity and were accessible to the general public, not just lawyers. We were told he had an excellent analytical mind and this came through clearly in the Truscott and Phillion cases," Cotler said.

Moldaver also brings to the position admirable personal characteristics, Cotler added. "He is a person of integrity, is forthright, honest and genuine. It was reported to us he is a wonderful colleague."

Cotler said concerns that Moldaver is not bilingual – raised by some MPs –should have been put to rest when, in a parliamentary hearing, the justice undertook to learn French. He said critiques of Rothstein, who is not bilingual, are unfounded, as Rothstein never made the pledge to study French. "That question was not put to Justice Rothstein at the time," he said.

Morgan noted that when Moldaver practised law as a defence counsel, "he was sensitive to the rights of the accused," and as a judge he made sure "cases moved ahead and he did not allow constitutional challenges to bog down the courts. Meritorious ones succeeded, but voluminous ones that appeared to delay proceedings" did not.

Morgan said the presence of four Jewish judges on the Supreme Court attests to the fact "the Jewish community has an embarrassment of intellectual riches… there was a lot of well-educated and talented Jewish lawyers to chose from."

Cotler said the two finalists were recommended by consensus by MPs representing the Conservative, Liberal and New Democratic parties. The fact Moldaver's appointment would bring to four the number of Jews on the court never came up. "I take pride in the fact that they're Jewish was not an issue. That never arose, and I think that's a testament to Canada that none of that arose."

Walters addresses Negev Dinner

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Barbara Walters has had many firsts in her long and illustrious career, having interviewed a "who's who" of the most famous people in entertainment and international politics.

She has travelled the world and spoken to and asked questions of world leaders, tyrants and movie stars.

In 1973, she interviewed Israeli prime minister Golda Meir on the Today Show, and in 1977, she made journalism history by arranging the first joint interview with Egyptian president Anwar Sadat and Israeli prime minister Menacham Begin.

Barbara Walters

Last week, Walters was keynote speaker at the 2011 Negev Dinner of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Ottawa, held at the Fairmont Chateau Laurier Hotel. She shared with the audience some life lessons she has learned along the way, gleaned from many of her memorable interviews.

Her interview with Sadat was, said Walters, "the most important interview I have done because he changed history." She said he never wore a bulletproof vest because he said, "I won't die one day sooner than I am called."

She spoke of actor Katherine Hepburn to illustrate women's choices and "balance." Hepburn had told her she lived life the way she wanted to because she had enough money to support herself and was not afraid to be alone. Walters said, "I have had a career, and it has been an amazing career and I have given a lot up to have a career."

Though born Jewish, Walters said she had no religious education and her family was non-observant. "I miss it, but I do feel spiritual," she said. "You need strength of purpose, and then whatever hand you are dealt, I hope you think that the game is worthwhile."

Following her remarks, Walters switched roles and was interviewed by Globe and Mail political journalist Jane Taber.

Funds raised from the 2011 Negev Dinner will be used to support the Sderot Recycled Water Reservoir, enabling the people of the western Negev to solve a serious pollution problem by treating water from surrounding industries and communities for use in agricultural irrigation.

Ruth Lebovich, Judaic academic co-ordinator at the Ottawa Jewish Community School (Hillel division), was presented with the Esther and Eric Exton Educational Award, awarded to the Jewish educator who has most advanced the cause of JNF and Zionist education in Canada. This is the third time that the 30-year-old award has been presented to an Ottawa teacher.

Hadassah's big fundraiser is a mentored affair

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Natalie Berens, co-chair of Toronto Hadassah WIZO's upcoming fundraising event, praises the organization's mentorship program for giving her the skills to plan it.

Mind Power: An Evening with Mentalist Sidney Friedman, to be held Nov. 30 at On the Park Events and Conference Centre, is the organization's largest fundraising endeavour of the year.

She said the event grew out of an initiative in the organization to mentor young leaders.

Sheryl Simon, Hadassah's Toronto Centre chapter president, was mentored in 2009 by past president Sarah Granatowicz. Simon said it was Granatowicz's vision to pair up-and-coming leaders with seasoned ones.

"They set goals together and work on such areas as fundraising, public speaking and sharing the history of the organization."

Simon said that since its inception, the mentoring program has had 16 pairs of mentors and mentees.

"People are chosen in a brainstorming session, in which we identify those who have taken the spotlight."

It's unique program, she said, and Toronto Hadassah is sharing it with other cities, as well as the international organization. "It is a sure way for us to have succession."

Berens herself was mentored by Hadassah member Vivian Sharon. She said Sharon was instrumental in helping her plan the Friedman event.

"She taught me about asking for sponsors, getting advertising for the program book, selling tickets, advertising, and speaking at meetings. She coached me and shared her experiences."

Berens' co-chairs, who are also mentees, she said, were trained "from A to Z about all aspects required to create a successful fundraising event."

The transformative power of daily gratitude

When you are grateful, fear disappears and abundance appears.

Recently, I began hosting a new television series called Finding Your Bliss on Rogers TV, and a few common denominators about bliss have become evident to me. They are things like calming breaths, the power of kindness, generosity of spirit, and always staying in a place of gratitude.

On the program, we have had a

Life Coach Corner

few shining examples of how taking even some baby steps toward your goals can result in books being written and comedy and singing careers launched. Having an action plan can create a giant step toward a more fulfilling life. I am so thankful to watch people step into their light and fulfil some of their dreams and aspirations.

I thought about the concept of gratitude and wondered, "What about tragedy and loss, pain and disappointment, the death of a loved one, the breakup of a marriage. How can one possibly find gratitude in times of suffering? In searching for this answer, I came across this reflection by author Terry Lynn Taylor: "Gratitude is the most direct line to God and the angels. If we take the time, no matter how crazy and troubled we feel, we can find something to be thankful for. The more we seek gratitude, the more reason the angels will give us gratitude and joy to exist in our lives."

In Living Life as a Thank You: The Transformative Power of Daily Gratitude, Nina Lesowitz and Mary Beth Sammons write about how if we focus on the blessings in our life, even in the midst of great adversity, that "gratitude can turn painful memories into gifts."

There's a beautiful story in the book about a young girl who lost her mother to cancer. But just before her mother died, the girl was hospitalized for an infection, and they got to spend one week of uninterrupted time, playing board games, cards and just spent lots of quality time together.

"Today, 25 years later, thinking about that night still brings tears to my eyes. But thinking about those weeks before my mother died makes me smile. It turns out my infection was no accident. It was a gift – a chance to spend uninterrupted time with my mother, to enjoy ourselves and bask in our love for each other. For that I will be forever grateful."

For people facing challenges in their lives, the chapter on Living Life as a Thank You is very helpful for rediscovering how gratitude can create happiness in our lives.

"When you look at the world "through the lens of gratefulness and thanks for what is, life becomes an answered prayer. Grace steps in and we develop a faith that hope is possible," the authors write.

Gratitude can also be used as a spiritual tool in our lives, even with our children. A great exercise is to ask your child to write a prayer of thankfulness. Then ask them to draw a picture to go with the story.

There are studies that show that "gratitude makes us healthier and that giving thanks makes us happier and resilient, and it strengthens relationships and reduces our stress. When we give thanks, we feel more connected to the flow of life, and less alone in our struggles and fears."

האם יש בכלל אפשרות אופראטיבית להשמיד את המתקנים האיראנים? הדעות בישראל חלוקות, כשמספר מנהיגי עבר של מערכת הביון מכריזים באופן ציבורי שאין לזה סכוי.

העיתונות הישראלית קדחת בנושא "הדלפה" של תכנית צבאית מתוכננת. הפטפטת הבלתי נגמרת היא ביטוי ממשי לחרדות קיומיות- שמא פעולה צבאית בלתי מבוקרת תביא לנזק בלתי הפיך.

עוד לא ראיתי את ההצגה, אבל אני יודע אל נכון שכולנו צריכים לראות אותה.

L'Chaim provides essential cancer support

Elizabeth Erlich
Special to the CJN

As the proverbial "soccer mom" with four little kids, I was busy with a life of carpools, school and kids' sports activities. That busy life came to a screeching halt, however, when I was diagnosed with cancer.

Our whole family had to instantly switch gears to concentrate on surgeries, radiation and chemotherapy. I remember saying to my husband at the time, "I feel as though a bomb has gone off in our living room!"

With support from family and friends, I made it through my months of treatment. One of the most valuable types of support, I found, however, was not from family or friends, but rather from other cancer patients.

Through peer support – the support of those who had been there – I learned valuable coping strategies, found an outlet to freely express fears and even shared some laughter as well. And, believe me, when you're battling cancer, laughter is wonderful therapy!

After my treatment, I established the L'Chaim Cancer Support Group for Jewish Women with my dear friend Marci Tenenbaum. Marci unfortunately did not win her battle with cancer, but her spirit and generosity live on in the wonderful group of L'Chaim volunteers.

All L'Chaim volunteers are Jewish women who are cancer survivors, trained to provide confidential peer support to Jewish women facing the stress of treatment for any type of cancer.

It is a privilege for everyone in L'Chaim to pass along peer support to help a newly diagnosed woman in the community "make it through" her treatment. As L'Chaim volunteer Susan Austin said, "We are all dubious initially, believing that we could manage alone or just with our family and friends as support, but often our expectations outweigh the reality. It really helps having someone to talk to – someone who has been through it before."

Guest Voice

L'Chaim volunteer and project co-chair Marsha Urowitz has not only given peer support to Lorene Sweigman, they have become fast friends.

Says Lorene, "I have found my support from Marsha and [found] the warm atmosphere at L'Chaim events really comforting throughout my treatment."

In addition to a "telephone buddy" network, which matches newly diagnosed clients with volunteers who have had a similar experience, L'Chaim presents therapeutic programs for its members, such as music therapy, and educational programs on topics such as fatigue and nutrition.

Equally important are its fun social evenings like the annual Chanukah party, where clients and volunteers can mix, mingle, shmooze and share that all-important laughter.

L'Chaim is a project of National Council of Jewish Women of Canada - Toronto Section. For further information about L'Chaim, call 416-630-0203 or email lchaim@ncjwc-ts.org.

Braising – not so old-fashioned

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

Somehow, along the culinary continuum, braising as a cooking method has gone somewhat out of style. Or perhaps people are simply calling it something else. Well, a rose by any other name is still a rose, and a braised dish will always be a braised dish. And rather a good thing it is too!

Braising is essentially the method by which a food, generally meat but sometimes fish and fowl, is cooked for a lengthy period of time with a small amount of liquid. Sounds a tad boring, but the result is uniquely wonderful. Braising can take a long time like a stew, but it can also be surprisingly fast if you're using fish or vegetables, items that adapt surprisingly well to this technique.

The recipes below showcase this adaptable technique with delicious rewards. The chicken dish is sweet without being overly so, the wine and orange juice co-mingling with the cumin and dates. The fish can be prepared in no time for a sophisticated treat during the middle of the week. And the flank steak is bathed in a spicy tomato sauce that can do double duty as a slather for sandwiches made with any leftovers.

BRAISED CHICKEN WITH ORANGE JUICE AND DATES

4 whole chicken legs, cut into thighs and drumsticks
1/4 cup all-purpose flour
1/4 cup Dijon mustard
3 tbsp. olive oil
1 cup chopped onions
2 cloves garlic, minced
1/2 cup chopped carrots
1 tsp. each ground ginger and cinnamon
1/2 tsp. ground cumin
1/2 tsp. salt
3/4 cup dry white wine
1-1/2 cups chicken broth
1/2 cup orange juice
2 tbsp. tomato paste
1 bay leaf
1/2 lb. dates, pitted and halved lengthwise (or 12 whole apricots)
1/2 cup chopped green pepper
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
1/4 cup chopped fresh coriander or parsley

Preheat oven to 350. Place flour in flat dish. Brush chicken with mustard, dip into flour, shaking off excess. Heat oil in large ovenproof Dutch oven set over medium-high heat. The pan should be large enough to hold chicken pieces in one layer. Sear chicken until golden brown on both sides, remove chicken from pan and set aside.

Reduce heat to medium; add onions, garlic and carrots to pan. Cook until onions are lightly browned, about 3 minutes. Stir in ginger, cinnamon, cumin and salt for 1 minute. Sprinkle leftover flour over onions and cook, stirring until well blended, 2 minutes. Increase heat to high, stir in wine, stirring to scrape up any browned bits from bottom of pan. Stir in chicken broth, orange juice, tomato paste and bay leaf, mixing well.

Return chicken to pan. Bring to boil. Cover and braise in centre of preheated oven for 30 minutes. Add dates or apricots. Cook for about 45 more minutes or until the meat is just starting to fall off the bone.

Using slotted spoon, remove chicken and dried fruit from pan and keep it warm on a plate. Skim off as much fat from sauce as possible. Stir in green pepper. Over medium-high heat, bring sauce to a boil, reduce heat to medium low; boil gently, stirring occasionally, until sauce is slightly thickened, 3 to 5 minutes. Stir in lemon juice. Pour sauce over warm chicken. Sprinkle with chopped fresh coriander. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

BRAISED SHOULDER STEAK

1 thick shoulder steak (about 2 lb.)
1 tbsp. olive oil
1 leek, chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 tsp. dried basil
1/2 tsp. dried thyme
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
1/4 cup beef stock
1 can (28 oz) diced tomatoes
2 tbsp. balsamic or red wine vinegar
2 tbsp. tomato paste
Stuffing:
1 egg
1 cup fresh bread crumbs
1/2 cup finely chopped roasted red peppers
1/3 cup chopped canned artichokes

2 cloves garlic, minced
1/4 cup chopped rinsed green olives
1/4 cup chopped fresh parsley

Preheat oven to 325.

Prepare the stuffing: in a bowl, stir together egg, bread crumbs, red peppers, artichokes, garlic, olives and parsley; set aside.

Lay steak flat on cutting board. Using long, sharp knife held parallel to cutting board and starting at long side, cut steak almost in half, but not all the way through; spread open like a book.

Leaving 1/2-inch border on all sides, spread stuffing over meat. Starting at same side, roll up steak to enclose stuffing. Using kitchen twine, tie steak at 2-inch intervals.

Heat oil in Dutch oven set over medium-high heat. Add steak to pan; brown on all sides. Transfer to plate.

Add leeks, garlic, basil, thyme, salt and pepper to pan and cook, stirring, for 3 minutes or until softened. Stir in beef stock, stirring to scrape up any browned bits from bottom of pan. Stir in tomatoes, mashing until broken up, vinegar and tomato paste. Bring to a boil; boil for 5 minutes. Return steak and any accumulated juices to pan.

Cover and braise in centre of preheated oven for 1-1/2 to 2 hours, spooning sauce over meat halfway through, or until meat is tender. Transfer meat to platter and tent with foil to keep warm. Bring sauce to a boil over high heat and boil for 8 minutes or until thickened. Slice meat and top with sauce. Makes 6 servings.

HALIBUT WITH MUSHROOMS AND VERMOUTH

4 tbsp. butter
5 cups thinly sliced shiitake mushrooms (about 12 oz.)
4 cloves garlic, minced
1/2 cup dry vermouth (or 1/4 cup dry vermouth and 1/4 cup white wine)
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
4 halibut fillets, each about 6 oz. each
1/4 cup chopped fresh parsley
1 tsp. grated fresh lemon rind

In large skillet, melt 3 tbsp. of butter over medium-high heat. Add mushrooms and cook, stirring, for about 5 minutes or until well browned. Stir in garlic for 30 seconds. Add vermouth, lemon juice, vinegar, salt and pepper; bring to boil. Boil for about 2 minutes or until reduced by half. Lay halibut filets over mixture. Season fish with an additional 1/4 tsp. each of salt and pepper. Cover pan, braise for about 10 minutes or until fish flakes easily with a fork.

Transfer fish to serving platter and keep warm. Over low heat, whisk remaining 1 tbsp. of butter into sauce to finish sauce. Spoon sauce over fish. Stir together parsley and lemon rind, sprinkle over fish and serve. Makes 4 servings.

Palestinians continue to seek UN membership

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and his officials emphasized Saturday that they will continue efforts to seek full United Nations membership despite the latest setbacks at the UN Security Council.

A Palestinian application for full UN membership Abbas submitted on Sept. 23 hit a snag on Friday when a committee reviewing it was not able to agree on the application.

The Palestinians also preferred not to call for a Security Council vote after it became clear they do not have the nine votes needed to bring it before the council for a full vote.

Speaking to reporters in Tunisia, where he is on an official two-day visit, Abbas said late Friday that even if efforts at getting full membership fail at this time, the Palestinian Authority will continue in its efforts in the future. He ruled out the possibility of dissolving the PA if the UN efforts fail.

Palestinian Foreign Minister Riyad Malki also said Saturday that these efforts will continue, "even for the 1,000th time," until Palestine is granted full membership. "Our goal is to get full membership," he said, stressing that becoming a non-member state of the UN remains an option that the Palestinians can embark on at any time and most likely get, but it was not the primary goal.

"We always knew that one round to get full membership would not be enough," Malki told Voice of Palestine radio from New York, where he was following up on the Palestinian application.

"The option to join the UN as non-member state is open for us, and we can do it whenever we want," he said. "But our focus is to get full membership because this is what we want."

He said that the PA may opt for a non-member state status, but that will not be an alternative to getting full membership. "If we decide to go for a non-member state, it will be for tactical reasons and to join UN agencies. But this will not be an alternative to efforts to ask the Security Council for full membership," he said. "We do not want to just be observers. We want to be full members."

A UN Security Council committee said on Friday it had failed to reach agreement over a Palestinian application for full membership in the United Nations, the Portuguese UN ambassador said.

The decision by the council's admissions committee brought the PA's push for UN recognition of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, one step closer to collapse.

The Palestinians currently have only eight supporters, diplomats say. If the Palestinian delegation chooses to force a vote without securing nine votes, the United States would not need to use its veto power to block it.

A draft report of the committee, which includes all 15 council members, detailed the deadlock among council members. Now that the committee has formally approved it, the issue will revert back to the Security Council.

"The council will receive the report and will discuss any future initiative," said Portuguese envoy Jose Filipe Moraes Cabral, council president for November.

Israel and the United States oppose the Palestinian bid for membership and recognition of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, with east Jerusalem as its capital, saying it is aimed at delegitimizing Israel. They say the only way the Palestinians can get statehood is via peace talks with Israel.

Ron Arad's letters released

JTA

JERUSALEM — Letters from missing Israeli airman Ron Arad to his wife and daughter have been released to mark 25 years since his capture.

The letters were written in 1986, during his first weeks in captivity. They were handwritten on pages torn from books to his wife, Tami, and his daughter, Yuval, then 15 months old, according to reports.

The family decided to release the letters, which were shown on Israel Channel 2 on the evening of Nov. 3.

Arad was shot down over Lebanon in 1986 and held captive by the Shiite terror group Amal. He is widely presumed to be dead.

In one letter, Arad promises that he will return to his family and never leave them, even if it means not flying again. In another letter Arad tells his wife that he had dreamed about walking together with her and that it made him happy for a few moments.

Some sections of the letters were blacked out at the family's request. Arad reportedly also had tried to provide clues to his whereabouts in the letters.

Ron Arad

Photocopies of the letters were given to the family three years ago during a prisoner exchange that brought the bodies of Israeli soldiers Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser, killed in July 2006, back to their families.

Foreign media say Israel involved in blast

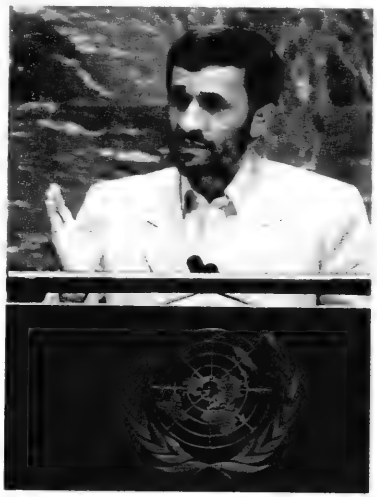
More than a year ago, Iranian computers were hit by the Stuxnet computer virus, which damaged monitoring systems that were used in conjunction with Iran's uranium enrichment centrifuges at Natanz and at the Bushehr nuclear power plant. The Stuxnet virus seriously damaged the Iranian uranium enrichment efforts and knocked more than 1,000 centrifuges out of service. Foreign media outlets have attributed the Stuxnet attack to the Israeli Mossad espionage agency and the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency.

According to recent reports, it appears that Iran has managed to deal with the damage inflicted by the Stuxnet cyber attack, although the number of centrifuges operating at its uranium enrichment facility is still much lower than it was more than two years ago. The resemblance between Duqu and Stuxnet has prompted computer experts to speculate that they were developed and launched by the same undercover entity, although there is no specific evidence of this.



Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

In a separate development, a Revolutionary Guard commander killed in an explosion at an ammunition depot west of Tehran was a key figure in Iran's missile program, the elite military force said in a statement Sunday.

Gen. Hasan Moghaddam was killed together with 16 other guard members Saturday at a military site outside Bidganeh village, 40 kilometres southwest of Tehran. The guard said the accidental explosion occurred while military personnel were transporting munitions.

The guard praised Moghaddam, saying the military force will not forget his "effective role in the development of the country's defence… and his efforts in launching and organizing the guard's artillery and missile units," Fars quoted the statement as saying on Sunday.

On Oct. 12 last year, a similar blast at a Revolutionary Guards munitions store killed and wounded several servicemen in Khoramabad, western Iran. Authorities said the explosion was an accident.

In recent years, several mysterious explosions have taken place in military installations in Iran. Two years ago, 20 people were killed in a similar blast at a base 500 kilometres southwest of Tehran. According to the Washington-based Global Security Institute, the base was used to assemble and store long-range Shihab-3 missiles.

Foreign media have reported in the past that Mossad backs certain opposition activists and underground movements, and uses them to carry out attacks. Iran has blamed the CIA, Mossad and British intelligence in backing Jundollah (God's soldiers), a group that has waged a low-level insurgency in recent years. Its members accuse Iran's mostly Shiite government of persecution and have carried out attacks against the Revolutionary Guard and Shiite targets in southeastern Iran.

A western intelligence source told Time magazine on Sunday that Israel stands behind the recent explosion at an Iran missile base.

"Don't believe the Iranians that it was an accident," the western official told Time. The official also said that more plans to sabotage Iran's nuclear program exist, telling Time, "There are more bullets in the magazine."

Meanwhile, also on Sunday, senior Iranian officials threatened that Iran might withdraw as a signatory to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and from membership in the International Atomic Energy Agency following the release last week of an IAEA report that took Iran to task for its nuclear program. The report cited evidence that the Islamic republic had been carrying out what it called "activities relevant to the development of a nuclear explosive device."

Israeli Prime Minster Benjamin Netanyahu told his cabinet, which discussed the report on Sunday, that up to this point, "international efforts have not stopped Iran from advancing toward a nuclear bomb," adding that the Iranians could obtain it faster than people think. "The IAEA report contains only that evidence that would be admissible in court, but the reality is that there are many other things that we don't see and therefore were not written about in the report," Netanyahu said.

The speaker of the Iranian parliament, Ali Larijani, roundly attacked the IAEA report, saying it was written in accordance with the demands of Israel and the United States. Iran must consider whether to continue its membership in the international nuclear organization, he added. The comments carry special weight because Larijani is considered close to the supreme leader of Iran, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and is a former head of the Iranian national security council, which reports to the ayatollah. In addition, Larijani represented his country in contacts over the Iranian nuclear program with the IAEA and member states of the European Union.

Iran is a signatory to agreements through which it has consented to IAEA oversight of most of its nuclear facilities and has installed cameras and monitoring equipment that send data directly to IAEA headquarters in Vienna. Most of the information contained in the IAEA report released last week was based on evidence gathered through these activities. Additional information was provided by western intelligence agencies from 10 countries.

For years, there have been concerns in Israel and the West that Iran could one day do what North Korea did, and announce its withdrawal from the IAEA and the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. At that point, its nuclear program would not be monitored by any outside agency, and it would be free to advance its covert nuclear program on an accelerated basis to develop nuclear weapons.

Those same sources are of the opinion, however, that if Iran took that step, it would be a clear sign that it was no longer interested in maintaining the appearance of compliance with international conventions and that it unequivocally intended to develop nuclear weaponry.

Katsav conviction upheld

Israel's Supreme Court upheld the rape conviction of former president Moshe Katsav. Last Thursday's ruling confirmed the Tel Aviv District Court's decision last December to convict Katsav on two counts of rape and other sexual offences, and its sentence in March of seven years in prison. The three Supreme Court justices had heard the appeal over three days in August. Katsav, 65, who has been free pending the appeal, was given one month to put his affairs in order and is set to enter prison on Dec. 7. He is the first Israeli president ever sentenced to prison. Katsav was joined in court by his children and other family members, but his wife, Gila, did not attend the proceedings. The Supreme Court justices noted that while they saw no reason to change the district court's ruling, they believed that the sentence issued was harsh. They also acknowledged that the case was very hard on Katsav since it was also tried and decided in the media. Nearly three years ago, Katsav had declined what was seen as a lenient plea bargain – one that dropped the rape charges for lesser charges and likely would have left him with a suspended sentence – saying that he wanted to clear his name in court. A year-long trial was held mostly behind closed doors. Katsav, who immigrated to Israel from Iran in 1951, was elected president by the Knesset in 2000 in an upset over Shimon Peres. Katsav resigned in the wake of the allegations shortly before the end of his term in 2007, and Peres became president.

Pipeline attacked again

The gas pipeline between Egypt and Israel was blown up for the seventh time in less than a year. Last Thursday's attack halted gas flow to Israel again after repairs to the pipeline completed last month had resumed delivery to Israel for the first time since July. It also halted gas delivery to Jordan. The explosion, which was remote controlled, according to reports, took place near the city of Al Arish in the northern Sinai. Egypt supplies Israel with more than 40 per cent of its natural gas needs to produce electricity; electricity prices have risen by more than 10 per cent in Israel since the attacks began. The most recent attack came in late September, when three men fired on the pipeline at a pumping station in the northern Sinai. The Egyptian government said earlier this month that it would tighten security along the pipeline. Selling gas to Israel has been unpopular on the Egyptian street since the opening of the pipeline in 2008. Former president Hosni Mubarak has been accused of giving Israel a sweetheart deal on the gas, since Egypt lost more than $714 million on the pact. Jordan recently agreed to pay a higher price for its gas, Reuters reported. Egypt is expected to demand that Israel also agree to a price hike, according to reports.

Non-religious marriage registered

An organization of modern Orthodox rabbis that performs alternative religious wedding ceremonies for non-religious couples can continue to register the couples. The Tzohar organization can register the married couples in the community of Shoham, where the head of the organization serves as chief rabbi, while a new bill proposed to loosen restrictions on where marriages can be registered works its way through the system, the organization said Thursday. Weddings currently must be registered with the municipal rabbinate where one member of the couple lives. Tzohar had been registering couples with one of two municipal rabbinates headed by members of the organization, in Shoham and Gush Etzion, in contravention of the law. Under Thursday's agreement, the organization can continue to register the couples. A Jewish couple must have a religious ceremony in Israel in order to be recognized as married. Many travel abroad to marry in secular ceremonies. Tzohar helped to involve couples and their families in the ceremony, marrying about 3,000 couples a year free of charge.

The Eichmann trial still reverberates after 50 years

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — In 1961, at the closing of his trial, SS Lt.-Col. Adolf Eichmann, the Nazi who helped orchestrate the Holocaust, reportedly referred to the war as "one of the worst crimes in history."

But former Israeli Supreme Court judge Gabriel Bach, who was a senior prosecutor at the trial in Jerusalem, says this sentiment was made only "because he was fighting for his life.

"I'm justified to be more than skeptical about the reliability or truthfulness of such a remark," Bach told The CJN in an interview at his home in Jerusalem.

Gabriel Bach

"We had proof that he spoke in 1956, when he was in Argentina, to a Dutch journalist. We had the typewritten pages with Eichmann's corrections in his own handwriting," Bach said. "This Dutchman asked him if he felt sorry sometimes for what he had done, and [Eichmann] said, 'Yes, I feel sorry, for one thing that I wasn't hard enough, that I wasn't tough enough, that I didn't fight these damn interventionists enough, and now you see as a result the creation of the State of Israel and the re-emergence of that people there'."

Canada marked Holocaust Education Week this month. The theme was accountability, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Eichmann's trial.

"If any person should be accountable, it's Eichmann," Bach said.

Though Eichmann tried to present himself at his trial as just a cog in the machine, Bach said his research showed that this Nazi criminal frequently used his own initiative to hasten the execution of Jews.

"The evidence was really overwhelming. There were hundreds of documents with his own signature describing what happened. He also didn't deny that he was in charge of the Jewish department of the Gestapo all during the war," said Bach, who following the Eichmann trial was named Israel's state attorney and later an Israeli Supreme Court justice. "We had proof that he even countered [Adolf] Hitler's orders when he saw it might mean saving a few thousand Jews. Toward the end of the war, he said to his friends, 'I know the war is lost, but I am still going to win my war,' and then he went to Auschwitz to get the death rate increased from 10,000 a day to 12,000 a day."

The Eichmann trial is still very much a part of Bach's daily schedule.

"I never had routine cases. I had adventures all the time. Espionage cases, attacks against El Al planes… But there is no case like the Eichmann trial. There's no day that goes by and something doesn't remind me of the trial," said the German-born Bach, who was Eichmann's only contact with the outside world.

His interview with The CJN was given between two other appointments on the same subject that day.

Sitting in his armchair in his living room, he pointed to a black-and-white photograph of himself looking much younger. "That's a photo of me at the Eichmann trial," he said.

A quick look at his bookshelves shows that Eichmann is prominent there, too. Sharing shelf space are family photographs, encyclopedias, art history books and the hardback transcripts of The Trial of Adolf Eichmann.

The 84-year-old grandfather of eight is almost as busy in retirement as he was as a Supreme Court justice.

"I'm astonished, 50 years have passed and interest in the Eichmann trial seems to grow from year to year," he said between sips of Earl Grey tea. "The interest all over the world is getting stronger and stronger. Every week people invite me to speak somewhere."

He has been all over the world as a guest speaker – to Holland, Australia, Japan, Sweden and other countries. Next he is off to Germany to speak about lessons learned from the trial. He also recently returned from the United States where he was honoured with two awards. The Center for the Study of Law and Genocide at Loyola Law School presented him with the inaugural Raphael Lemkin Award. A week later, Creighton University honoured him for "a lifetime commitment to service and justice in the name of humanity."

The trial was a historical event. But, as Bach noted, the positive results to come out in its wake are still being felt today, half a century later.

Bach points to the subsequent trials of death camp commanders and guards following the Eichmann sentencing as the best evidence to combat Holocaust deniers today.

"The terrific importance – in addition to the justice of putting these people on trial – is that we now have a lot of documents from German judges who describe what happened in the death camps," Bach said. "This is of particular importance to fight the people who deny the existence of the Holocaust all over the world."

There were many unforgettable moments in the trial that have stuck with Bach over the years: his first meeting with Eichmann ("Obviously, it was not easy to remain calm in the face of such a man") and survivors' horror stories.

But the most lasting memory etched on his mind was the first day of the trial.

"I'll never forget the first moment of that trial when these judges came into the courtroom with the Israeli emblem behind them and when that man whose only object in life had become to destroy this people, when he got up and stood to attention before a sovereign Israeli court, before a sovereign Jewish state," Bach recalled. "I felt at that moment the importance of the creation of the State of Israel, more than any parade or any demonstration or any article. That was a moment that I think was felt by everyone in the country."

Aspartame-free gum makes inroads in first year

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

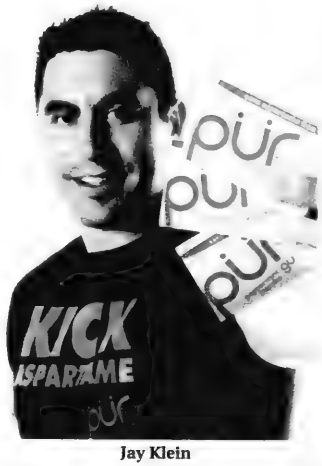
At $1.49 a pack, $13.99 for a case of 12, it takes a lot of gum to register sales of $2 million. But in just one year of business, Pur Gum has done just that.

Entering a market dominated by the Tridents and Juicy Fruits of the world, Pur Gum has carved out a niche catering to those who are looking for a tasty chewing gum that contains no aspartame or sugar.

"We're totally blown away" by the first year's sales, acknowledged Jay Klein, founder, president and CEO of Action Candy Company, makers of Pur Gum. "It's a lot of units."

Klein, 31, introduced the product in May 2010 as he tried to take a bite out of the $20 billion worldwide chewing gum market. It was hard slogging at first, as retailers were reticent about taking on a new product that had no track record, he said.

Getting a foot in the door proved the most difficult part but once consumers tasted one of Pur Gum's three flavours – peppermint, pomegranate mint, spearmint – a fourth, eXcitemint, was added recently – the product took off. Klein, who has a background in marketing, was aggressive in pushing the gum. Once retailers began stocking it, they found it was so popular they had to quickly re-order it.



Jay Klein

Making the pitch to new retailers has become a lot easier. "Now," he said, "you're constantly selling success."

According to Klein, Pur Gum has vaulted to the top of sales in his target market.

"We're the number 1 selling gum in the health food market, available in more than 3,500 stores in Canada the United States, and now the Philippines," he said.

You can find Pur Gum in trendy upscale markets, health food outlets, bookstores and, beginning in 2012, in big box pharmacies.

"We're hoping to double or triple [sales from] where we are today," Klein said. "I'd like to see us at $7 to $10 million in sales in the next 18 months."

Klein got the idea for a new type of gum while running his own advertising firm, Drivertise, which he founded as a way of avoiding his mom's wish he go into law school.

After years of marketing clients' products, he thought it was time to develop his own, one that you could sell in high volumes, was inexpensive and would have good sales in recession or other difficult times.

Aspartame, the sweetener used in sugar-free gums, was man-made, synthetic and linked by healthy-eating advocates to a variety of maladies. Though the U.S. FDA and similar agencies in dozens of countries have approved the additive, Klein saw there is clearly a market for those who want to avoid it. Pur Gum is sweetened by Xylitol, a natural sweetener found in some vegetables and fruits. Ironically, it too is FDA-approved.

In addition to being aspartame-free, Pur Gum is gluten-free, is vegan-friendly and contains no artificial ingredients.

"We worked with food scientists [in Switzerland] to develop what we were looking for," Klein said. "It took a year."

Klein put a lot of his own money into the new product and received an injection of cash from a venture capital group.

"Then you play the game. It's a very difficult market to crack."

In selling gum, Klein is really going back to the future. He began his first business venture as a youngster growing up in West Palm Beach, Fla. "I've always been an entrepreneur," he said. "When I was in sixth or seventh grade, I'd sell lollipops and candies and come home with a pocketful of quarters and dollar bills."

"I never ate the candy – I was disciplined – and I came home with a profit.

"I understand what it takes to make it in the world today."

Though he grew up in south Florida, Klein's family hails from Syracuse, N.Y., and for years he followed in the family tradition by attending Camp Ramah each summer.

His Canadian connection continued when he enrolled in York University. With a network of friends and family in the city, he decided to remain in Toronto following his graduation.

"From a business standpoint, it was a great move," he said. "There are decision-makers in every corporation in Toronto."

When he isn't running the business, Klein keeps busy with charitable work. He volunteers with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, sits on the board of the Jewish National Fund and has been involved with CIJA-PAC.

"I don't think you can give back enough," he said of his volunteer work.

European crisis hits Israel

Ora Coren
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The serial debt crises shaking Europe and the sluggishness of the U.S. economy are already affecting Israel, through exports.

But the Export Institute at the Industry, Trade and Labour Ministry is bracing for a much worse collision, which officials warn could lead to mass layoffs in Israel.

"Exports are already dropping," said Ramzi Gabbay, chair of the Export Institute. Low-tech industry has been hurt but high tech has been hit a lot harder, he said.

The Export Institute has put forward two scenarios for Israel next year, since there's no consensus anywhere in the world as to how the crisis may play out.

The optimistic scenario is that the crisis will continue and possibly worsen a little. The pessimistic one is that it will get a lot worse in the most vulnerable countries, spread to additional countries in Europe and ripple onto a third tier of countries that haven't been directly affected yet but that export to the countries in trouble. Those third-tier countries will then suffer economic slowdowns themselves.

Under the optimistic scenario, Israeli exports will grow by a measly three per cent in 2012, in dollar terms. Under the pessimistic one, exports will drop like a stone, as happened in 2001 and 2008.

Every contraction of one per cent in global economic growth depresses Israeli exports by the same degree, the Export Institute said. Each one per cent drop causes lost revenue of $850 million (US) and costs about 8,000 jobs, it said.

Figures from the past support that thesis. Following the crisis in late 2008, global trade contracted by 11.7 per cent in 2009. Israeli exports, excluding diamonds, contracted by 14 per cent, in dollar terms. Israeli economic growth slowed from 5.4 per cent in 2008 to 0.8 per cent in 2009. Unemployment grew from 5.7 per cent in the second quarter of 2008 to 7.7 per cent a year later.

The sectors most exposed to markets in trouble are pharmaceuticals, jewelry, textiles, clothing, medical equipment, rubber and plastics, said Shauli Katzenelson, chief economist at the Export Institute.

Gabbay's advice is to immediately reinstate a government fund to help companies penetrate new markets, since the traditional export destinations for Israel are in so much trouble. People at the Industry, Trade and Labor Ministry, Finance Ministry and Manufacturers Association of Israel are discussing this very thing. Another crutch to exporters would be to lower the costs of credit insurance for companies exporting to high-risk markets such as India, China and Brazil, but also smaller markets such as Vietnam, Mexico and South Korea, said Gabbay.

Jeff Silverman on the business of being funny

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Jeff Silverman knows a thing or two about funny.

In the business of comedy for more than 30 years, Silverman is the business side of iconic Canadian comedy club franchise Yuk Yuks. He recently published his first and only book, Funny Business: Business Lessons with a "Cents" of Humour (Burman Books).

The book is peppered with terrific anecdotes about the wackiness and unpredictability of the comedy world, particularly the business side as Silverman lived it.

It is co-authored by Drew Tapley.

As president of the comedy-club chain, Silverman has the less glamorous role in the upper echelon of management at the comedy club. His partner, CEO Mark Breslin, the public face of the company, is the one who hangs out with the stars of the comedic world and attends the numerous high-profile galas and events to shmooze with celebrities and politicos.

Missing out on all that glitz has never fazed Silverman. In fact, he prefers the role of second banana at the organization, as he's more comfortable remaining lower profile, he said.

Speaking to The CJN after the book's release, Silverman, 62, recalled how the world of comedy is a crazy one, populated with extreme personalities, unmanageable egos and also very generous individuals.

In the book, Silverman calls Yuk Yuks "Canada's national standup comedy company." And it's hard to argue against.

With clubs in 18 cities across Canada – with the notable exception of Montreal, which the company is working on, he said – the chain is the de facto comedic farm system for Hollywood's comedy big leagues. High-profile comedians such as Jim Carrey, Howie Mandel and Russell Peters, to name but a few, all started out at Yuk Yuks. No other comedy organization in Canada rivals Yuk Yuk's scope.

While all have since departed for more lucrative careers, Silverman takes pride in the fact that all of them have remained on great terms with him and credit both he and Breslin with helping them become the stars they are today.

"Our hope is that we treat up-and-coming comedians right, and when they get to be bigger [stars] they treat us right," he said. And that's generally been the case, Silverman added.

Comedy is an "unconventional business," he writes. And Silverman has had his share of unconventional experience in that world.

A native New Yorker, Silverman came to Canada in 1976 and almost immediately ventured out into the entertainment realm.

Jeff Silverman, president of the comedy-club chain Yuk Yuks

His CV lists an impressive roll of operating some of Toronto's prime entertainment venues of the 1970s, including the 99 Cent Roxy repertory movie theatre, the New Yorker Theatre and, most notably, the Horseshoe Tavern.

Silverman had a hand in bringing top music acts to the city in the 1970s. Acts such as the Ramones, the Police, Tom Waits, Joan Jett and Patti Smith all played to appreciative Toronto audiences, thanks to his networking and business acumen.

In 1980, Silverman took a chance on launching the country's first late-night variety TV show, The All-Night Show, which was described as a "fusion of zany experimental television."

While it lasted only a year, the show convinced Silverman that comedy was the world he was intended to inhabit, albeit managerially.

Last month, The All-Night Show was added to the archival collection at the Canadian Broadcast Museum Foundation.

While working in the mid-1980s producing concerts for the CBC and the Molson Amphitheatre, and a brief career as the account director for the O'Keefe Centre (now the Sony Centre) in Toronto, he caught the eye of Breslin, who hired him in 1986 as Yuk Yuks' vice-president of marketing and promotions.

Breslin then made Silverman partner and president of the company in 1990, the job he's held ever since.

For Silverman, the expansion of Yuk Yuks across Canada and the United States, to cement it as the premier club chain in North America, is what drives him today.

In the book, he discusses how he'd considered retiring a few years ago. "I made my money, and I was hoping this company would run forever and just send me cheques," he writes.

But a revolt by some of the company's franchises in Western Canada made him rethink retirement.

"It then dawned on me that for 20-something years, those people ran our clubs out west and never tried to expand. So now I'm on a mission to open five new clubs out west," Silverman writes.

And so the business of comedy continues.

Silverman has the following advice to comedians and would-be comedy sector entrepreneurs alike: "There's more to the business than just your performance. People have to laugh, yes. But you have to be a person who knows how to work with people off the stage, too.

"Know about your rights. What are you keeping and what are you giving away? There's so much more to successful comedy. Every one of the people who've made it, Mandell, Peters, Carrey… they have a drive beyond just wanting to perform on stage."

Asked who his favourite comedian is, Silverman said he's "more of a Jerry Seinfeld guy." But above all, he idolizes comedians of a bygone generation.

In one anecdote told to The CJN, he recalled how years ago he unsuccessfully tried wooing a then-geriatric Groucho Marx to come do his act in Toronto.

Calling him up at his home to offer the legendary comedian the gig, Silverman asked, "Groucho, do you travel?"

Marx's snide response: "Yeah, from room to room."

"That is one of my greatest memories. I'll never forget that line," Silverman said. "I love the younger comics that everyone knows now. But the real thrills in my job have been the chance to touch those [comedians] I grew up watching."

Photography exhibit explores eternal Jerusalem

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Jerusalem has seen many changes over the last century, but the threads that hold the city together aren't as different as one might think.

Torontonians will have the chance this week to see a collection of photographs of Jerusalem from the late 1800s to 1948, provided by the Old Yishuv Court Museum in Jerusalem, as well as the work of young Canadian photographer Meredith Holbrook, in the exhibit Jerusalem, From There Till Eternity.

"There's emotion in everything – the buildings, the history, the people," said Andre Souroujon, the owner of Pikto Gallery, where the exhibition will open on Nov. 17.

Despite the time gap between the historical photographs and Holbrook's recent ones, Souroujon added, many of the works capture the spirit of the city in a similar way. "It's not just about the city. It's about the people and the relationships and how they relate to the city," he said.

The Jerusalem Foundation, in conjunction with the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem (ICEJ) Canada, is organizing the exhibition. The Jerusalem Foundation supports cultural and community initiatives that improve the quality of life for Jerusalem residents. The ICEJ is an Evangelical Christian organization that focuses on supporting Israel and educating others about its social and political challenges.

Ian Leventhal, the executive director of the Jerusalem Foundation in Toronto, said photography is ideal for representing the passage of time in Jerusalem, especially given the nearly 150-year span of the photos. He said the exhibition will show "what Jerusalem looked like in the past, through the good times and the bad times."

Holbrook, who also goes by the artist alias Merry Somers, has been moving between Jerusalem, Toronto and Vancouver for the last four years. The 20-year-old freelance photographer and photojournalist spent much of that time interning with the ICEJ media department. Her mother, Donna Holbrook, is the national executive director for the ICEJ Canada.

"It's always been a part of my family, going to Israel and supporting Israel," she said.

Holbrook jumped at the opportunity to take part in the exhibition. "I was so excited – this is a really big deal to me," she said, adding that, with so much bias in the usual media images of Israel, she was eager to take more accurate pictures.

"She photographed Jerusalem in a very open and honest way," Souroujon said. He explained that Holbrook's background in photojournalism gives her a different perspective from which to shoot the Holy City.

Holbrook said she is looking forward to showing her work in Toronto, her home city, where many of her friends know little about Jerusalem or Israel in general. She began shooting for the exhibition a year and a half ago.

"It's a very diverse and interesting city," she said, something that she worked to capture with her camera.

Souroujon said the diversity and the controversy of Jerusalem are evident in both the older photographs and Holbrook's pieces. Jerusalem, he said, has an eternal and unique quality that shows up in the pictures from all over the city.

"It's life lived in a very intense way, and it's reflected in every part of Jerusalem."

The exhibition runs at Pikto Gallery, 55 Mill St., Building 59-103, Nov. 17 to 21, with an opening on Nov. 17 and a gallery party Nov. 19. For tickets to the opening reception, contact Liana Shlien at lshlien@jerusalemfoundation.ca. Proceeds will go to the Jerusalem Foundation's Project Canada Club in the refurbished Morasha Community and Cultural Centre in central Jerusalem, which provides Jerusalem youth and young adults of all faiths with recreational and educational programming.

This photograph of a flourishing tree in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem is on display in the exhibit Jerusalem, From There Till Eternity, at the Pikto Gallery, Nov. 17 to 21. [Meredith Holbrook photo]

The '3 Dreidels' perform for Chanukah

Michelle Bitran
Intern

This Chanukah, there will be three spinning dreidels that you won't want to miss.

The festival of lights will bring the first-ever collaboration of children's entertainment duo Sonshine and Broccoli and children's singer Kayla for a holiday concert and party. The three have named themselves "The 3 D's," with the "D" standing for dreidels.

Lisa Sonshine and Brock (Broccoli) Burford have been performing together for about eight years, and Kayla has been a children's entertainer for more than 20 years. They met at a concert of children's entertainers a year ago and almost immediately came up with the idea to collaborate.

"Beyoncé would collaborate with Celine Dion, why wouldn't Sonshine and Broccoli collaborate with Kayla?" said Sonshine, laughing.

She added that she and Burford are thrilled to be working with Kayla, a pioneer of the children's entertainment industry in Toronto. "Kayla started this all," she said. "She started children's music and sing-along circles in Toronto."

Though their singing styles are different – "a lot of Kayla's songs are more storytelling, and a lot of Sonshine and Broccoli songs are more rocking out," said Burford – they worked to create a cohesive show, combining their different styles. "It's not my show, your show – it's our show," said Kayla.

The three settled on a Chanukah show to give Jewish families a fun activity at a time of year when many children's shows tend to be Christmas-themed. "There's not so much out there for Jewish kids around the holiday time," said Sonshine. The last time Sonshine and Broccoli had a Chanukah show was three years ago, and they felt they were long overdue for another one.

The three entertainers regularly perform for different communities, but the idea of a special Chanukah performance was an exciting prospect for them. "Being Jewish, it gives us an opportunity to share our heritage, our roots," said Kayla.

The Spinning Tops Chanukah Concert and Party features the trio, as well as a full band, a DJ from Superfly Entertainment and a balloon maker. "It's a family event – there's really something for everyone," said Kayla.

Sonshine, Burford and Kayla have decided to donate partial proceeds from their ticket sales to Three to Be, a charity that supports research for treatments and therapies for childhood neurological disorders. Supporting a children's charity was important to the three artists, as they perform mainly for kids.

For Sonshine, the best thing about performing for children is not just the delight it brings them, but the fun in creating the material. "It's the biggest joy to be able to get into the mind of a child," she said.

Since announcing their collaboration, The 3 D's are finding that young fans and their families are counting the days to the big event. Sonshine said she and Burford have been stopped several times by eager parents and kids while they were out running errands. "The feedback I've gotten so far is that people can't wait. They're so excited!" she said.

For tickets to the Chanukah concert and party, on Dec. 4 at 11 a.m. and at 4 p.m., at Bayview Glen Upper School, call 1-800-838-3006 or visit www.brownpapertickets.com/event/208208. For more information, visit www.sonshineandbroccoli.com.

TONY AWARD-WINNING PLAY FOCUSES ON ARTIST MARK ROTHKO

Recently featured in Toronto as part of the Art Gallery of Ontario's popular AbEx exhibit, the works of Dvinsk-born American painter Mark Rothko (1903-1970) have sold for as much as $72.8 million and are featured in collections around the world. Rothko and his art are also the focus of Red, a Tony Award-winning play that makes its Canadian première in Toronto this week courtesy of the Canadian Stage Company.

Written by screenwriter and playwright John Logan (Gladiator, The Aviator) and set in the artist's studio in the late 1950s, Red explores Rothko's life and work as he is commissioned to create a major series of murals for a Manhattan hotel. The recognition that the lucrative project will reduce his paintings to decorative backdrops sparks a passionate debate between Rothko and his assistant about the importance and relevance of art in the face of fame, fortune and commercialism.

St. Lawrence Centre, Bluma Appel Theatre, 27 Front St. E. Nov. 19 to Dec. 17 (opening night, Nov. 24). Tickets $22 to $99. 416-368-3110, www.canadianstage.com. Visit the online Mark Rothko Experience at ExperienceRed.ca.

Timeless Art: Moses Znaimer, founder of Zoomer Media, has curated Timeless, an art exhibition on aging and immortality that combats the popular notion that "aging means decline." Au contraire, according to Znaimer, who coined the term "Zoomer" to describe persons of a certain advanced or senior age. "In many ways, this is the happiest time in people's lives," he said. "As they age, Zoomers reveal and exhibit creativity and compassion. They seek to express themselves and to do good."

About two dozen artists are represented in the show, at the Twist Gallery, 1100 Queen St. W., to Nov. 27. 416-588-2222, www.twistgallery.ca

Israel Show Comes to the United States: Sony Studios has acquired the rights to Life Isn't Everything (Chayim Ze Lo Hakol), a popular Israeli sitcom that would be made anew and distributed by CBS in the United States. The longest-running and top-rated show in Israel, Life Isn't Everything focuses on a divorced couple, Gadi and Daphne, who discover they are as bad at divorce as they were in marriage and who can't stop interfering in each other's lives. More than 150 episodes of the show have been produced so far over nine seasons. American writer-producer Mike Sikowitz (Friends, Rules of Engagement) will collaborate on the U.S. version of the show with its Israeli creator, Daniel Lappin.

Now you can buy model's undeez

JTA

NEW YORK — Israeli model Bar Refaeli revealed that she is starting an online casual lingerie company called Undeez.com with fellow Israeli model Dudi Balsar.

The website, which is expected to be online this fall, and the merchandise is billed as basic and for everyone. According to the Israeli financial newspaper Globes, Undeez has raised $1 million from Israeli investors.

Balsar came up with the idea, and Refaeli is responsible for marketing and business development. She's hoping to use her popularity as leverage.

Refaeli told Elle magazine that through Undeez, "you'll be able to buy clothes — underwear, socks and T-shirts for men and women — in very soft, basic fabrics. I started the site with a friend because when I like a pair of underwear, I'll get 30 pairs of it in the same colour. But I don't have time to go buy underwear all the time. And I had boyfriends who were the same way — they never had time to go buy socks and underwear, that's for sure! — so this website is great because after subscribing, you get these necessities sent directly to you each month."

Gilad Sharon on the life of his father Ariel

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

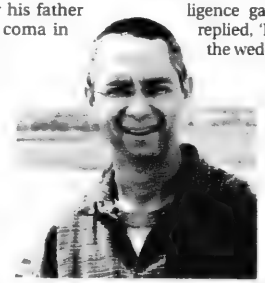
Being the leader of Israel is one heck of a tough job. But if you do it right, it's one of the most rewarding.

Those are just two of many lessons contained in Gilad Sharon's newly released memoir and ode to his father titled Sharon: The Life of a Leader (HarperCollins).

The 625-page tome – replete with archival photos, maps and personal correspondence – is the culmination of more than four years of research and interviews by the youngest son and confidant of former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon.

He embarked on writing it just after his father famously lapsed into a stroke-induced coma in early 2006 while still in office.

As the title suggests, the book spans the life of the senior Sharon, from his youth spent learning how to care for the land from his Zionist, agrarian-minded parents, through to his turbulent military career and ending with his role as the leader of Israel.



Gilad Sharon

Throughout, Gilad provides readers with a candid look at how Ariel Sharon's dogged determination to safeguard the land of the Jewish people helped inform both his military and political decision-making. He also shows how his father's no-nonsense, straightforward approach to interpersonal relationships helped win him the respect, and in some cases solid friendships, of many world leaders.

Speaking to The CJN from St. Louis while on tour promoting the book – he spoke in Toronto last Thursday – Gilad said putting the memoir together was an absorbing and exhausting experience.

"I felt responsibility to share all the stories and events I witnessed with my father. It was fascinating," he said. "Looking through my father's archives, I'm not sure even he remembered having all those letters."

In the book, Gilad notes that his father meticulously kept records of conversations, letters, maps, articles and speeches involving his activities in Israel and abroad. These turned out to be a treasure trove for use on the book.

The material, once compiled, turned up letters from iconic Israeli figures such as Moshe Dayan, David Ben-Gurion and Golda Meir as well as from numerous world leaders and, Gilad added with amusement, from a bevy of adoring women who all wanted to make Ariel's acquaintance over the years.

Some of the latter letters are smattered throughout the book and add some levity to the otherwise weighty material within.

Asked how his father is today, Gilad said doctors describe Ariel as being in a state of "minimal consciousness."

"When he's asleep, he looks like he's the sleeping lord of the manor. He looks strong, healthy. And he hasn't lost weight. In fact, he's gained some pounds and no one knows how," Gilad said with a laugh. "We love him and miss him and his great sense of humour."

When awake, he said, his father is somewhat more responsive these days, moving fingers when asked and making eye contact. While it's impossible to know if his father can ever make a full recovery, Gilad said he hasn't lost hope.

Doctors initially said there was no way he could survive the stroke, but once he did, Gilad said he was told by Ariel's surgical team that they couldn't provide a long-term diagnosis "because no one had ever survived such a thing."

That answer just proved what the Sharon family already knew about their father, Gilad said; namely, that Ariel Sharon is a survivor. He's survived all the wars he fought in. He'd survived all the political machinations devised against him when he first entered politics, and he continues to defy the odds to this day by not succumbing to his medical condition.

As for Ariel's recollections of Canada, Gilad said his father had good relations with former Canadian prime minister Paul Martin, even briefing him on the gravity of the growing threat of a nuclear Iran in 2004.

"My father even called Martin up to congratulate him on his son's upcoming wedding in 2004. Martin was surprised that Ariel knew about this and complimented Israeli intelligence gathering. To which my father replied, 'If we were able to learn about the wedding, you can imagine we know other things as well,'" Gilad said.

He added that his father "appreciated a lot" Canada's stance against global terrorism and Islamic fundamentalism, and the country's historic role in fighting against Nazi Germany in World War II.

With regards to recent reports that Iran could soon acquire nuclear weapons capability, Gilad said if his father was still in office, he believes Ariel would "never allow that to happen."

As for the ongoing peace process with the Palestinians, Gilad said his father, who made the decision for Israel to unilaterally withdraw from the Gaza Strip in 2005 in the hopes of furthering the process, understood that it was likely a futile effort.

Gilad said his father began talking about creating a demilitarized Palestinian state in Gaza and the West Bank as early as the mid-1970s to try and circumvent more bloodshed between the two peoples. But the Palestinians have never shown they truly care about the actual land dispute, he said.

"My father said for many years that our dispute [with the Palestinians] was not territorial. The source of the conflict is the fact that the Palestinians never recognized... a Jewish state," he said. "That's the reason you can't find a map of Israel in textbooks in any Arab country. Not even the ones we have peace agreements with."

After his book-promotion tour ends, Gilad said he looks forward to returning home to his family farm and recommencing his visits with his father.

"I wrote this book by hand. My wife typed it. My brother, Omri, read and edited... my children were involved because I was so busy with it. It's been a major part of their life. This has been a family project."

On whether he's ever considered following in his father's footsteps in politics, Gilad said right now all he wants is to "spend time on the farm and go horseback riding with my kids. I don't know what will be in the future."

Slugger Green describes baseball in new book

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — Former Toronto Blue Jay slugger Shawn Green shared the secrets of his success in his book, The Way Of Baseball: Finding Stillness at 95 MPH, at two recent Jewish Book Fair events held in Miami, Fla.

Released in June and co-written by Gordon McAlpine, the second-best Jewish hitter in major league baseball history (following Hank Greenberg) attributes his success on the field to "stillness," a concept derived from Zen and other Eastern philosophies, which allowed Green to concentrate on his hitting.

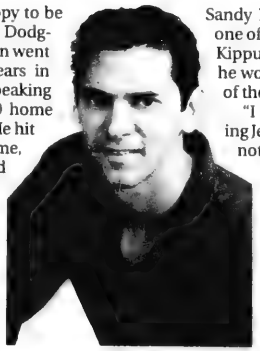
The 220-page book is a quick read and describes Green's 14-year journey in the big leagues. It is instructive to young ball players on how to hit effectively. Green practiced hitting the baseball on a tee, hitting ball after ball daily with a focus. Green felt that his best years hitting (1999 and 2002) were also the years he mastered the discipline and his off-years occurred when he was not "living in the moment."

For Blue Jay fans, the best part of the book includes anecdotes about his friendship with fellow Jay Carlos Delgado and his less than amiable relationship with former Blue Jay manager Cito Gaston.

"Cito did not think that I could run well or play defence, and I was not an everyday player in the lineup when I made the roster in 1994. It was disappointing. I concentrated more on hitting on the tee and look at the era as a growth period for me," said Green at the Posnack JCC Jewish Book Festival.

Green blossomed once Gaston was fired as manager in 1997, showing he was more than a hitter. He hit 35 homers and stole 35 bases in 1998. In 1999, he earned a Gold Glove for his defence, hitting 42 home runs, batting .309, earning a berth on the American League all-star team while finishing fifth in voting for the most valuable player in the league.

Knowing that Gaston was rehired as the Jays hitting instructor in 2000, Green asked for a trade and was happy to be sent to the Los Angeles Dodgers, near his home. Green went on to have his best years in baseball as a Dodger, peaking in 2002 when he hit 49 home runs, a Dodger record. He hit four homers in one game, batted in 125 runs and played for the National League all star team.



Shawn Green

Green was traded to Arizona following the 2004 season, then traded again in 2006 to the New York Mets. His post-Dodger years were rather lackluster. He retired at age 34 following the 2007 season to spend more time with his wife and two daughters in Los Angeles.

Although Green's career statistics are impressive (328 HR, 1070 RBI) and he's a likely shoo-in for the International Jewish Sports Hall Of Fame in Israel, he doubts his statistics are worthy enough for the Baseball Hall Of Fame.

"I played in an era in which steroid use was widespread and I wanted no part of it. I knew which guys used them. You don't show up at spring training with an extra 20 pounds of muscle and not know how the guy got that way. So, as good as my stats are, there are the guys who had inflated numbers through steroids and that makes a mess of all the players from my era," said Green.

Another highlight of the book is Green sharing anecdotes about not playing on Yom Kippur on three occasions, including discussing the topic with former great Sandy Koufax. Koufax sat out game one of the 1965 World Series on Yom Kippur and became a legend when he won the seventh and final game of the series for the Dodgers.

"I have always felt proud of being Jewish and felt it was important not to play on Yom Kippur. I had to compromise in 2004 because we had a night game on Yom Kippur eve followed by a day game on Yom Kippur. I played the night game (Green hit a two run home run to win the game 3-2 for the Dodgers) and sat out the day game. I wanted to be fair to my Jewish background as well as my teammates and fans," said Green.

For those expecting the book to be a chronicle of Green's childhood and growing up Jewish, there are no revelations, except for the Yom Kippur anecdotes.

Green stated he is a private person and did not want to write a memoir of his life. Fortunately, those that choose to see Green on his still continuing book tour will hear of his fond memories of his father and the Toronto Jewish community.

"My dad was my biggest fan. He was a great basketball coach and taught me how to hit as a youngster.

"While playing with the Blue Jays, I went with Dr. Glenn Copeland to High Holy Day services each year and was asked to speak by a number of synagogues in Toronto."

Although retired, Green hopes to play for Israel at their World Baseball Classic game in 2013.

Major leaguers to help Israel field baseball team

JTA

NEW YORK — Three Jewish former major leaguers will help Israel field a competitive team in next year's World Baseball Classic.

Shawn Green, Brad Ausmus and Gabe Kapler met last week in Los Angeles with Israeli baseball officials and promised to help out, the players told Associated Press.

It's unclear whether any of the three would play for Israel themselves, AP reported, although Green said he would help "in any capacity."

"If I felt like that was a role that the team needed, I would prepare for it," he said, adding, "I feel a strong connection to Israel, and it would be an honour to put on the uniform."

Peter Kurz, the Israel Association of Baseball's secretary general, told AP that one of the three former ballplayers will likely be the Israeli team's manager, and that all of them will help with coaching, recruiting and fundraising.

Israel will be one of 16 countries invited to play in next year's qualifying round, and the top four teams advance to the 2013 World Baseball Classic.

"Today, the idea of bridging the gap between the generations of American-Jewish baseball fans and baseball fans in Israel is an enticing prospect," Ausmus wrote in an e-mail. "Hopefully, this is the beginning of renewed and long interest in baseball in Israel."

Twitter offers 'radical connectivity' at GA

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

More than any of the content at this year's General Assembly of the Jewish Federations of North America, what fascinated me was the effect of social media – particularly Twitter – on the conference itself, and more broadly, on the Jewish community.

Although this was my seventh GA as a reporter, I'm a relative newbie to Twitter, having opened my account in June. Before the Nov. 6-8 meeting in Denver, Colo., I'd never tweeted from an event I was covering.

I discovered that not only was it not considered rude to use my BlackBerry while presenters were speaking, it was encouraged. One moderator instructed us, "Please feel free to tweet throughout the session. It will enliven our discussion. It will spread the word."

The online social media service features succinct "tweets" of up to 140 characters at a time, appearing onscreen in a personalized newsfeed from people, organizations and publications that Twitter users follow.

Instead of perusing my usual incoming collection of tweets, I searched for the hashtag #jfnaga (a Twitter identifier) to focus on GA-related posts. The posts were also available on a screen outside the main exhibit hall.

With multiple sessions being held concurrently – in one case 10 at the same time – and a constant stream of new tweets, highlights of other sessions were readily available.

Here's one from Nov. 8, tweeted by the Samuel Bronfman Foundation: "R @Kaunfer at closing plenary: obligation can be incredibly freeing. A key Jewish teaching that we aren't the centre of the world." The "@Kaunfer" refers to the GA's rabbi-in-residence Rabbi Elie Kaunfer, co-founder and executive director of Mechon Hadar in New York.

In some ways, Twitter addresses the concern I heard one student share with another: "Wherever you are, you feel like you're missing something somewhere else." I read many of the thousands of GA-related tweets that were sent out, although I only sent out a dozen myself. Logistically, it was easier to focus on using my notebook, tape recorder and camera without adding too much tweeting into the mix.

It was reported after the GA that the total number of conference-related tweets were 9,465; total twitterers, 922; total hashtags tweeted, 842; total URLs tweeted, 1,336. The oldest tweet was Aug. 22, and the most recent tweet was Nov. 10.

I did use Twitter to congratulate Toronto's Shauna Waltman, director of UJA Community Connect, for the Young Professional award she received at the GA, including a link to a picture of her receiving the award.

I also tweeted from a session that used an innovative format to address dissenting voices in the Jewish community. It struck a chord with attendees, and I keyed in, "Kudos from audience at Big Blue Tent re play at Makom session. 'Realistic.' Re hypothetical anti-Zionist play. How to deal." Tweets, unlike published articles, are immediate and "raw," having never been vetted by a copy editor.

Andres Spokoiny – president and CEO of the Jewish Funders Network in New York and former CEO of Montreal's Federation CJA – said that social media like Twitter and Facebook offer "radical empowerment with radical connectivity."

Speaking at a session called "Federation of the Future," he said that individuals are now "hyper-empowered. We live in a time where the individual has access to change the world, or he believes so. Somebody on Facebook can invoke a demonstration that can topple a 30-year-old regime."

From a federation perspective, he noted, donors also want to be empowered and "take ownership."

As well, the change in technology means that people don't have patience any more, he said. "Who's going to have a 10-year plan?"

Alexander Strain, left, as a Jewish community CEO, and Laura Giannarelli as an anti-Zionist playwright, were part of a session on The Big Blue Tent and Jewish Dissent at the Makom session.

Spokoiny said top-down structures are no longer going to work, and that changes have to be made now. "Organizations need to stop being hierarchical and start being more organic. Our identity is now a patchwork."

Federations need to act as convenors, facilitators and catalysts, he said. "It is about convening people who are self-organizing… Inclusiveness is not optional. In a polarized world, it's a necessity."

Rabbi Hillel Goldberg, executive editor of the Intermountain Jewish News in Denver, wrote in a GA supplement to his paper. "At a minimum, Jews need to talk to each other. All Jews. Otherwise, we weaken."

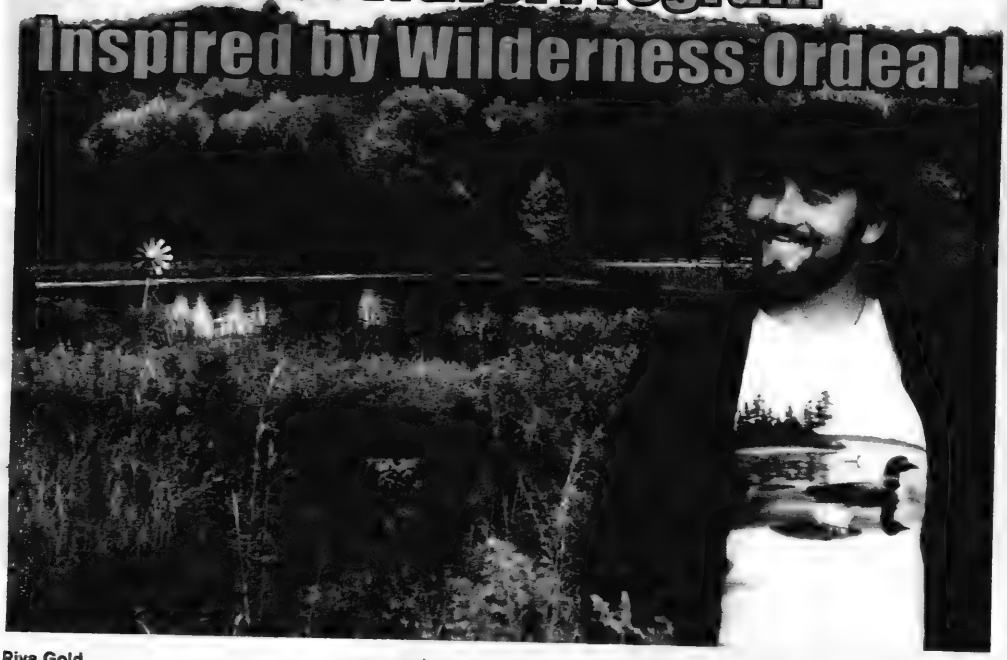
Creator of Travel Program Inspired by Wilderness Ordeal



Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

When Evan Malach, 26, found himself lost in the wilderness without food or shelter, in desperation he recalled survival tips offered by host Les Stroud on the reality TV show Survivorman.

Malach was able to start a fire, find a trail and make his way to the nearest village before hypothermia set in, using what he had learned watching the legendary outdoorsman's show.

"I was a pretty hard-core snowboarder at the time, and I had gone off on my own in the out-of-bounds area of Whistler's Blackcomb Mountain," Malach recalls. "But I quickly realized I was lost and didn't have an exit plan."

After hours of fruitless wandering, Malach found himself completely unprepared to brave the wild for the night. "I tried to get rescued by waving at gondola riders, but I wasn't able to get spotted. I was freezing and I was scared, but then I thought of Les Stroud – if he could do it, I could too."

Malach made a fire that night and built a makeshift bed out of pine needles. Just before his phone battery died – before it occurred to him that he might need to call for help – he received a text message that would change his life.

"My friend wrote to me out of the blue, saying, 'What we have done for ourselves alone dies with us. What we have done for others and the world lives on and is eternal.' I knew I wanted to spread that message."

Twenty-eight hours later, he was able to get back on track by following footprints to a nearby village. And today, having safely returned from his Whistler snowboarding misadventure, Malach, a Thornhill native, is working in Toronto to give survivors of all types of journeys a chance to travel the world.

"After surviving the cold, I realized how important it is to open our eyes to the majestic beauty this world has to offer," he says. "I've been so lucky to have the opportunity to travel. Travel is a significant rite of passage, but so many people don't get that chance."

Inspired by his ordeal, Malach, who is no stranger to the concept of tikkun olam (he was featured in Heebonics in 2009 for organizing a fundraising rock concert for the victims of the Darfur genocide), beat out hundreds of other applicants in the American Express Canada's Room for Thought program.

The program called for submissions from people who wanted to turn a big idea under the categories of community, music or travel into reality.

One winner from each category would be given the opportunity to work with mentors Free the Children co-founders Craig and Marc Kielburger, Metric lead singer and songwriter Emily Haines and Stroud.

Malach's idea to create a program that offers underprivileged youths who've overcome major obstacles a chance to go on an adventure abroad was selected as the winner for the travel category, giving him the opportunity to work with Stroud.

The two are currently developing the Second Chance Travel Co-op program. One aspect of the initiative will send volunteers – who have survived hardships themselves – to work with those struggling with their own quests for survival.

"We want to bring survivors in as ambassadors to help with water-filtration projects in Africa, build schools in Equador, that sort of thing. I want people who've gone through any sort of hardship – cancer, addiction, abuse, you name it – to have a chance to propel themselves forward in positive ways and help others with their own survival journeys," he explains.

Malach says that travelling teaches people about the many things that unite them, rather than what sets them apart.

"So I want to provide a chance for worthy survivors to use the lessons they've learned, their sense of gratitude to be able to make the world a better place."

Aside from Stroud, Malach says his family was a major source of inspiration for his charity work. His dad, who died last year, volunteered for many years, and his grandparents were Holocaust survivors.

"They endured so much and are a constant source of inspiration," he says.

Last summer, Malach decided to volunteer at a camp for children with cancer, an experience he found particularly rewarding.

"Working with young people who have had to stare mortality in the eye makes every waking breath and moment all the more inspiring," he says.

"They're so positive and grateful, open to learning, and excited for every day even though they've had almost everything taken away from them."

Malach's survival experience also led him to write a spiritual memoir, Now Boarding, which will be released next year on his late father's birthday.

Lisa Shanker, also a member of Thornhill's Jewish community, was chosen as the winner for the contest's community category for her idea to create a "survivor garden" for people recovering from cancer and other serious illnesses.

"I had a stem cell transplant 2-1/2 years ago," she says. "When I was in the hospital, all I could do was look out the window. I couldn't wait to go outside and be in nature, but I had no gardening skills at all."

With the help of her mentors, the Kielburgers, she set up an outdoor space for survivors to interact through gardening.

"We are trying to give people recovering from serious illnesses a space to learn gardening skills in an environment that is peaceful and social, so people aren't isolated and alone."

Shanker says she isn't looking to change the world, just to give back some control and companionship to people who have been sick.

"Healing is a lot more than coming out of a doctor's office, it's emotional, too," she adds.

Shanker's project was displayed earlier this month at the Four Seasons Centre for the Performing Arts in Toronto, and Malach's project will be featured from Nov. 20 to 22.

Business is like marriage

Dear Ella,

Why are some people so full of themselves? It makes it very hard to like them, let alone be friends.

I have worked with Tamara for almost 10 years. We're real estate partners. Clients seem to like us, and on a professional level, we fit well together. However, on a personal level, it's an entirely different story.

Tamara was raised by her mother after her father left. She lived in a six-plex apartment for most of her life. Her mother struggled to make ends meet. Tamara wore second-hand clothes and never had anything that wasn't a necessity. As an adult, she has overcome those difficult days, but her feelings of inadequacy have led her to overcompensate by leading a lavish lifestyle and thumbing her nose at people who have less than she does.

Tamara is good at her job, but she constantly points out material items that she feels makes her better than her clients, her peers and me. I find it harder and harder to be around her, but would hate to break up our successful business partnership.

Deep down, Tamara is a sweet girl and she has many traits that I like, but somehow her need to appear richer than everyone overpowers any of her goodness.

Should I cut my losses and get out of this relationship, even if it means a setback in my career?

Partnership Problems

Dear Partnership Problems,

A good fit in a business partner is like a rare jewel. It's very hard to find someone who is perfect. A business partnership is like a professional marriage. As a matter of fact, you might spend more time with your business partner than your spouse. Like any marriage worth fighting for, it needs constant work – lots of compromise, communication, trust and equality.

The first thing you need to do is define your relationship. It sounds like you would like Tamara to be more than just your partner. A successful partnership has to have more assets than liabilities. That applies on an emotional level as well as a financial one. If the emotional part carries too many liabilities, the financial end will suffer.

A good business partnership doesn't necessarily mean you need to be good friends. It means you have to get along and work well together with the goal of making your business succeed, and it sounds like you've done that well.

What you haven't done is define in your own mind where the relationship's boundaries are. If you're searching for a partner who can also be your friend, perhaps Tamara is not that person. She has insecurities that run deep, and it doesn't sound like you have the desire to address them.

If you decide to continue with your real estate partnership, you need to communicate and set ground rules. If not, cut your losses by getting out now. The sooner you dissolve your business association with Tamara, the sooner you can find a partner that you are more comfortable with, in all aspects of your relationship.

POTATO-APPLE LATKES

juice from 1/2 lemon	3 tblsp matzah meal
6 potatoes	1/2 tsp baking powder
2 lg Granny Smith apples	1/2 tsp salt
1 small onion	pepper to taste
2 eggs	canola oil for frying

Fill large bowl with ice water, squeeze in lemon juice. Grate potatoes and apple (with skin) in food processor, putting them into water as you grate them. Peel and grate onion. Mix together eggs, flour, baking powder, salt, pepper in small bowl. Drain potatoe mixture in colander and squeeze to remove water. Wrap in clean dishtowel; squeeze again to get out as much liquid as possible. Put back into bowl; stir in egg mixture and onion until combined.

Heat oil in pan. Make latkes using 1/4 c of mixture for each. Fry over medium-high heat until one side is brown and begins to crisp; turn, brown other side. Remove to plate lined with paper towels to drain.

Margaret Atwood did it. So did Natan Sharansky. Even the Dalai Lama tried his hand. These three famous names, which you may never see in the same paragraph again, have all drawn or doodled on a blank plate sent to them by Mazon, an organization they'd probably never heard of, but whose cause is universal: feeding the undernourished right here at home. Here Atwood displays her triptych of decorated plates which will be auctioned off for Mazon.

A glimpse to the world of Gideon Hausner, Adolf Eichmann's chief prosecutor, through his daughter's perspective.

Flight conversations

I fly a lot, often on trips that combine work and pleasure. When I fly alone, especially when heading overseas, I always try to get a specific aisle seat.

On a recent flight to Israel, I was already in my preferred spot with my carry-on stowed when a family of two adults and three children arrived. Their seats were spread out so that a young boy was to be seated alone. The mother asked me in French, Hebrew and English if I would mind moving to his seat, which was on an aisle, but not in my preferred location. I initially balked, explaining that I liked the seat I was in.

The mother explained to the child that he would be seated separately from her, but she wouldn't be very far away. He pouted and said he didn't like the arrangement. I looked over to his seat and noted an older woman sitting beside it by the window. There was room overhead for my carry-on bag. I told the couple I would switch if they would move my luggage for me. The husband agreed and I sat down next to the woman.

She then said to me in a decidedly Latin American accent, "Thank you for changing seats. I dreaded an 11-hour flight next to an unhappy five-year-old, even though I have nothing against children."

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

I responded with, "I understand" and extended my hand. "My name is Michael," I said.

"Mine is Leah," she replied.

What followed was a wonderful conversation. She told me how she left Latin America, where she had been an ardent lover of Israel since childhood, and moved to Canada. She studied science and completed her education in nuclear engineering and became a nuclear engineer in Ontario. She said that despite her diminutive stature and female sex, she excelled in an area where knowledge and talent were the currency of success. From her story, it seems she had ample amounts of both.

She then recounted a most remarkable epilogue to her career, which she expressed enthusiastically in a delightful Spanish accent that reminded me of the Argentines I knew when I lived in Israel.

"I was offered early retirement when my company restructured, and I jumped at the opportunity to pursue a repressed dream."

I was expecting something like a desire to study literature or history, but she smiled and said, "I always wanted to be a hairdresser, and the retirement package funded such training."

She continued: "I provide free hair dressing out of a room in my apartment. It's all word of mouth with many clients coming from my synagogue. I love it."

The conversation then meandered to how we both found ourselves in Israel and how we go back and forth and relish our visits, hers being much longer than mine. We realized we shared experiences in Israel and that our experiences there had overlapped.

She exuded warmth, intelligence and humour. The world is full of people with interesting stories, something I take advantage of as a geriatrician. As we got off the plane, we wished each other a safe journey and a Happy New Year. It was a special day in Israel, as Gilad Schalit was released from captivity – a memorable day following a pleasurable flight made more so by this very endearing woman and our flight conversation.

'Nothing more crucial than Jewish education'

Avigdor Lieberman
Special to The CJN

In an appeal written exclusively for The CJN, Israel's foreign minister issues a call to strengthen Jewish identity in the next generation.

The most urgent challenge jointly facing Israel and Jewish communities worldwide is that of ensuring Jewish continuity. Paradoxically, the prosperity of many Jewish communities, particularly in North America, has created a problem of dwindling Jewish self-identification, to an extent unprecedented in Jewish history.

Although in previous eras, Jews were often forced by hostile external forces to abandon their faith and communal identity, the new trends are driven by voluntary processes. They derive from a weakening of Jewish identification, lack of knowledge and absence of sufficient communal resources devoted to instilling an awareness and affinity for Judaism and Israel. The results are startling: in the last several decades, out-marriage rates among Jews in many regions, including North America, have exceeded 50 per cent. These are rates that, if they persist, spell a very grim future for the Jewish people.

It cannot be emphasized enough how important – indeed critical – this issue is for both Israel and world Jewry. Israel is the ultimate expression of Jewish national identity. It is the historic homeland and contemporary embodiment of all that Jews throughout the generations have dreamed of and aspired to. Similarly, Jewish communities throughout the world enrich their local cultures and societies, contribute much to their surroundings and themselves encapsulate Jewish continuity, each in their own unique way.

There is an intrinsic symbiosis between Jewish life inside and outside Israel.

Alas, given the persistent scourge of anti-semitism and the particularly dangerous overlap between this antisemitism and anti-Israel sentiment, this is a symbiosis that faces perpetual challenges. Thus, it is our joint responsibility and duty to ensure the continuation of a strong Jewish identity.

Muslim Brotherhood expected to win Egyptian elections

Comment

As in the other election campaigns in the Middle East that have taken place since the Arab Spring, the Egyptian parliamentary elections that began Monday are expected to result in victory for an Islamic party – in this case, the one affiliated with the Muslim Brotherhood.

The wave of revolutions, which began a year ago next month, have so far resulted in a wave of successes for Islamic parties: Justice and Development in Morocco, Ennahda (Renaissance) in Tunisia, and now Freedom and Justice, the party of Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood. It looks like Freedom and Justice will become the largest party in both chambers of the Egyptian legislature once all the rounds of the election are over in March.

More than a few enthusiastic words of praise have been written about the Arab Spring – both in the Arab world and, at least at first, in the West. It must be acknowledged, however, that political Islam, the emerging alternative to the ousted regimes, does not look overly promising – certainly not to Israeli eyes. These political movements are not all the same, however.

Morocco's Justice and Development Party is more reminiscent of the ruling party in Turkey than of Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood or Hamas in the Gaza Strip. And the party associated with the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt is not a group of religious fanatics who would declare all-out war against the West or take the immediate risk of revoking the peace agreement with Israel. But a look at how activists from the Brotherhood have attempted, without any real success at this point, to recruit the masses through incitement against Israel – as in a prayer service in Cairo last Friday that was filled with anti-Israel rhetoric – does raise concerns about the future character of relations between the two countries.

Shul To Be Sold

OTTAWA — Members of Ottawa's largest downtown shul voted last month to sell their building to a developer because the congregation can't afford to maintain it. In a 142-24 vote, Congregation Beth Shalom decided to sell its 81,000-square-foot building – which includes an 800-seat sanctuary and a former Jewish community centre – for $15 million to a condominium builder. The developer could add $9 million to the deal, which closes in March, if the city lets it increase the site's density. Proceeds will help the 350-family shul erect a new building in west Ottawa, the Ottawa Citizen reported. The congregation, which has four years to relocate, wanted to sell part of the site, but bidders only wanted the whole thing. It included a JCC that closed in 1998, when a new suburban complex opened. The Conservative shul had been Orthodox until 2005, when it made a failed effort to attract new members by introducing mixed seating and other changes.

Belgian Girl Beaten

BRUSSELS — The beating of a 13-year-old Jewish girl in Brussels has Belgium's Jewish umbrella group contemplating civil action. Oceane Sluijzer was beaten by five Moroccan female classmates in a confrontation at a sports centre last month. The attackers also shouted, "Shut up, you dirty Jew, and return to your country" at Sluijzer, who filed a complaint with the police. Belgium has about 40,000 Jews. In response, the Coordinating Committee of Jewish Organizations of Belgium hinted that it might file a civil suit. It also expressed "exasperation" over repeated antisemitic and anti-Israel attacks and asked Belgium's education minister "to introduce appropriate educational programs in schools to prevent unjustified tensions between communities."

Judge Rejects Bid To Control Buildings

VANCOUVER — The Supreme Court of British Columbia turned down a bid by B'nai Brith Canada to take control of two seniors homes in Vancouver.

Justice J.S. Sigurdson ruled Oct. 28 that B'nai Brith failed to demonstrate that the dozen or more people it named to the "Senior Citizens Housing Committee" were active members of the committee. Such members are entitled to become directors of the Lion's Gate B'nai Brith Building Society, the local body that operates Haro Park Centre and B'nai Brith Manor, facilities that provide affordable housing to Vancouver seniors.

Without the B'nai Brith Canada nominees, control of the society fell to seven local directors, elected on May 31, along with three ex-officio members, among them national executive vice-president Frank Dimant.

Opponents of the proposed takeover say neither B'nai Brith Canada nor B'nai Brith International – which in 2008 ceded its Canadian properties and lodges to B'nai Brith – ever controlled the buildings.

But Sigurdson appeared to side with B'nai Brith when he said, "B'nai Brith was entitled to appoint members to the Senior Citizens Housing Committee." The judge added, however, that a mediator he appointed was correct in ruling B'nai Brith never demonstrated its nominees were actually involved with the committee.

Sarkozy Meets Jews

PARIS — French president Nicolas Sarkozy met with leaders of the Jewish umbrella group CRIF to reassure them of his support for Israel. The move came after Sarkozy called Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu a "liar" during a private conversation with U.S. President Barack Obama at last month's G20 conference. Sarkozy "responded to a lot of our concerns," said CRIF treasurer Francis Kalifat, who attended a lunch that also included CRIF president Richard Prasquier and French Foreign Minister Alain Juppé. The concerns include Israel's security, France's recent vote in favour of Palestinian UNESCO membership, and the "liar" comment, which was reportedly overheard by journalists.

Sukkah was part of Occupy Toronto site

Occupiers, including Leora Smith (centre back), enjoy the sukkah set up at St. James Park.

Michelle Bitran
Intern

One of the tents that was set up in St. James Park for the Occupy Toronto protest was not quite like the others. It was a sukkah.

When Leora Smith's friend mentioned that she wanted to participate in the Occupy movement, but also wanted to celebrate Sukkot, which fell at the beginning of the protests in mid-October, Smith, 23, had an ideal solution.

"What if we build a sukkah at Occupy Toronto? Then you get to fulfil both things," she said. So they did just that, with the help of several other occupiers, both Jewish and non-Jewish.

Smith said many people came by to ask questions, learn, participate in potluck dinners and help decorate and maintain the sukkah. "Everyone was so welcoming," she said. "I just thought that it was such a beautiful symbol of the movement."

Sukkot is a great holiday to relate to a movement that's working toward ending inequality, she said. The holiday celebrates the harvest, when food is plentiful. "What our community traditionally does in a time of plenty is share the wealth," she said.

Like Smith, Jenny Isaacs was able to relate her Judaism to the Occupy movement. Isaacs, 23, was at St. James Park almost every day after the protests began more than a month ago. She has also been active in the movement's facilitation committee.

Isaacs, a member of the progressive Zionist youth movement Hashomer Hatzair, said that many of the human values at the core of Judaism, such as tikkun olam, figure strongly in social activism.

Democracy must respond

From the editor's desk...

The calendar year 2011, which has but one-twelfth of its time remaining, will be remembered as having been very noisy. Throughout the world, people took to the streets to shout or otherwise state their cases to a faceless, amorphous establishment whom they believe is responsible for an unpalatable status quo and an even bleaker future.

Vehement social protest, as both means and ends, was the predominant image of 2011. In the former instance protests are entirely understandable and mostly worthy; in the latter, however, they're worrisome and possibly dangerous.

The Arab world is still in the throes of the uprisings that have toppled governments in domino-like fashion.

In Cairo, disgruntled civilian groups have renewed the Tahrir Square demonstrations that brought down Hosni Mubarak last February. They now target the military ruling council whose promised political reforms have been too slow to materialize.

In Syria, Bashir Assad's security forces have reportedly killed more than 3,500 fellow countrymen. Assad refuses to yield. He will not cede his family's authority to the protesters. But nor will the protesters cede their desire to be ruled by a form of government other than Alawite coercion. To the surprise of many, the Arab League appears to have taken a stand against the Assad regime.

And in Libya, the people are Gadhafi-free for the first time in decades. But the true future of the country is yet to be decided.

The despots and strongmen who rule throughout the Arab world have had a nervous year. They would be looking for chimeras and fantasies if they looked for greater calm in 2012.

In Europe, the deeply felt anxieties wrought by the debt crises and economic uncertainties spawned marches and demonstrations of varying violent degree in many of the continent's capitals.

Closer to home, in North America, the Occupy movement arose to visibly and volubly bring the clamour for change to whoever would listen.

In the main, the demonstrators were and are conscientious and well-intentioned strivers toward a higher good of making the world a better place. Not surprisingly, many young Jews participated in the protests. This should not alarm us. It should, rather, make us proud.

As 30-year-old Daniel Roth, who participated in the Occupy Wall Street protests in New York and in the Occupy Toronto protest told The CJN, "Jewish thought, culture, history and faith are all rooted in a vision of justice, compassion and equity. The Occupy movement is deeply in line with Jewish values. To work in this movement is to do a mitzvah."

In Israel, the tent demonstrations that began on trendy Rothschild Boulevard this past summer in Tel Aviv and spread to many other cities captivated an entire population. The cry for social justice, affordable housing and fair wages rang loudly across the country. The government dare not ignore the collective cries of the tent demonstrators.

One cannot and must not make too much of a comparison between the protests in the Arab world, where no democracy exists, and those in North America and in Israel, where quite sophisticated democracies exist. But there is a common thread in the demonstrations among the protesters who are bona fide: they are trying to make their respective governments more responsive to them.

The protesters can hardly be blamed for having lost confidence in the ability or even the desire of their current government structures to respond.

In Israel these days, it seems the entire political establishment is embroiled in a battle over various refinements that are being proposed to the uniquely Israeli form of democracy.

A number of bills are moving through the Knesset. And the many severe ideological differences that divide the people there have wrought their usual rhetorical excesses, name-calling and finger-pointing.

Two bills are aimed at restricting foreign funding of Israeli NGOs. One restriction calls for a cap on the funds; the other proposes a high tax. Two bills are aimed at the judiciary. Another is aimed at revising the laws of libel and slander.

Adding to the confusion and to the angry nerves surrounding the progress of the various bills is the prominence of as much intra-party squabbling as inter-party bickering. For example, a number of cabinet ministers from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's own party refused to support the NGO bills.

The prime minister appears to support the principle of the NGO legislation, but apparently not their details.

Through the fog and haze of the raw, hardscrabble politics of Israel, one thing is indeed clear for us: it is up to the people of Israel to determine the ultimate outcome of the debate and the shape of their democracy.

If it fails in being representative, if it fails in responding to the legitimate concerns legitimately expressed by the people, it will soon need further refinement, and different individuals will govern.

CHANUKAH STAMPS

Canada Post has issued two Chanukah-themed stamps. One features a lit chanukiyah and the words "Happy Hanukkah" in English and French. The other depicts a dreidel, also with the words "Happy Hanukkah" in both official languages. The stamps were first issued in October and were made available again last week at postal outlets across the country, as well as by phone or mail. Last year, Canada Post issued a stamp marking 60 years of Ottawa's bilateral relations with Israel. In 1995, it issued a stamp commemorating the Holocaust.

Iranian policy expert fears proliferation

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A leading Iranian policy expert from Israel believes the Islamic Republic's acquisition of nuclear weapons capacity is not the Middle East's biggest problem.

"It's the proliferation of this technology that is most worrying," according to Meir Javedanfar, an adjunct professor at the Interdisciplinary Center (IDC) in Herzliya, where he teaches contemporary Iranian politics.

Javedanfar was on his first visit and speaking tour of Canada last week, giving talks to various Jewish groups as well as to private gatherings at the Canadian Forces College, the Mackenzie Institute in Toronto and the Royal Canadian Military College in Kingston.

Born in Iran, schooled in England and now living in Israel, he has become one of the top experts in the field of Israeli-Iranian relations, as well as an expert on the motivations behind Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's policies and the country's regime under Ayatollah Ali Khameini.

In an interview with The CJN, Javedanfar said he told his Canadian listeners that Ahmadinejad is the weakest president Iran has had in the last 20 years, and that his presidency will be over in March because he will be at the end of his third and final term.

Meir Javedanfar

Beyond that, Ahmadinejad has been marginalized within his own party and by Khameini, who now views him as a liability, and he's also lost the confidence of the people, Javedanfar said.

Aside from Ahmadinejad's "unacceptable" comments toward Israel – he has repeatedly called for the destruction of the Jewish state and is a Holocaust denier – the more pressing issue, according to Javedanfar, is Iran's quest for nuclear weapons.

He said while Iran is not "a suicidal actor" and has no intention of using its weapons, if developed, the scarier prospect is the proliferation of nuclear weapons technology across the region.

"Particularly if Saudi Arabia gets them," he said. "It would create instability in the Middle East. The concept of 'mutually assured destruction' worked [during the Cold War] because there were only two sides. Can you imagine if it were six sides in the equation? You're leaving it wide open for misunderstandings. Besides that, we don't need any more states threatening Israel's existence."

He said Iran is likely still about three years away from being able to develop the technology, and now is the time for the world to impose as many sanctions as possible and make full use of diplomatic efforts to curb the country's nuclear ambitions.

Javedanfar noted that Iran's Jewish community – some 10,000 people – is treated well by the public.

"Iranians overwhelmingly do not want Israel eliminated. However, many do want a two-state solution and believe Palestinians deserve to have their country also," he said.

Regarding Israeli-Iranian and Israeli-Palestinian relations, Javedanfar believes in the mantra "the pen is mightier than the sword." He discourages military options by Israel against Iran and also laments Israel's current domestic strategy of building settlements in the West Bank.

"I disagree wholeheartedly with those who say the world is naturally inclined to be against Israel," he said. "This is not 1932 anymore. It's 2011. We can use the UN to strengthen Israel's position. There are ways of doing that, one of which is to stop the current expansion of settlements in Israel to strengthen Israel's diplomatic muscle" on the world stage.

He said securing Israel's future can be achieved through diplomacy and foreign ministries, unlike in the past when the country had to fight wars.

"We belong to a very lucky generation of Jews," he said. "In our generation we can negotiate… to secure our future."

By way of example, Javedanfar cited Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's diplomatic efforts with Greece to help stop many of the flotilla ships bound for Israel.

Regarding Gaza and Hamas, Javedanfar said that while he doesn't think Israel can negotiate its way past continuing hostilities with the terrorist organization, "it should try."

"Israel should offer its hand in negotiations with Hamas, because peace with Israel is an existential threat to them. When your enemy is more scared by your peaceful gestures than your military might, then you're very lucky," he said.

Javedanfar added: "Hamas lives off its anti-Israel policies. If Israel makes positive gestures to Hamas and improves the lives of Palestinians in Gaza, that would be a major blow to Hamas."

While there are those in the Palestinian camp who want to eliminate Israel, Javedanfar said the majority of Gazans, and Palestinians in general, want what most Israelis want: a middle class life.

"They want to send their kids to school and have an economic future. Any investment in their future [by Israel] will secure Israel's future against the extremists among them," he said.

Javedanfar called Canada "a wonderful country" and said he was impressed by its respect for human rights and its treatment of refugees, especially Iranian ones.

IGTO launches third phase of marketing campaign

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO recently announced the launch of its new campaign – "There's a bit of Israel in all of us. Come find the Israel in You."

Based on ads on television and radio, on bus shelters, and in newspapers and trade publications, the campaign will build on an expected record year of travel to Israel, said IGTO head Oded Grofman.

Extrapolating the trend from January to the end of October, 2.4 million travellers are expected this year, Grofman said. As many as 80,000 Canadians are expected in 2011, up from the 74,000 who visited in 2010 and the 61,249 in 2009.

The IGTO has budgeted $1 million on marketing in 2010, $400,00 of which is dedicated to the recently initiated winter campaign, Grofman said.

"This is the last of three phases," after which Israeli tourism officials will conduct surveys to determine the campaign's effectiveness, he added.

The Come Find the Israel in You campaign follows first-time visitors to Israel – a couple from New York and a family of four from Texas. Chosen from hundreds of applicants, the visitors toured Israel for 14 days. They reported on their visit on Facebook and Twitter and video was posted on YouTube. They visited Jerusalem, the Galilee, the Negev Desert, the Dead Sea and the Red Sea. "They are ordinary people who wanted to go to Israel for the culture, the history," Grofman said.

One of their stops was in the Red Sea city of Eilat, where Isrotel, a high-end chain, operates eight hotels.

Eilat is a destination worthy of Canadians' consideration, said Etty Baruch, Isrotel's chief adviser for the North American market.

Although distant – by Israeli standards – from the country's heartland, it has proven a very popular vacation destination for Europeans looking for a warm winter holiday spot, she said. Charter airlines fly directly from Europe into Eilat, she said.

Dinah Kutner, general manager of El Al Airline's Canadian office, said North American travellers could now fly into Eilat as well, changing planes at Ben-Gurion International Airport.

A video presentation at the IGTO launch that highlighted the Isrotel offerings in Eilat suggested visitors had a wide choice of luxury accommodations to choose from. North Americans are increasingly including Eilat to their Israel visits, adding a side trip to historic Petra, in Jordan, Baruch said.

Many of the accommodations in Eilat are up to North American standards, and some are family-friendly, offering beautiful pool settings, spa treatments and other amenities expected by seasoned travellers, she said.

A new alternative on Isrotel's roster of hotels is the Beresheet Hotel in Mitzpe Ramon. Located about 85 kilometres south of Be'er Sheva, the facility is located on the heights overlooking the Ramon Crater, a unique geological formation in Israel's Negev Desert.

People have been flocking to it in large numbers. It has proven so popular that people who fill out response cards are giving it grades of eight and 10 on a scale of one to five, Baruch said.

Of the hotel's 112 units, 42 come with private pools. Some include butler service; the spa includes a Turkish bath. Some suites are 250 square meters large while the view of the crater is awesome, Baruch said.

"When you see the sun rise and set, you feel you're next to God when He created the world," she added.

In addition to Israeli visitors, most clients at Beresheet are North American Zionists who combine a stay there with a visit to Sde Boker, David Ben-Gurion's home about half an hour away, and Christian visitors come to visit Har Karkom, believed by some to be the biblical Mount Sinai.

As travellers flock to Israel, El Al has benefited.

"Things have been going really well" for El Al this year, said Kutner. It recently concluded an interline agreement with West Jet, which allows for more seamless travel for Canadians to Israel using both airlines. "The numbers are phenomenal," she said, adding that Israelis now are using Toronto as a hub as they travel to other locations in Canada.

"It's all very promising," she added.

Anti-peace remarks

Despite the headlines last weekend that hailed Palestinian unity, it is not yet clear what conclusions were actually reached between Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas political chief Khaled Meshal when they met in Cairo, apart of course from the decision to stand together, smile and wave for the perfunctory photo opportunity.

Quoting a Hamas spokesperson, Agence France Presse reported that Abbas and Meshal had decided against trying to form an interim government ahead of the general Palestinian elections that are expected to be held next May. But a spokesperson for Abbas denied this. Indeed, he added that negotiators from both sides would meet again next month to try to form a unity government.

The successful formation of a pre-election, interim, Palestinian unity government has been a major obstacle for the two factions, because Hamas does not agree that the incumbent PA prime minister, Salim Fayyad, should remain in the position. Fayyad is the Palestinian leader whom western nations most respect and trust, and it is for that very reason that the anti-western, pro-Iranian Hamas objects to him.

As the cameras clicked and the videotape rolled, Meshal said, "We want to assure our people and the Arab and Islamic world that we have turned a major new and real page in partnership on everything to do with the Palestinian nation."

Those words cannot bring too much comfort to the people of Israel or to anyone else who fervently hopes that the Palestinians and the Israelis can soon reconcile. The words "in partnership on everything to do with the Palestinian nation" effectively confers a veto on moderation to the extremist Hamas Islamists, who have spurned every plea from the West to cast aside their violent ways and agree to recognize the State of Israel.

Abbas also added his own commentary on the meeting's results. "There are no differences between us now," he beamed.

Can he truly have meant that?

If he did, then he confirmed, to the sinking dismay of the large majority of Israelis that the result he ultimately seeks is not coexistence with the Jewish state, but rather its elimination. If Abbas did not actually mean what he plainly said, then he further justifies the doubts and the hesitations about his integrity and his blatant disdain for speaking truthfully. Sadly, too many leaders, too many individuals in Israel and in the West make allowances for Abbas and his constant dissimulation. They always cut him some "integrity slack" by saying it is necessary for him to behave this way when travelling the labyrinthian maze of intra-Palestinian politics.

But someone should hold Abbas to account. And if not, they should withhold surprise, disappointment and censure over the only Israeli response that makes sense under the circumstances.

Yiddish books rescued

My father, Jack Dlusy, born in Poland in 1905, immigrated to Canada at the age of 25. He arrived with $10 in his pocket. He always lived in Montreal. Like his father, he was a watchmaker. He found employment, but soon opened a store in the French-speaking Mile End district of Montreal. He was not a religious man, but Judaism was important to him. Yiddish was his first language, and his library consisted of many Yiddish and some Hebrew books. He was a benefactor of the authors, as is evidenced by the autographs and messages on many of the flyleaves.

My father retired at a young age, because, as owner of a jewelry store, he had been held up at gunpoint several times. After retiring, he sometimes seemed depressed. During one of our conversations, he said to me sadly, "Some day my books will all be lying in a lane." I promised him then that this would not happen. When my father passed away, my husband and I moved the books to our home. Now in our 70s, we are downsizing. My father's treasures were an issue to be considered. A few years ago, we heard of the National Yiddish Book Center in Amherst, Mass. It rescues Yiddish and other modern Jewish books and opens up their contents to the world.

This seemed to be the place that would serve as a good home for my father's books. There are zammlers (collectors) in several cities. We contacted a collector who lives in Toronto, and he arrived recently to take the books to the centre. It was a pleasure knowing they would go where they are valued, but seeing him drive away with them was somewhat traumatic! The centre serves a most worthy function in the preservation of our Yiddish culture. Kol hakavod!

United Bakers almost 100 years old

United Bakers Dairy Restaurant is about to enter its 100th year of continuous operation in Toronto. We recognize that the restaurant enjoys a double identity as a place to eat and a place to meet, and that our story is interwoven with hundreds of other stories that involve individuals, families, clubs, chapters, groups, organizations, movements and – may we say it? – the ongoing story of Jewish Toronto. We've been collecting anecdotes and reminiscences from friends and patrons. Soon we'll bring them all together and, naturally, we don't want to miss any good stories that might not yet have been shared. Hence, we are making a public invitation to any who might have a story or memory of some connection with United Bakers, either back to the decades on Spadina Avenue or more currently at Lawrence Plaza. If you have a reminiscence you'd like to share, please visit our website at www.unitedbakers.ca and click on the 100 years tab. Or e-mail us at ub100years@gmail.com. Submissions should not exceed 100 words and may be used at the sole discretion of United Bakers.

The songs came from Memphis

I enjoyed your article about the Broadway show Memphis ("Bon Jovi founder invites 'mishpachah' to his play," Nov. 24). There's one factual error in the story. The songs Hold On I'm Comin', Knock on Wood and In the Midnight Hour were not Motown classics but recorded on the Stax label in Memphis, Tenn. Hold On I'm Comin' was written by the songwriting duo Isaac Hayes and David Porter. Eddie Lee Floyd wrote Knock on Wood. Wilson Pickett penned In the Midnight Hour. It all came from Memphis!

Descendants of Jews from Safed

For the past three years, I have been completing a screenplay for a feature documentary film presenting an examination of generations of Jewish history, tradition, architecture and culture in the city of Safed, Israel. I am looking for people who are either descendants of Jews from Safed or for whom Safed, the centre of Jewish culture, is a collective value and memory they wish to preserve and document for future generations.

Jewish priorities in a time of prosperity

Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka

No one knows what tomorrow will bring, but it is clear from the relatively recent yesterdays that we Jews are living a time of unprecedented and prolonged prosperity.

Whereas in past generations the chief worry was mere physical survival, the major worry today is spiritual survival. Whereas in past generations the question was whether we would be alive through pogroms, crusades and other violent assaults to see the weddings of our children, today the worry is whether our children will ever marry and whether they will marry Jewish. Whereas in past generations Jews were unable to integrate into the rest of society, today Jews in the West are welcome and even sought out in almost every level and facet of society.

Indeed, we are living in ideal, yet challenging times. Judaism today is more accessible than our ancestors dreamed. For almost any question, you can Google an answer. For almost any tract, be it the Scriptures, the Talmud, commentaries, and later volumes, there are readily available translations. Almost every major city in North America has a Jewish day school. Synagogues abound. Kosher food is on the shelves of just about every grocery store, even in places that have no Jews. It has never been easier to be Jewish.

But this has not translated into the results one would have expected. Assimilation, Jewish attrition, is at epidemic levels, somewhere around 50 per cent. Delayed marriage and lower birth rate, two somewhat related phenomena, add to the demographic challenge.

True, there are great bastions of Jewish affirmation, wherein Jewish learning has experienced an astonishing revival. The birth rate is very high, and assimilation is almost non-existent. Yet in the big picture, we are not winning. We did better under duress than we are doing in prosperity.

There are many people who are not only aware of this perplexing reality; they are devoted to finding effective ways to address the challenge of Jewish spiritual survival. But there is a more fundamental question: in what way do the entrenched liberty and socioeconomic prosperity we are enjoying affect what should be the Jewish agenda? We need to pinpoint what was the Jewish agenda in previous generations, and why this generation differs.

In past generations the Jewish community was closed in, even ghettoized, and not by choice. These 2,000-plus years, from the time of the destruction of the second Holy Sanctuary until relatively recently, have been an extended period of uncertainty for Jews.

Those who were benevolent in allowing Jews to live in their countries usually did not allow them free movement. Yes, there were exceptions, but generally Jews did not integrate, simply because they were not allowed to integrate. They were tolerated at best, and expelled, persecuted or systematically killed at worst.

It hardly comes as a surprise that given these circumstances, the Jewish community would become insular, and focused mainly on building within itself, with little if any concern for the broader society beyond. After all, that society had shut them out, or more precisely, had shut them in. This is the psychological baggage we carry from generations of exile and persecution.

Quite likely, had our experience in exile been more favorable, our attitude to the world around us would have been commensurately more embracing.

Of course, there is the distinct possibility that had we been fully accepted, we would have totally assimilated and disappeared. There are already hints of this dynamic in various countries that have fully welcomed us, but there are also strong hints of Jewish resurgence in some of these countries. The jury is out on what is better for Jewish survival, prosperity or hardship. Whatever the verdict, it is clear that any sane Jew would prefer the prosperity scenario.

In the past, the prosperity option was hardly forthcoming. That was then. Unfortunately, what was then, the centuries of persecution, remains with us in the here and now. It is part of our collective unconscious.

The full embrace of the ancient but suppressed Jewish agenda will actually reinvigorate the Jewish people individually and collectively

Because of this, any suggestion that we recalibrate to embrace the new reality of being accepted, even welcomed, is sure to meet with resistance. The resistance can take many forms. Some may argue that no matter how good Jews have it now, present benevolence by non-Jews toward the Jews is at best transitory. Why, then, invest in any concern for them?

Soldiers from Israel help rescue individuals trapped in the earthquake in Haiti two years ago. In doing so, as Rabbi Bulka implies, they are as partners with God in the global agenda to inspire the world. [Israel Sun photo]

Another resistance argument is that we have been so battered by the cumulative assault that we have so much catching up to do, and it will be at least a few more generations before we can make up for the physical and spiritual losses, if indeed we can ever make this up. A further resistance argument is that we have limited time and resources, which are best spent within the Jewish community rather than outside it.

Finally, there are those who will argue that the more we engage with the world outside the Jewish community, the greater the chances we will experience even more assimilation.

These are all serious considerations, serious enough that they dare not be ignored. But I am convinced that whatever the resistance, we have a sacred obligation to engage in the recalibration as we move forward and integrate fully into the Jewish agenda the profound blessing of freedom that our generation enjoys, and that future generations will hopefully enjoy as well.

It is my contention that rather than deplete our resources or compromise our Jewishness, the full embrace of the ancient but suppressed Jewish agenda will actually reinvigorate the Jewish people individually and collectively.

We are not in the business of convincing people to become Jewish. We firmly believe that all righteous people have a share in the world to come. We do not need to "save" them. They are good as is. At the same time, we do have responsibilities to the global community. Our major responsibility is not to convert. It is to inspire. We are called upon to inspire humanity.

The question is, inspire toward what? If it is not toward Judaism, then toward what? Our responsibility is to inspire the world to acknowledge God, to embrace God, and to behave with the awe of God as the basis of all action.

That is a tall order, but it is an order we dare not ignore. For most of our history, we were prevented from carrying out this mandate, so the mandate slipped away from our consciousness, but that does not mean the obligation disappeared. It simply was suffocated by exile, persecution and subjugation.

That suffocation has ended, we can now breathe freely, and we therefore need to return to the mandate. It is not as if we were totally removed from this even in the worst of times. The universal agenda is a recurring theme in our age-old prayers, our teaching and our thinking, as we constantly remind ourselves that we must be "a light unto the nations."

The theme of infusing Godliness is a constant in our daily prayers. Every day, we yearn for the day that God will reign supreme over all the land. It is the climactic ending of the Aleinu prayer that culminates the morning, afternoon and evening prayers. How will this be achieved, the awareness that God reigns over the world? We could of course leave all this to God, but we know that this is not the Jewish way, to leave it all to God.

True, our fate is ultimately in God's hands, but it is clear from the mandates in the Torah that we are partners with God, not bystanders. It is up to us to facilitate the global embrace of God, not through coercion, but through the inspirational force of our example.

Any doubts about the centrality of this mission to have the world embrace God are removed once we fully comprehend the second part of the Aleinu prayer. It reads as follows:

"Therefore we hope for You, Lord our God, soon to behold Your majestic glory, to remove idols from the earth and the false gods totally eliminated, to perfect the world through the reign of the Almighty. And all humanity will call in Your Name, to turn toward You all the earth's wicked. All the world's inhabitants will recognize and know that to You every knee must bend, every tongue must vow allegiance. Before You, Lord our God, they will bend and prostrate, and give homage to Your honoured Name. They will all accept upon themselves the yoke of Your dominion, and You will reign over them speedily forever. For the dominion is Yours, and to all eternity You will reign in glory, as it is written in Your Torah: The Lord shall reign forever. And it is said: The Lord shall be Ruler over all the world; on that day the Lord shall be One, and God's Name One."

Insofar as Aleinu is concerned, the meaning is clear, as is the implicit obligation it embodies – to be partners with God in the global agenda to inspire the world.

Google lets antisemites occupy cyberspace

Like many people, I've been following the controversy in the blogosphere about antisemitism among the ranks of the anti-capitalists. More precisely, I've been reading a series of reports about antisemitic expression among the Occupy Wall Street protesters, along with interpretations, confirmations, and refutations of those reports.

That there have been rants against Jews, posters blaming real estate foreclosures in America on Israel, Zionists, and Jewish bankers, and attempts to co-opt the movement to a boycott-Israel agenda is clear. Photographs of these expressions have been published in major newspapers and circulated on the web. More dramatically, there have been videos of encounters with vocal expressions of antisemitism at Occupy Wall Street and its correlatives in other cities. Under debate is whether or not these sentiments characterize the movement or its leadership – an argument either complicated or made moot by the idea that the Occupy movement, by design, doesn't actually have what you would call a leadership.

For some observers, the tolerance of antisemitic expression damns the movement as a whole. For others, it's simply what occurs when a "happening" draws a wide swath of people together without checking credentials, organizational membership or fingerprints – people with varied backgrounds, motivations and degrees of sanity or nuttiness. Among the crowd, hateful, paranoid people speak out, but they don't represent the collective.

I haven't been within 800 kilometres of Zuccotti Park in the past few months, so I won't venture a guess as to which take is right on the money (if you pardon the expression). (I'm pleased to say that when I've passed by St. James Park in Toronto, I saw no evidence of antisemitic expression.)

What interests me here is the place of the Internet in this phenomenon. It's not simply a matter of the rapidity and reach of the web in disseminating these images. I know from my own e-mail inbox that, for a variety of reasons, people concerned about antisemitism circulate links to photos and video clips that capture offensive expressions about Jews. My guess is that such links circulate among people who might also watch them with head-nodding agreement.

More than that, the Internet plays a role in creating the phenomenon. I'm certainly not the first to note the role of social media in making certain protest movements possible across the globe and in linking geographically distant movements together. But the Internet does more: it provides a forum, and a potential virtual audience for people who may not easily gain for themselves an audience in situ. And the more outrageous the expression, the more likely it is to circulate virally on the web.

A few examples: in one extended clip, a young man rants, sneers and raves at a (presumably) Jewish man whose long grey wavy hair and kippah can only be seen from behind. The younger man clearly thinks of himself as a performance artist. He later tells an interviewer, "I don't watch television. I read and I eat healthy. I got off the drugs. I'm not mentally ill... My heart tells me what to say." He then invites the reporter interviewing him to find him on YouTube under his performance moniker and directs him to his website.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Other antisemitic speakers tell their interlocutors to Google such phrases as "Jews and bankers," "Zionist control Wall Street," and other terms resonant with the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. These people offer as proof of the rightness of their conspiracy theories the fact that the conspiracy theories show up in the results of an Internet search. Creating a perfect circle, their own placards, interviews and videoclips now show up on a Google search.

I won't deny that whether such language is pervasive in the Occupy movement or is the singular expression of rare hate-mongers, nut cases and media hogs, it makes for disturbing viewing. And the Internet provides an easy platform, a place for like-minded bigots to congregate virtually, rather than feel chastened by social isolation.

Still, I was slightly heartened by one extended antisemitic video clip. In a twist on the now-famous Helen Thomas demand that Israeli Jews "go back" to Poland and Germany, one Occupy demonstrator concluded his antisemitic rant by telling a Jewish man to "go back to Israel."

At least he acknowledged that Israel is the Jewish homeland.

Making way for light and air

Although Jews have never had it as good as we have it now, antisemitism is still rampant. It manifests itself in many ways, especially in crowds, from gay pride parades to political rallies. Many current expressions of the perennial disdain for Jews are disguised as criticisms of Israeli policies, but some in the "Occupy Wall Street" movement and its offshoots have also gone back to the old canard: Jews are capitalist blood-suckers responsible for today's financial woes.

It's therefore tempting to dismiss the underlying discontent with the status quo of the young protesters and forget that their inspiration isn't only student demonstrations in Chile and the Arab Spring, but also last summer's tents on Rothschild Boulevard in Tel Aviv. Since then, many tents have been erected in public places in cities around the world, including Canada.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Though the emphasis of the protests is the yawning gap between haves and have-nots, other issues have also emerged. The "Occupy Judaism" movement is a case in point. The Kol Nidre service in Zuccotti Park in Manhattan, where the Wall Street protesters were camping out, was attended by more than 1,000 people. Organizers also built a sukkah, and Jews celebrated Simchat Torah there.

Their Jewish agenda may be vague, but self-hatred isn't on it. It's mainly an expression of dissatisfaction with the atrophy and the crass materialism that young Jews often experience in their own communities. They want more Judaism, not less.

By pointing to the absence of a specific platform, Jewish leaders deny the young credibility and ascribe to them base motives. Accusing protesters of muddled and confused thinking is a convenient way of dismissing them as irrelevant.

Although Jewish communal leaders lament that a growing number of young Jews are unaffiliated, they fail to see that many become that way not out of indifference but out of frustration at the lack of authentic Judaism in Jewish communal life. They're cynical about those they perceive as self-seeking and self-important machers who masquerade as exponents and defenders of Judaism.

Gary Rosenblatt of New York's Jewish Week has written: "There is a new pulse of Jewish expression out there. You can embrace it as grass-roots authenticity or feel threatened by it as anti-establishment. But don't dismiss the fact that significant numbers of American Jews, particularly among the young, are combining politics and faith in ways that blend a discontent with those in authority and an interest in exploring deeper Jewish values."

There are similar stirrings in Canada, even though Jews here tend to be more cautious in expressing dissent. But that shouldn't stop federations, congregations and other organizations that seek to harness Jewish commitment from learning what's happening out there by responding positively to the current quest for commitment without conformity.

Nor should the deplorable instances of antisemitism and expressions of hostility to Israel in the protest movement blind us to the many other things that are being said there. And that many caring and committed Jews are saying them.

The protests are likely to cause discomfort in Jewish institutions because now, as throughout history, organized Jewry depends on philanthropy. But the disproportionate amassing of wealth, even when some of it is given away as charity, has become the prime target of current anti-establishment slogans. Understandably, grateful institutional recipients of donations that help erect impressive buildings and maintain the Jewish bureaucracy aren't in a position to applaud the protesters, even when they seem to have kosher agendas, celebrate Jewish holidays and pray to the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob as they march.

I admit that I, too, would have been more inhibited writing this had I still had the responsibility for a congregation or served on Jewish communal boards. But I'd like to think that I'd have overcome my qualms in an effort to make sure that the buildings we so proudly erect don't stay empty while those expected to use them study and pray in the park.

There may even be times when pulling down existing structures is more wholesome than keeping them as status symbols. Sweden's celebrated writer August Strindberg, a hero of my youth, comes to mind. A century ago, he challenged those who attacked champions of change because they didn't offer specific alternatives. In a famous poem, he made the protesters argue: "For light and air we're making way! Is it not well that we are trying?"

A shtetl in South Williamsburg

Sheldon Kirshner in New York City

Waves of immigrants have descended on Williamsburg, an ethnically diverse neighbourhood in the New York City borough of Brooklyn. Situated on land bought from its original native American inhabitants by the Dutch East India Company in the 17th century, Williamsburg was subsequently home to British, German and Jewish settlers from Germany and eastern Europe.

By the last third of the 19th century, Williamsburg was a vibrant industrial centre, a financial hub rivalling Wall Street and an engine of a booming American economy.

Newly minted millionaires such as Cornelius Vanderbilt and Charles Pfizer built grand mansions here, and the Kings County Savings Bank erected a magnificent building, designed in the flamboyant French Second Empire style, at the corner of Bedford and Broadway.

With the construction of the Williamsburg Bridge in 1903, Jews from the tenements of the congested Lower East Side flocked to Williamsburg. Their children and grandchildren included the comedian Mel Brooks, the professional basketball coach Red Auerbach, the comic book artist Will Eisner, the songwriter Barry Manilow, the gangster Benjamin (Bugsy) Siegel and the chanteuse Barbra Streisand.

After World War II, when Williamsburg was already in a state of decline, Jewish Holocaust survivors from Hungary and Romania streamed into southern Williamsburg. The newcomers were chassidic Jews, mainly anti-Zionist Satmar haredim from the town of Satu Mare.

Profoundly traditional and insular, and disdainful of the secular world, the Satmar sect established an exotic, self-contained enclave in South Williamsburg, one of three neighbourhoods in New York City populated by deeply observant Jews from various chassidic sects. Aside from Williamsburg, these enclaves are Borough Park and Crown Heights.

While Crown Heights and Borough Park are bastions of the Chabad Lubavitch and the Bobov dynastic sects, both of which are led by charismatic leaders at the head of "courts," South Williamsburg is generally regarded as the abode of the Satmars. Yet the Satmars do not "own" this gritty and somewhat dilapidated stretch of Brooklyn, which has undergone considerable gentrification in recent years.

Apart from being inhabited by Jews from other chassidic sects – Belz, Skver, Vien, Ger, Krasna, Vizhnitz, Puppa, Tzelem, to name but a few – Puerto Ricans and avant-garde artistic types, commonly known as hipsters, also live in South Williamsburg. By contrast, Poles and Italians drifted into North Williamsburg, while African and Spanish Americans gravitated to East Williamsburg.

South Williamsburg, served by the L subway line and bisected by such streets as Lee Avenue, Bedford Avenue and Rodney Street, resembles a shtetl.

Men and boys in sidelocks are a common sight, as are bewigged women pushing baby carriages.

The chassidic community has one of the highest birthrates in the United States, with an average of eight children per family.

Since many chassidim prefer to study religious texts rather than work, their unemployment rate is uncommonly high, with approximately half living below the poverty line and relying on federal government assistance and small loans and handouts from their community.

Chassidim, however, are hardly poverty-stricken. The gainfully employed among them are the proprietors of retail stores, import-export businesses and auto repair garages, according to Jacob Gluck, a former Satmar Chassid who conducts guided walking tours of this district (HasidicWilliamsburgTour.com) and knows all there is to know about it.

The signage in front of their shops are in Yiddish and English: Satmar Meat & Poultry Market, Mazel Typesetting & Printing, Kaufman's Electricity, L'chaim Kosher Wines and Spirits.

Some shops, like Stuhl's Mens & Boys Chasidishe Raincoats, are antediluvian. Dark, gloomy and almost claustrophobic, a priceless relic from a Charles Dickens novel, it is a one-man show run by Yitzhak Stuhl, a 75-year-old Holocaust survivor who declines to have his picture taken.

Many shops enforce dress codes, forbidding immodest shorts, sleeveless blouses and low-cut necklines.

There are a profusion of glatt kosher bakeries, including Kaff's, whose cinnamon babkas and cherry cheese danishes are heavenly, as I can personally testify.

Flaum's Appetizers, a clean, well-lit place, sells an assortment of treats and great sour pickles from a barrel. Its co-owner, Zev Rapaport, is a confident young man whose father works for the English-language edition of the Hamodia, whose slogan is "The newspaper of Torah Jewry."

Zev Rapaport in Flaum's Appetizers

The foremost kosher restaurant in South Williamsburg, Gottlieb's, is at 352 Roebling St. Offering a wide selection of appetizers, soups, main dishes, sandwiches, side dishes, salads and desserts, Gottlieb's menu lists endless delicacies: spicy Buffalo wings, mushroom and barley soup, chicken paprikash, kishke, potato kugel, farfel, apple strudel and the like.

Sam Kaff in Kaff's Bakery (Sheldon Kirshner photos)

Throughout South Williamsburg, mansions have been converted into synagogues and yeshivas, while nooks and crannies have made way for countless shtiblach.

Long yellow school buses, emblazoned with Yiddish lettering, are parked in front of separate boys and girls schools.

The ragged Victorian building that was once the residence of the spiritual leader of the Satmar movement, Rabbi Joel Teitelbaum, who died in 1979, stands virtually empty. Rabbi Teitelbaum was succeeded by his nephew, Moshe, whose death in 2006 touched off a bitter succession struggle between his two sons, Aaron and Zalmen. Their feud has polarized the Satmar community, having divided it into two distinct camps and leaving the construction of a huge synagogue unfinished.

This is not the only problem bedevilling South Willliamsburg.

Access to government-subsidized housing, complaints about loud music blaring from clubs and claims that Chassidim get special treatment from police have all caused friction with non-Jewish residents.

The introduction of bike lanes, favoured by scantily dressed cyclists in warm weather, has led to tensions, too. But the kind of traumatic violence that Crown Heights experienced two decades ago, when street riots broke out, has not occurred in South Williamsburg.

Against the backdrop of these tensions, the Chassidim have fought tooth and nail to maintain the unique character of their neighbourhood. But some have simply left Williamsburg altogether, having resettled in the suburban enclave of Kiryas Joel, which lies within the town of Monroe.

Come what may, the 70,000 Chassidim of South Williamsburg are determined to preserve their way of life. They have done so for centuries and intend to do so in the foreseeable future.

Israel's occupation delegitimizes it: historian

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel's continuing occupation of the West Bank looms as a major factor in its growing delegitimization, claims a leading Israeli historian.

"Today, we're witnessing the steady delegitimization of Israel in the international community," said Benny Morris in a recent speech at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

The erosion of Israel's legitimacy is taking place especially in European university campuses, the incubators of future political leaders in Europe, noted Morris, who teaches Middle Eastern history at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

Benny Morris

"This is an existential matter for Israel, a threat," added Morris, who has written such critically acclaimed books as The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947-1949 and Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict.

Asserting that Israel's occupation is an "abnormality" in the 21st century, he said that given the imperatives of demography, Israel cannot survive as a Jewish democratic state unless it withdraws from the West Bank.

"It's an existential necessity for Israel to end the occupation," he declared.

Arguing that the 44-year occupation has morally corrupted Israel, Morris warned that the world will not countenance it for much longer.

Israel should pull out unilaterally or after it signs an agreement with the Palestinians.

But in light of the fact that radical Palestinian factions continually fired rockets into Israel after its unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in 2005, Israel might be faced with the same threat in the West Bank.

"This is an enormous dilemma," he said.

Jews have a just and legitimate claim to the West Bank, the crucible of the Jewish people. But since so many Palestinians live there, the West Bank should be partitioned in accordance with the terms of a two-state solution.

A withdrawal from the West Bank would help Israel build greater support in the west for its legitimacy, he said.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has not made sufficient efforts to reach a compromise agreement with the mainstream Palestinian leadership, headed by President Mahmoud Abbas of the Palestinian Authority.

But even a conciliatory approach by Netanyahu's government would not necessarily induce the Palestinians to sign an agreement with Israel, he added.

The problem is that Israel's legitimacy is disputed by the Palestinians in general and by Arab countries, despite Israel's peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan. "They won't sign a real peace accord with Israel, and if they do, it won't last."

Morris claimed that most Palestinians do not accept Israel's existence and prefer the path of armed resistance.

Since the 1930s, when the first partition plan was presented by Britain, the Palestinians have rejected a two-state solution.

In the summer of 2000, at the Camp David summit, Abbas' predecessor, Yasser Arafat, turned down an Israeli proposal to cede more than 90 per cent of the West Bank because he sought much more than was offered by Israel.

"He wanted all of Palestine," said Morris, adding that the current PA leadership hews to the same position.

In a sense, then, it does not matter what Israel does or does not do with respect to the Palestinians in the West Bank, he observed.

Yet a solution may be attainable if the Palestinians embrace Israel's legitimacy as a Jewish state and drop their demands for the return of Palestinian refugees to their former homes in Israel, he suggested.

In his view, the most serious immediate threat to Israel is Iran's nuclear project.

"Iran is striving for an armoury of nuclear weapons, and it's possible it's geared to the destruction of Israel."

As sanctions will not deter Iran from building such an arsenal, the United States should bomb Iranian nuclear sites in a concerted campaign of several weeks' duration, said Morris.

But since Washington lacks the will to launch such attacks, only one option remains – an Israeli preemptive strike.

Israel, however, lacks the capabilities to destroy Iran's nuclear program. At best, Israel would set it back by only several years, and prompt Iran to retaliate, both directly and indirectly through its surrogates, Hamas and Hezbollah.

"A lot of nasty things would happen."

Turning to the recent popular uprisings in the Arab world, known collectively as the Arab Spring, Morris said, "Not anything good for Israel will come out of it."

The rebellions in Tunisia, Libya and Egypt may well bring Islamic rather than liberal governments to power, he predicted in a sombre forecast.

In a brief analysis of Israel's home front, Morris said that Israel can thrive if it manages its economy efficiently and fully integrates haredi Jews and Israeli Arabs into society.

Endless conflict must end: analyst

Gershom Gorenberg
[Debbi Cooper photo]

Israel is in danger of losing its character as a democratic Jewish state, according to Israeli historian and journalist Gershom Gorenberg.

In a recent interview in Toronto, he said three factors threaten Israel's status as a beacon of democracy in a region of autocracy. These are its settlement policies in the West Bank, its political system in which state and synagogue are integrated and its unequal treatment of the large Arab minority. Israel faces new form of warfare, Arens says

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel faces a new kind of warfare aimed at undermining its existence, a former Israeli cabinet minister said last week.

The war of delegitimization is the third and latest manifestation of hostility that Israel has faced since its emergence as a sovereign state in 1948, Moshe Arens told an audience at Beth Sholom Synagogue Nov. 21 in a speech sponsored by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

"Israel has been under constant attack," noted Arens, a former professor of aeronautics who was elected to the Knesset in 1974 and who later served as ambassador to the United States, defence minister and foreign minister.

Moshe Arens

The first phase of the Arab world's effort to eradicate Israel lasted from the first Arab-Israeli war in 1948 to the Yom Kippur War in 1973, said Arens, whose political career largely spanned the 1980s and 1990s and who lost his parliamentary seat in 2003.

Having been unable to defeat Israel in conventional wars, major Arab states such as Egypt and Syria concluded that Israel was militarily unbeatable.

The next Arab phase of war against Israel took the form of terrorism during the second Palestinian uprising, said Arens.

The objective of the intifadah, which broke out in 2000, was to shatter Israeli society, but the Israeli army crushed it by military means.

"We've not had a resurgence of that sort of terrorism, but we still have to deal with [Hamas] and [Hezbollah] rockets."

According to Arens, the newest attempt to wage war on Israel turns on the international campaign to delegitimize it.

"It's a pernicious effort to destroy Israel through propaganda," he said, adding that it's led by a coalition of anti-semites, Holocaust deniers, leftists and self-hating Jews in the Diaspora and even Israel.

Arens, who was born in Lithuania and immigrated to Israel from the United States after the 1948 War of Independence, declared that the Jewish people are "defenceless no more."

As he put it, "We have a long reach to protect Jews where that protection is required."

Turning to current affairs, Arens said he has no doubt that Iran is trying to build a nuclear bomb. "This is a problem not just for Israel, but for the entire world."

For years, few countries considered the possibility of an Iranian nuclear arsenal as a problem, he said.

But with the publication of a recent report by the International Atomic Energy Agency that Iran is working to assemble a nuclear device, the world has been jolted by what he described as "a wakeup call."

With western countries such as the United States, Canada, France and Britain having enacted new economic sanctions against Iran, Israel is not alone in confronting the spectre of an Iranian atomic bomb, Arens said.

In a reference to the Palestinians, he said they can't achieve statehood by bypassing Israel and taking their case to the United Nations.

He claimed that the Quartet –consisting of the United Nations, the United States, the European Union and Russia – is trying to wrest political concessions from Israel in a bid to reboot negotiations with the Palestinian Authority.

Arens was pessimistic about the popular rebellions currently brewing in the Arab world. "The Arab Spring is rapidly turning into the Arab Winter," he said, predicting that Islamist parties will assume power through democratic elections.

Citing "a big change" in Canada's foreign policy, Arens hailed Prime Minister Stephen Harper as one of Israel's best friends. "We greatly appreciate his position on Israel."

Arens was in Toronto to promote his book, Flags Over the Warsaw Ghetto, a revisionist account of the 1943 Jewish revolt. Published last month, it claims the uprising was led not only by Mordechai Anielewicz's left-wing Zionist group, the Jewish Fighting Organization, but also by Pawel Frenkel's right-wing Zionist formation, the Jewish Military Organization.

Toronto, Israel LGBT orgs to team up

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

In what may be a watershed moment between Canada's and Israel's Jewish lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered (LGBT) communities, Kulanu Toronto and The Aguda – respectively Canada and Israel's largest Jewish LGBT organizations – are teaming up.

Representatives of the two groups met for a first-ever in-person meeting last week in Toronto to discuss plans for joint efforts on 2012 Pride events, educational exchanges and support programs.

Michael Hamel and Anat Avissar, the chair and foreign policy director of The Aguda respectively, were on a trip through North America to meet with the Jewish LGBT communities in Toronto, Washington, D.C., New York, Denver, Los Angeles and San Francisco.

While here, Aguda members were hosted by the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto.

Justine Apple, executive director of Kulanu, said the prospect of working with The Aguda on cross-national initiatives was exciting. She said one of the groups' main topics of discussion was the planning of a joint convention in Toronto on May 17, 2012 – the International Day Against Homophobia and Transphobia.

While the details are still being ironed out, Apple said, the conference would likely focus on "general women's issues and not strictly on LGBT issues."

The Aguda would send representatives to speak at the convention, and Kulanu would send a delegation to Israel at some future point to speak at LGBT events there, she said.

Also in the works is a cross-promotion of Kulanu and Aguda educational materials and souvenirs at each other's booths and stations at the Tel Aviv and Toronto Pride parades next year, Apple said.

Hamel told The CJN his organization was also looking forward to working with Kulanu and sharing knowledge.

"We feel like Kulanu is a sister organization and we want to know them more," he said.

Hamel added that The Aguda was also in town to meet with the First Narayever Congregation, which, since 2009, has helped sponsor the organization's Barak Center Project in Israel.

"This is an LGBT high school drop-out program that gives [teens] an opportunity to get their Israeli high school diplomas and re-enter productive life. We identified that a lot of times – the LGBT issue is an integral part of the reason they dropped out," he said.

The program is also funded in part of the New Israel Fund of Canada. Asked about how The Aguda responds to the now yearly attacks on Israel at Pride events worldwide – anti-Israel groups such as Toronto's Queers Against Israeli Apartheid accuse the Israeli government of "pinkwashing" its treatment of Palestinians by focusing on the fact that it is the only gay-friendly country on the Middle East – Hamel said those attacks "have no basis."

"I am far from saying Israel is a utopian place for LGBT people. There is no such place on earth. But when it comes to the Middle East, [Israel] is the only place you can be LGBT and be active. We are still the most accepting environment" in the region. He acknowledged that The Aguda does receive a "small amount" of funding from the government, but it is negligible.

"Like any NGO, we'd like to get more money. We're a life-saving organization, regardless of ethnicity, religion, age or sexual orientation," Hamel said.

LGBT Palestinians, Israelis, Christians, Jews and Muslims are all embraced by The Aguda.

Hamel said The Aguda acts as a beacon for LGBT people all over the region, fielding phone calls and e-mails from Ramallah, Qatar, Tel Aviv, Amman and Lebanon.

"People are knocking on our doors and we are trying to save lives. This is the essence of LGBT activity; not just in Israel but here in Toronto and everywhere. We care about people. These are human beings," he said.

Hamel harkened back to the Bar Noar massacre of 2009, when a gunman opened fire at the organization's social youth club, killing two youths and injuring 15 others. The perpetrator has yet to be found.

The Bar Noar centre has since become The Aguda's prime initiative, to "let LGBT youth just be," he said.

Since the massacre, Hamel said, his organization has realized there's a tremendous need for LGBT social services in Israel. Part of the trip to North America was to seek funding for this cause, he said.

THE JEWISH WOMEN'S LEADERSHIP INITIATIVE

Aish Toronto is launching the Jewish Women's Leadership Initiative based on the recognition that throughout the Jewish peoples' history, it has been the leadership of women that has been the key to our survival and redemption. By creating this new exciting initiative, Aish celebrates the impact of Jewish women leaders and empowers women to make the world a better place through their family, their work and their community. The philosophical and educational methodology of the initiative will be based on the core principles of Torah based leadership as articulated by Rabbi Noach Weinberg, of blessed memory, the founder of Aish HaTorah, and one of the premier leadership development figures in the Jewish world.

Kenney to be honoured by Chabad

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario is getting ready to fete Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney with one of its highest honours.

Kenney will receive Chabad's Distinguished Public Service Award at the organizations 33rd annual gala dinner, to be held Dec. 4 at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation.

Jason Kenney

In announcing the award in Chabad's September World of Lubavitch newsletter, Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum, executive director of Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario, called the minister "a good friend of Chabad and a great friend of Israel."

The organization also refers to Kenney as someone who stands up to "all forms" of racism and hate.

Kenney has always offered Chabad his assistance "with alacrity and enthusiasm," the organization said.

"His boundless energy, his optimism, and his principled convictions are the hallmark of his personality," the organization said.

In an e-mail to The CJN, Kenney praised Chabad's work domestically and worldwide in the areas of education and relief work as "insurmountable."

"Their programming reflects tolerant, nonjudgmental and open discussions. Chabad contributes to social and humanitarian causes throughout the world by providing drug treatment centres, soup kitchens and relief for victims of terror," he wrote.

Asked how he felt being the organization's award recipient this year, Kenney wrote he was "very humbled and proud" to be honoured this way.

"I feel rewarded that Chabad has recognized the work of our government within the Jewish community, against antisemitism in Canada and abroad, and in supporting the state of Israel."

For more information on the event, call 905-731-7000, or e-mail info@chabad.ca.

What are China and Russia up to in Mideast?

The upheavals and uncertainties in the Middle East – from Libya, Egypt and Syria to Iran and Yemen – have been mounting, and have drawn major media attention here. Still, there has been one key component to the overall story that has mysteriously evaded examination: the role of Russia and China.

While the media have reported that both Russia and China remain opposed to sanctions on Syria and recently thwarted efforts to condemn Syria at the UN Security Council for the regime's large-scale murder of its citizens, there has been almost no follow-up about Russia and China's obstructionist role. At a time that even the Arab League, an organization not known for its stand against massive human rights violations among its members, has basically washed its hands of the Assad regime (as it did in the case of Gadhafi), why have Russia and China taken a strong, protective position in defence of Syria?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

An editorial in the Nov. 19 issue of the Economist magazine argued that these two major powers "may [emphasis added] be forced to reconsider their stand. China is edging away from wholehearted diplomatic support, and even Russia now thinks it prudent to hobnob with the leader of Syria's main opposition front."

Even if these highly qualified indications are accurate, they hardly amount to a major policy shift by China and Russia. More important, crediting both countries for such minor shifts only serves to obscure what has not been properly explored in the first place – their longstanding defence of some of the most repressive, brutal regimes in that region, including Iran.

One Middle East expert who has been paying attention to the role played by Russia and China is Jim Lederman, the senior Israel analyst for Oxford Analytica.

In conversation, Lederman reflected on the absence of international interest or attention to what the Asian giants have been up to: "The major issues that affect media audiences in the western countries most are domestic problems, the on-going Arab rebellions, and the world economic crisis. These audiences are already suffering from overload from the three major stories. Consequently, there's no appetite for in-depth reporting on other issues. Editors are reacting to what they think their audiences want. And they have justification for their approach. The wise U.S. senator from Missouri, Stuart Symington, once declared, correctly, in my opinion, that 'No one, not even the greatest superpower, can deal with more than 2-1/2 crises at any one time – two that need immediate action and one that can be kept on the back burner but requires constant watching.' Three major stories are too much for anyone to cope with.

"The impact of China's and Russia's actions in the region should, nonetheless, not be underestimated. In fact, their stakes are huge. Russia's sole naval base in the Mediterranean is in Tartus in Syria. Both Russia and China are competing for financial advantage and influence at a time when they perceive that American influence is waning. Both want a piece of the oil action in Iran – China in order to assure petroleum supplies, and Russia in order to strengthen its already semi-monopolistic hold on gas supplies to Europe. Furthermore, Russia also fears Iranian encroachment in Chechnya and in the other Muslim states that were once part of the Soviet Union. In addition to these states being buffer zones and thus of military and strategic importance, they are also on the cusp of becoming major gas suppliers to Europe – as I said, a major Russian economic concern."

Lederman concluded: "You have to keep in mind that both Russia and China view each other as a competitor in a race to pick up the pieces left behind by the American withdrawal from the region. Neither country has taken a principled stand on events occurring in the Middle East. Instead, each is scavenging for opportunities, and each is already heavily invested in developing oil and gas fields in Iran at a cost of billions of dollars – assets that both would be loath to lose."

Photographer finds connection to fabled shul

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

To Orah Buck, a Toronto photographer and former Hebrew teacher, the twice destroyed and twice resurrected Hurva Synagogue in Jerusalem's Jewish quarter is imbued with special meaning and resonance.

The shul is not only emblematic of the continued presence of Jews in this most contested of cities, but an enduring symbol of their yearning for Zion, she said last week.

Built by Ashkenazi Jews in the early 18th century, it was set alight by Arab moneylenders in 1721 when its Jewish congregants failed to repay a debt. As a result of this incident, Ashkenazi Jews were banned from the city until the debt could be repaid.

Forlornly lying in ruins for more than a century, the neo-Byzantine synagogue was rebuilt in 1864. For more than 80 years, it was a landmark, one of the tallest structures in Jerusalem and one of the most beautiful synagogues in all of Palestine.

Visited by the British philanthropist Moses Montefiore in 1866, it was the venue of a memorial service for Queen Victoria after her death in 1901.

Blown up by Jordan's Arab Legion during the 1948 War of Independence, it was again rebuilt, and officially reopened on March 15, 2010.

Buck, whose parents, Abraham Meir and Rachel, were born in Jerusalem, has a personal connection to the tragic yet inspirational story of this fabled synagogue.

Her father's great-grandfather, Rabbi Avraham Meir Ben Yirmiyahu, played an instrumental role in the rebuilding of the shul in the 19th century.

It was he who carried a klaf – an important Jewish document written in florid fashion on kosher parchment – to Europe to raise funds for its reconstruction. His mission was successful. Thanks in part to his efforts, the Hurva arose from the ashes.

The inextricable link between Buck's family and the synagogue was delineated by Buck's cousin in Jerusalem, Ruth Marcus, a retired professor of mathematics at Tel Aviv University and a member of the Israel Genealogy Society.

Two decades ago, while researching the genealogy of her family over the centuries in Palestine, she heard about a klaf that aroused her curiosity.

Owned by an Orthodox Jewish family in Jerusalem, it contained Rabbi Ben Yirmiyahu's name in bold letters. Bowled over by the discovery, she and her cousin sought to buy the klaf, but the owners preferred to keep it in their possession.

Two years ago, when Buck visited Israel, she and Marcus went to see the klaf once again. This time, she was allowed to take a photograph of it.

To Buck's delight, the photograph was placed in the vestibule of the rebuilt synagogue.

When it was officially reopened in the presence of Israeli politicians and rabbis after about five years of construction, Buck was permitted to unveil the klaf.

"It was an amazing experience," she said. "It was like unveiling a Rembrandt painting."

She added, "Despite Arab protests, the dedication ceremony was a joyous occasion. Adults and children alike danced and sang with great fervour and hope for the future."

Orah Buck

Palestinian leaders claimed that the reconstruction of the synagogue was a sign of Israel's intention to destroy the Temple Mount. Indeed, Hamas described the opening of the shul as "a declaration of war," while Iran called it a "catastrophe that has distressed the Islamic world."

In honour of its resurrection and her family's historic ties to the synagogue, Buck has made a 38-minute documentary film, which is available in DVD form.

Titled The Hurva and the Klaf, the film, with a musical score by the late Canadian composer Srul Irving Glick, recounts the turbulent history of the synagogue and her family's relationship with it.

Buck hopes that the DVD will inspire viewers to visit Jerusalem and spend time in the Hurva Synagogue.

Former GG honoured with CHW award

Sheila Dropkin
Special to The CJN

Former governor general Michaëlle Jean is the recipient of the Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (CHW) Woman of Achievement Award.

The announcement was made at the closing luncheon of the organization's 40th national convention held in Toronto recently.

Although Jean had hoped to attend the luncheon, she had to cancel when called to the country of her birth, Haiti, for which she is a UNESCO Special Envoy.

In a videotaped message, Jean greeted the guests in three languages – Hebrew, English and French – and called the CHW members "change makers, with whom I share a deep commitment to supporting child development, enhancing health care and eradicating violence against women.

"I receive the Women of Achievement Award as a tribute to the work I have pursued to support and empower hundreds of women, men and youth across Canada," she said.

She added that she is "delighted to learn that you, the women of CHW, have opened the door to explore how you can join the Michaëlle Jean Foundation in its pan-Canadian campaign to ensure that no young person is left behind."

Fluent in five languages – French, English, Italian, Spanish and Creole – Jean immigrated to Canada with her family in 1968 to escape Haiti's then-dictatorial government. While still a student, she worked with Quebec shelters for battered women and helped establish a network of these facilities across the country.

A journalist, radio personality and teacher, she has participated in documentary filmmaking with her husband, Jean-Daniel Lafond. The couple has a young daughter, Marie-Eden.

Sworn in as governor general in September 2005, she crisscrossed Canada, visiting many previously isolated communities, and led 40 missions and state visits abroad.

The newly established Michaëlle Jean Foundation focuses on youth and the arts as a means of engaging young people in social transformation and mobilization, said Linda Lewis, editor-in-chief of More magazine.

In accepting the award on Jean's behalf, Carol Chabot, the foundation's director of development, spoke about Jean's commitment to education, which is also a focus of CHW's programs. She added that Jean has just been named chancellor of the University of Ottawa, which also presented her with an honorary degree.

The CHW Women of Achievement Award was established in 1996 and is bestowed on outstanding Canadian women. Recipients are chosen from different communities across the country and represent a wide variety of business, professional and social endeavours. Previous honorees include entrepreneur Heather Reisman; the rescuer of Syrian Jewry, Judy Feld Carr, and former MPs Elinor Caplan and Flora McDonald.

Earlier in the convention, Amir Gissin, the former director of public affairs in the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs, was the keynote speaker at the Rebecca Sieff Award dinner.

The Sieff Award, named for the founder of World WIZO, was presented to Jonathan Quart in recognition of his accomplishments as principal of the CHW Netanya Technological High School in Israel.

Omer Filus, who is in the business management program at the high school, and Orel Raz, in the software engineering study track, attended as representatives of the student body. Both teenagers recently participated in the March of the Living program, which Quart added to the school's curriculum with the help of CHW funding.

The convention's opening session was addressed by Helena Glaser, who has served as president of World WIZO for the past seven years.

'Deeply in line with Jewish values'

"I just think it's very important that when we engage in social activism, we don't leave our identities at the door," she said, adding that, while Judaism is not the focus of her activism, it is very much a part of who she is.

Another member of Hashomer Hatzair, Daniel Roth, 30, has participated in both the Occupy Wall Street protests in New York, and the Occupy Toronto protests, where he was also an organizer. He, too, draws a connection between Judaism and the message of the movement.

"Jewish thought, culture, history and faith are all rooted in a vision of justice, compassion and equity. The Occupy movement is deeply in line with Jewish values. To work in this movement is to do a mitzvah," he wrote in an e-mail from Tel Aviv, where he has just moved "to work toward social justice, economic equity, sustainability and self-determination for Jews and Palestinians."

While there was some concern raised in the media recently about anti-Israel and antisemitic protesters at Occupy Wall Street, Smith, Isaacs and Roth all said they did not encounter those sentiments in St. James Park.

"One of the challenges of being a left-wing Zionist, as I am, is that often, when you go out to support a social struggle, people want to drag [the Israeli-Palestinian conflict] into it," Isaacs said, adding that she was "pleasantly surprised" not to find that at Occupy Toronto.

Instead, protesters were more focused on addressing inequality and achieving social justice. Smith thinks the ideas being put forward in the movement can also be addressed in the Jewish community, with a focus on making the community more inclusive, on issues like synagogue membership costs, for example.

Roth feels that members of the Jewish community have begun to pick up the Occupy message and to become more involved in the movement, even though the Occupy Judaism activities, which had Jewish protesters in New York holding prayer services regularly, didn't reach Toronto. "The Occupy movement is deeply in line with Jewish values and we as a community are beginning to realize that," he said.

Although the tents have come down at St. James Park, for many activists, the struggle is not over. Isaacs said the protests have been an important step forward. "What's happened here in the last month is that a conversation has been started," she said. "I think that we'll continue and continue to grow."

On Dec. 10, Bruce Beutler, Saul Perlmutter, Adam Riess and Dan Shechtman will don white tie and tails. They will ascend a dais in Stockholm to be awarded their Nobel Prizes. On that day, they will also enter an exclusive – yet surprisingly large – community: Jewish winners of the Nobel Prize. Today, we shep a little nachas.

Previous Jewish winners include: [http://bit.ly/jnobel1]

- Albert Einstein (physics, 1921)
- Nadine Gordimer (literature, 1991)
- And Elie Wiesel, whose 1986 prize wasn't for literature but for peace. "One of the most important spiritual leaders and guides in an age when violence, repression and racism continue to characterize the world." [http://bit.ly/jnobel2]

The Nobel Prizes are always presented on Dec. 10, birthday of Alfred Nobel. When Robert Aumann won it in 2005, it fell on a Saturday – as it does this year – and that posed some logistical challenges for the Sabbath-observant economist and mathematician. Everything ended well as we are told in a lovely article in Jewish Action magazine. After Sabbath, at the gala ball, Aumann stepped up to the microphone and led all the celebrants in the classic song Gesher tzar meod – "The whole world is nothing but a very narrow bridge. And the main thing is to have no fear at all." [http://bit.ly/jnobel4]

Another article mentions Israeli Nobel laureate S.Y. Agnon. That writer was probably the only recipient who included in his acceptance speech the blessing that is said upon seeing the king of a non-Jewish nation – in this case, the king of Sweden. "Blessed is He who has given of His glory to flesh and blood." [http://bit.ly/jnobel5]

Do Nobel laureates sense that a win is in the offing? To get an answer, listen to a charming interview with Prof. Perlmutter done by CBC Radio's Bob McDonald. Not only does the professor try his best to demystify dark energy, but he also puts a personal touch on being a laureate when he recounts how he was awakened with the news by a Swedish reporter asking for his reaction to winning the award – while Perlmutter's wife was Googling away on the computer to see if this was some kind of hoax.

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

This year's celebrations will be bittersweet for the family of Ralph Steinman, winner of the Nobel Prize in medicine. Prof. Steinman died three days before the announcement, but since this was unknown to the selection committee, his win was allowed to stand. A few days later, Rockefeller University held a ceremony to honour his memory. The video of the event includes a moving tribute by Steinman's son, Adam. [http://bit.ly/jnobel7]

And back to Aumann for one final anecdote. When the Nobel winner was asked what the most memorable part of the celebrations was for him, he said seeing the Israeli flag flying over the palace, along with the flags of the other winners' nations. Back in 1966, Agnon "was also moved by the sight of the Israeli flag in Stockholm and asked his wife, Esther, 'Did you ever dream you would see the Israeli flag flying over the palace in my honour?' Her laconic reply: 'I usually do not dream about flags!'"

Technology can enhance the GA

I recently attended the General Assembly of the Jewish Federations of North America. The annual event convenes thousands of federation professional and lay leaders who raise and allocate significant portions of our community's fundraising. Alongside federations, hundreds of allied organizations vie for attention, adding to the frenzy.

I love the GA. As a student I attended four. The energy of the conference, the pride of working for communal needs and the power of large crowds gathered in common purpose is inebriating. As a student, it was an unparalleled experience. I was taken by the whizz bang of the event: speeches by presidents, concerts by Jewish rock stars, and breakfasts in the federation suite. I haven't attended a GA since it was in Toronto in 2005. It's difficult to say whether the event or my understanding of it has changed.

The program serves as a barometer of issues facing the Jewish community. The topics discussed, and equally those not on the agenda, demonstrate the direction of the community and its challenges. Sessions exploring continuity, fundraising and advocacy remain stalwarts. This year, I noted growing emphases on aging baby boomers, multiple forms of attachment to Israel, innovations in education, and changing philanthropic trends.

Little session time, however, was devoted to openly discussing these issues. Rather than crowdsourcing, ideas were presented as a fait accompli, undermining their complexity and underutilizing the audience. Technology could have buttressed sessions with parallel online debates, but rather than a dialogue in step with presentations, online posts read as individuals preening before a digital audience. The brain power in the room was incredible, but the program failed to tap it.

One issue facing the federations was the structure of funding for Israel and overseas projects. While historically the Jewish Agency and the Joint Distribution Committee were the primary overseas partners, a vote following the GA dramatically altered this relationship. Hardly a word about this critical decision was uttered in official sessions.

The weight of the GA lies not in the sessions, but in the hallways. The hotel lobby and coffee shop were abuzz with vigorous debates and conversations. To capitalize on the potential of the GA and capture the attention and voices of a younger generation, these conversations must be moved into the public sphere, in person or online.

With critical conversations pushed into the hallway, I was delighted when Rabbi Elie Kaunfer, co-founder of Mechon Hadar, raised the bar of reflection. Rabbi Kaunfer served as scholar-in-residence, a new role created since my last GA that roots the communal conversations in text and tradition. During the opening plenary, Rabbi Kaunfer questioned a basic assumption of Jewish leadership: "Jewish continuity is the end goal, and everything is in service of that goal," he argued. "In our zeal to ensure the Jewish future, we forgot to articulate why it matters for Judaism to continue." Unfortunately, Rabbi Kaunfer's rich fodder for debate wasn't picked up in ensuing conversations, and his challenging words were left unattended.

If the GA is to play a central role in defining the direction of Jewish communal life in a new generation, the debates of the hallway must be moved to centre stage, starting with Rabbi Kaunfer's astute reflection on our basic assumptions.

Aish Toronto honours four women

Pamela Bielak

Rebecca Lambert

Ellen Schwartz

Nancy Weisbrod

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Aish Toronto's 30th anniversary gala at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue last week honoured four women who have "impacted the world."

The honorees were Pamela Bielak, founder and president of Crafting for Cure, a not-for-profit charity that supplies craft kits to 40 hospitals in Canada and 10 in the United States; Rebecca Lambert, co-founder of the Jewish Women's Renaissance Project, which has sent thousands of mothers worldwide on subsidized trips to Israel to discover their heritage; Ellen Schwartz, co-founder of Jacob's Ladder (the Canadian Foundation for Control of Neurodegenerative Disease) and founder of Project Give Back, a program for elementary students; and Nancy Weisbrod, founding president of the Village Shul.

Also at the dinner, Aish Toronto launched the Women's Leadership Initiative, "a program that will empower Jewish women to take leadership roles in their community, their cities and their world."

This initiative aims to be a model for other communities of faith, geography and cultures to engage women and girls in leadership opportunities.

"Aish Toronto is launching [the initiative] based on the recognition that throughout the Jewish People's history, it has been the leadership of women that has been the key to our survival and redemption," it said in a statement.

Programming includes seminars and workshops, forums and discussions for women leaders to learn from one another, as well as women's leadership mentoring with leadership coaches and leadership missions to Israel.

Keynote speaker at the gala was Nitsana Darshan-Leitner, an Israeli lawyer, human rights activist, and founder of Shurat Hadin Israel Law Center, which fights terrorism by suing the perpetrators of attacks. She said that she continues to fight terrorists, because "I have no other choice. [We can't] stand idly by our brother's blood."

Master of ceremonies was Lori Palatnik.

Words, and deeds, need not sow division

Every Kabbalat Shabbat, we read in Lecha Dodi, "Sof ma'aseh bemachshavah techilah" ("The outcome of every action depends on the initial thought"). All of us need to think before we speak or act.

Once an out-of-town visitor entered a synagogue and sat in an empty seat. Shortly thereafter, a member of the shul approached the guest, informing him that he had taken his seat. The guest mumbled an apology and uncomfortably searched the room for another one.

After prayers, the rabbi chastised the congregant for his insensitivity toward the guest. "You should have let the guest stay in your seat and spared him the discomfort," he said.

The congregant, however, argued that the Talmud says that a person should designate a regular place for his prayer. "That's my designated spot!" he exclaimed.

The rabbi assured him that the Talmud's source for praying in a designated place comes from the story in Bereshit about Abraham, who designated a place to speak to Hashem. Yet Abraham later excused himself from speaking to Hashem in order to tend to guests. Elsewhere, the Talmud tells us that we learn from this episode is that receiving guests is even more important than receiving the Divine Presence. Kindness to a guest, therefore, trumps praying in a designated place.

A few weeks ago, I read that the former Mossad chief, Efraim Halevy, declared the growing haredi "radicalization [to be] a greater threat than Iran" to the State of Israel. He added that "ultra-Orthodox extremism has darkened our lives." With one ill-conceived sentence, Halevy offended not only the haredi movement, but also other fair-minded people who, although not haredi themselves, believe haredim have rights and make contributions to Israel.

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

With all due respect, it would seem that Halevy did not think carefully before he spoke and should have been aware that the haredi movement brings much that is admirable to Israeli society as a whole.

He made no mention of the haredi-led Zaka volunteers who tend to the dead and wounded after terror attacks, to name but one example of haredi chesed (kindness) that is extended to all of Israeli society.

Furthermore, one wonders if Halevy has heard of Rabbi Avraham Elimelech Fierer, the haredi founder of the extraordinary non-profit Ezra Lemarpeh, an organization that provides lifesaving medical care inside and outside Israel to all Israelis, irrespective of religious affiliation.

I remember a man once asking why more observant people in Vancouver had not attended a community event held the previous week. Another responded that the organizers had put observant Jews in an awkward position by serving kosher food only upon request, while non-kosher food was served generally, thus creating division.

I, too, felt discomfort knowing that, even though I was eating kosher food, I was condoning, by my mere presence, fellow Jews eating non-kosher food. Many simply couldn't attend under these circumstances. Even more sad was the certainty that everyone could have eaten kosher food and enjoyed the event together.

Let us make an effort to heed our rabbis, who continually enjoin us to try to put ourselves in others' shoes before we speak and act.

Rothchilds honoured as they make aliyah

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Kurt and Edith Rothschild will be honoured by Mizrachi Canada and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto at a "legacy dinner" Dec. 11 at Toronto's Sheraton Centre. Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, chief rabbi of Tel Aviv, will be the guest speaker.

The Rothschilds – he a well-known Toronto philanthropist and Mizrachi stalwart, and his wife a past president of Toronto's Emunah Women and author of the vegetarian cookbook Nutrilicious: Food for Thought and Whole Health – have made aliyah.

"We feel the time has come," Kurt said in an interview in the couple's Toronto apartment in September, before they left for Israel. "There are positive reasons of idealism and philosophy – and practical reasons, since it's getting more difficult, due to our age, to fly back and forth."

After decades of living in North America, "it's a big move," Edith said. She added that since they've had an apartment in Jerusalem for many years, Israel already feels "like home." As well, their daughter and her family live there.

Nonetheless, Kurt plans to return to Toronto two to three times a year to continue some of his community activities.

Mizrachi Canada chair Jack Kahn, who has known the Rothschilds for more than 40 years, told The CJN that many people don't know about "the chesed [Kurt] does of a personal nature to individuals and families… He has adopted so many families that he has taken under his wing. He takes an interest in their welfare and the education of their children."

As well, Kahn added, Kurt "was very involved in the resettlement of the evacuees from Gush Katif [Gaza] in the last few years."

He has devoted himself to community work full-time since 1987, when he sold his national contracting business.

Edith – who describes herself as "not a political person… just the opposite" of her husband – is fully supportive of all his endeavours, Kahn said.

Kurt traces his community involvement to being "very keenly political" at a young age.

A native of Cologne, he attended Queen's University during the war while his parents were in England. He had left Germany as a teenager, completed his high school education in London and was interned with other young German Jews before being sent to Canada, where he spent two years in an internment camp near Fredericton.

"I was very much affected by reports of the Holocaust and the Zionist quest for having a home for the Jewish people," he said. "The fact that one million Jewish children were killed in cold blood by the Nazis was a factor that made me very involved in Jewish communal work in the continuity of our people.

Kurt and Edith Rothschild

A strong proponent of the importance of Jewish education, particularly day school, he is also motivated by increased rates of assimilation and intermarriage. "It's only through education, successful education, making Judaism pleasant and interesting, that people will stay within the fold."

But he expressed concern about anti-Israel sentiment in Canada and other countries: "This claim by our adversaries all over the world that Israel is a racist country mercilessly persecuting Arabs is a grotesque misinformation, a deliberate lie."

Rothschild, who is on the board of Shaare Zedek Hospital, among other institutions, said that hospitals in Israel have Arab doctors and Arab patients "getting the best medical care," as do their Jewish counterparts.

"It's a great pity that Arab children in schools are taught to hate Jews. Kids in our Jewish schools are not taught to hate. It's not a Jewish way of life."

However, he added, "obviously we have to react when we are being attacked."

Edith, who is from Mannheim, Germany, left Europe for New York in 1938 after a relative sponsored her family.

The couple – now great-grandparents many times over – met when both were 29, more than 60 years ago, on a Labour Day weekend at a kosher adult camp in Schroon Lake, N.Y., in the Adirondack Mountains.

Kurt, who was living in Montreal at the time, was travelling with a friend when their car broke down en route to the Catskills.

"They had to stop for Shabbat, and he happened to be sitting next to me at a big, long table," Edith recalled. They were married within six months, and lived in Montreal for 10 years before moving to Toronto.

Edith, whose formal education was interrupted by the war, went on to earn a BA in English literature from the University of Toronto, studying part-time after the couple's three children were born. She also has an MA in counselling psychology from the Alfred Adler Institute of Chicago (now the Adler Professional School of Psychology), and has studied alternative health and nutrition. She is working on a second book.

Kurt has this advice to offer the Toronto Jewish community, which he credits for its strong Jewish identity and loyalty to the State of Israel: "to stick together and co-exist peacefully and courteously, and to help each other."

'Take some leadership,' Federation tells Israelis

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Jewish community leaders had a message for Israelis who have chosen the Toronto area as their home: Israelis need to get involved in the development of Jewish community.

A panel discussion held last week at the Lipa Green Centre addressed the need to foster dialogue between Israeli and Canadian Jews in Toronto, and to generate ideas to enhance Israelis' role in the Jewish community.

Sara Dobner, chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israeli identity program, and Galya Sarner, the director of the Israeli-Canadian Project at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre – now located in the Lipa Green Centre but moving to the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan in 2012 – worked together to present a discussion about "bridging the gap" between Canadian Jews and Israeli immigrants living in Toronto.

Sara Dobner

Representing an organization founded in 2010 to help Israelis preserve their Israeli identity and encourage their integration into the Canadian Jewish community, Dobner opened the discussion with the idea that Canadian and Israeli Jews each have something to offer one another.

"We need each other because we care about the community, about our continuity, and about building a Jewish future for our children. We have a lot to gain and too much to lose if we don't work together," said Dobner, who moved to Toronto from Israel 24 years ago.

She acknowledged that many Israelis still have "open wounds resulting from the unwelcoming of Israelis by Jewish organizations in the past," and struggle with the North American mentality that Jewish identity must be fostered by enrolling children in Jewish schools, attending synagogue, and volunteering with Jewish organizations.

"It is hard to relate to all this and identify with it, and many of us resent it, as, in addition to the financial sacrifice. It also symbolizes for some of us the old Diaspora world of the helpless, old fashioned Jews."

But Dobner said Israelis should be open to the Toronto Jewish community that "really wants to embrace us."

She warned, however, that there is a risk that if Israelis don't work on forging a place for themselves in the Canadian Jewish community, their children may not feel the need to identify with their Jewishness.

Rabbi Dow Marmur, a Toronto Star and CJN columnist, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple, and an Israeli citizen with a home in Jerusalem, called on Israelis to get involved in Jewish community life.

"Don't ask what the community can do for you, ask what you can do for your community," he said.

Highlighting some of the obstacles that keep Canadians and Israelis from relating to one another, Rabbi Marmur said affiliating with a synagogue and philanthropy are two ways that Diaspora Jews keep themselves involved in the community.

"Neither of those touch Israelis," he said, adding that Toronto Jews need "to learn something from [Israelis'] secularism."

Ted Sokolsky, UJA's president and CEO, said that as the Israeli population north of Steeles Avenue continues to grow, Israelis must take the opportunity to shape the community they live in.

"You are part of the groundswell of that beginning… you are on the ground floor," Sokolsky said.

"You can't complain anymore that there is an old establishment there. You are a part of the establishment. You are the establishment of the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, and it is yours to shape… It's time to take some leadership, show us things we need to learn. This is your moment."

Jonathan Dahoah-Halevi, Shalom Toronto's editor, said the concept of bridging the gap between the two Jewish sub-groups is a non-issue and "just a matter of time" before Israeli immigrants integrate into the community.

Their children and the following generations will consider themselves Canadian Jews rather than Israeli.

"Israelis are a part of the community – there is no doubt about that," he said.

Paul Shaviv, the director of education for the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, began by polling the 80-person audience on whether they graduated from, taught at, or had children who attended Tanenbaum CHAT.

When nearly half of the audience raised their hands, Shaviv said that he's encouraged by the fact that the number of children of Israelis at their campuses has "risen considerably over the last four or five years."

He said the numbers have nearly doubled over the last seven or eight years.

When the discussion was opened up to the audience, Arie Raif, a former Israeli diplomat, said that when he arrived in Canada years ago, "the community here was not very welcoming. Let's face the facts."

He said he disagreed with Dahoah-Halevi that it is a matter of time before Israelis become integrated.

"We have to integrate ourselves within the Canadian Jewish community. We have to have a voice… we have to be in the organizations. We have to make sure that the voice of the Diaspora… is heard in Israel," Raif said.

"We have to be a part of the Canadian Jewish community whether they like it or they don't."

CIJA to consult community on hate law stand

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Justice Minister Rob Nicholson last week called on fellow MPs to support a private members bill that will eliminate Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA) as an infringement to free speech.

Rob Nicholson

Jewish community organizations have been vocal proponents of the section, although more recently Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada have called for amendments that would address critics' concerns that it is tilted in favour of complainants.

Last week, however, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) adopted a different approach.

CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel said debate over the section "is an important opportunity to reach out and engage amcha [the Jewish community] in participating in the public policy debate… We are very keen to provide a platform for this kind of engagement.

"We will be holding town halls in Toronto, as well as an electronic town hall featuring two leading proponents of their respective positions."

After noting that Congress was one of the community organizations folded into CIJA, Fogel said: "I have to balance a respectful acknowledgment of Congress' past involvement with a commitment to involve the community at the grassroots level in a meaningful way. In this regard, it is possible that the traditional position advanced by CJC will not benefit from the same degree of support.

"I don't want to pre-judge the outcome of our consultation process, but I will remind everyone that Congress also felt Section 13 was deficient and recommended extensive changes in its presentation to the Richard Moon inquiry. So it is safe to say we would be unlikely to support the retention of Section 13 in its current form. However, the extent to which we would see value in its continued inclusion altogether must await the consultation process."

Asked if the Jewish community would benefit from the retention of Section 13, Fogel stated: "What was intended as a shield against hate has become a sword. Certainly in its day, it was helpful in confronting the challenges related to the likes of [Holocaust denier] Ernst Zundel… What it has really done is create difficulties for those who might legitimately want to raise questions about groups or ideas that in fact are a threat to the Jewish community or Israel. In effect, the act has become an instrument to chill critical debate about important issues like radical Islam."

While CIJA was ready to reconsider its position, B'nai Brith issued a news release maintaining its support for the section.

"Proposed legislation introduced in the House of Commons to eliminate sections 13 and 54 (the remedies section) of the Canadian Human Rights Act is the wrong course to take at this time," B'nai Brith stated.

Pointing to impending court judgments in two hate cases, B'nai Brith CEO Frank Dimant said, "It would be strategic to await such decisions before proceeding.

"Wiping out one remedy for hate on the Internet without a careful review of all the consequences opens floodgates that may later be difficult to close," he stated.

Canadian law currently prohibits hate speech through Criminal Code provisions and the CHRA. The CHRA allows complainants to bring cases before a tribunal, without the consent of the provincial attorney general, as is the case in criminal prosecutions. CHRA procedures do not include penal remedies. They also feature a lower burden of proof, looser evidentiary standards, and they do not afford the defences available to accused persons in criminal cases.

In parliamentary debates, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler said freedom of speech is not absolute. All free societies limit it to some extent.

Referring to previous Supreme Court of Canada decisions, the former justice minister said: "Hate speech itself constitutes an assault on the very values that underlie freedom of expression.

"This promotion of hate speech actually constitutes an assault on that bedrock principle of freedom of expression.

"Hate speech is an equality issue as well as a free-speech issue," he continued. "The promotion of hatred and contempt against an identifiable group results in prejudicial harm to the individual and group targets of that hate speech. As the [Supreme] Court put it, the concern resulting from racism and hate mongering is not simply the product of its offensiveness, but from the very real harm it causes." He called for amendments to the section to address critics' concerns.

Brian Storseth, the Conservative backbench MP who tabled the private member's bill, offered a different perspective.

He argued the bill "would help to protect and enhance our most fundamental freedom, and that is the freedom of expression and speech.

"Section 13… eats away at this fundamental freedom. Most people are shocked when I explain to them that in Canada… a person can be investigated under a Section 13 complaint for having likely exposed a person or persons to hatred or contempt.

"The key word is 'likely' to have exposed. I think we can all agree that this is a very subjective and unnecessarily vague definition, not one of the narrowly defined legal definitions that would be far more appropriate for this clause. This is where Section 13 truly fails to make a distinction between real hate speech and what I often tern as 'hurt speech,' or speech that is simply offensive."

Storseth noted that in 2008, the Canadian Human Rights Commission hired Prof. Richard Moon to evaluate Section 13, as well as its relationship with the Criminal Code. Moon recommended Section 13 be repealed, he said.

Seminary opens

JTA

TORONTO — The first mainstream Jewish rabbinical seminary in Canada held its official launching on Sunday. The Toronto-based Canadian Yeshiva & Rabbinical School is "fully halachic yet modern, the home of classic Judaism," according to its website. "We are, first and foremost, a rabbinical school for Canadians who wish to grow and serve in the community they love."

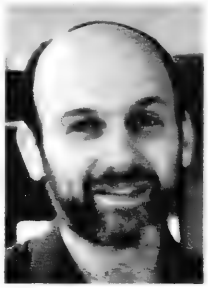
Veterinarians hear about kosher slaughter

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec veterinarians heard both sides of the debate over the ethics of kosher slaughter during their recent annual convention.

Rabbi Schachar Orenstein of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue and Concordia University Judaic studies professor Ira Robinson were guest panelists at the meeting of the Ordre des Médecins Vétérinaires du Québec, held in St. Hyacinthe from Nov. 10 to 13.



Rabbi Schachar Orenstein

The professional order devoted a half-day session on Nov. 10 to the topic of "Animals, cultures and religions," featuring a panel that also included Sofiane El Ketroussi, whose poultry company is certified halal by the Montreal Muslim community, and lawyer Martine Lachance of the Université du Québec à Montréal, who specializes in animal rights.

Robinson and Rabbi Orenstein said they provided a broad overview of what Judaism has to say about preventing the suffering of animals, without getting into the technical details of kosher slaughter, or shchitah.

Lachance presented the case that this type of killing is crueller than non-kosher slaughter and that it should not be condoned under freedom of religion, Robinson said.

However, the discussion remained civil and the audience was generally "upbeat and respectful," Robinson said. "This was not by any means a polemical platform for anyone. It was meant to be informative for the veterinarians, and I think it was."

He presented a 15-minute PowerPoint presentation entitled "Prévenir la douleur des êtres vivants: La tradition juive et les animaux" ("Preventing pain of living beings: the Jewish tradition and animals"), in which he tried to show that respect for animals is a deeply rooted principle.

The Book of Exodus commands that not only man, but the animals that work for them, should rest on the Sabbath, he explained. One of the seven Noahide laws, believed to be given by God for all humanity, prohibits eating flesh that's torn off living animals. The Talmud says a man should not eat before he has fed his animal.

"We did our best to try to prevent the banning of kosher slaughter as has been recently legislated in five European countries and New Zealand," said Rabbi Orenstein.

While the issue has received scant attention in Quebec, he added, "That's the way we want to keep it, but some of the animal rights people are picking up on the trends in Europe."

Veterinarians work with the Canadian Food Inspection Agency at kosher abbatoirs, but this is believed to be the first open discussion of its kind between members of the profession and the Jewish community.

Robinson said it came about through his acquaintance with Solange Lefebvre, of the Université de Montréal's theology faculty, who co-organized the session.

"This was not entered into lightly, nor was the purpose to propagandize, but if ritual slaughter ever becomes a serious debate in Quebec, veterinarians will no doubt be influential in its outcome," Robinson said.

He estimated that about 100 people attended the session, which ran concurrently with others at the convention, which indicates the level of interest. The order's president Joël Bergeron closed the discussion.

Rabbi Orenstein thinks the audience was intrigued by him because he is an Orthodox Jew and a vegetarian, a choice he made for "ethical, health and environmental reasons" years ago.

He said the question of whether kosher or non-kosher slaughter, which in the case of mammals involves stunning, causes the least suffering is a complex one. He mentioned that the respected American doctor of animal science, Temple Grandin, a consultant to the livestock industry, has defended the slaughter by throat-cutting as humane, if done properly.

"Judaism does care about animal cruelty, and measures are ongoing to reduce any suffering in slaughter, but there are parameters [of Jewish law] that we must stay within," Rabbi Orenstein said. "I am sensitive to these issues, and think there can be improvements.

"But I attempted to broaden the discussion, to the treatment of animals, how they are raised and transported."

In announcing the session, the order said that, with the growing public awareness of animal welfare in Quebec, the veterinary profession must have a better understanding and engage in a dialogue with communities that have different traditions and practices on this issue.

Bar-Ilan rep promotes Israel program

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Meir Balofsky, the director of informal education at Bar-Ilan University, was in Toronto last week to convince graduating high school students of the value of learning and living abroad.

Balofsky, who visited students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Ulpanat Orot Day School, was promoting Bar-Ilan's Israel Experience program.

"I think what people should do is recognize the value of taking a gap year after high school for themselves," Balofsky said.

Although a gap year is traditionally thought of as a year away from traditional schooling – a chance for young people to work, travel and gain real-life experience – this program combines the benefits of an exchange program with an opportunity to live and work in a society so different from their own.

He said students who were raised in Jewish schools, were members of synagogues and youth groups and have "learned about Israel either from the Tanach or the news, should take a year and be in Israel, hands on, and experience it, and solidify everything you've learned.

"This program was born out of this idea that even kids who understood the value of going to Israel for a year weren't going because they had no interest in spending the whole year in a yeshiva seminary," Balofsky said.

On the other hand, most of the other opportunities were too much on the secular side.

"They thought, 'If I'm just going to go to a university, why don't I just go to one here? What do I need to go to Israel for?'"

Balofsky said Israel Experience is an Orthodox program that balances the two sides of the religious spectrum, offering Judaic studies and general studies courses in English.

Women and men study together, "so they really get that flavour of a traditional learning environment."

Students get full credit for the courses they complete, which is "easily transferable" to a North American school.

Following the program, students have the choice to return home to pursue an education at a North American school as a second-year student, or continue with their studies at an Israeli university.

Meir Balofsky was in Toronto last month to promote Bar-Ilan University's Israel Experience program

"On average, about 20 per cent of our students stay in Israel. Some go to yeshivas, some go to the army, or they can choose to stay at Bar-Ilan and do their whole degree in English," Balofsky said.

He said the classes are held at the university, but the dorms for the program participants are off-campus.

"Because of that, they're able to better supervise the students, organize social programming each night," Balofsky said.

"We're really able to create our own sense of family."

Within the program, which is in its third year, students are also offered opportunities for internships, community service placements, Israel advocacy training and travel.

"We think learning about Israel should be a hands-on experience, too."

Balofsky added how important he thinks it is for young students to take advantage of an opportunity to live away from home for a year.

"There's a new trend of students who feel like they don't want to miss a year. But whether you're done in three or four years, no one is going to care."

Employment linked to health says new JVS president

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Frank Markel, 65, the new president and CEO of Jewish Vocational Services (JVS), says his career path has definite links.

Although until now he has worked in health-care administration, Markel said that many studies show there is a direct correlation between employment statistics and health.

Frank Markel

The Winnipeg native who is the father of five and the grandfather of two was previously president of Trillium Gift of Life Network, and helped establish the Toronto Rehabilitation Institute. "I'm happy now to have the chance to help people find meaningful work. There is no question that it is linked to health."

This is the first time he has worked in the Jewish community, he said, and "I feel lucky to have a leading role in an organization that represents [its best values]. That was a big draw for me. JVS still plays a major role in helping Jews find work. The inner Jew in me is certainly coming out."

He knew he was in the right place, he said, after attending the retirement party for Karen Goldenberg, the former president and CEO of JVS.

"I met a Jewish woman from Argentina who was trained there as a pharmacist. Her degree was not recognized here, but she came to JVS for guidance and eventually wrote her [qualification] exams. She is now a pharmacist in Hamilton," Markel said.

"She came to the party because she was so grateful to JVS. This made a big impact on me."

He was struck by how JVS assists the community at large, he said, when he met a Lebanese woman who received help from the agency. "That meant a lot to me."

He met these two women, he said, after his first day of work. "I had already felt lucky to work here. These stories were icing on the cake. Imagine how many more stories there are."

Markel said that in Goldenberg's 12 years at the head of JVS, she did an incredible job of expanding the organization's vision. "She realized the needs of the broader immigrant community, and I have always been fascinated by their stories.

"Many immigrants are highly qualified in their field and just need help finding employment. JVS's Emet employment program is dedicated to helping people in the Jewish community find different types of jobs. Potential employees can drop in or call, and there is a dedicated website, www.emetemployment.ca."

At his post for several months now, he has not made any big changes. "I'm trying to get to know people, and hearing their ideas."

בשנים האחרונות הייתי יורד אליך ומזדעזע ממצבך העלוב- המלונות הגדולים, השפכים, הבורות המסוכנים (בולענים) שנפערו בך כמו מחלת עור סופנית. ראיתי כמה שאתה עצוב וזה הכעיס אותי מאוד. כששמעת שמציגים אותך כמועמד ל"אחד משבעת פלאי עולם" היית בטוח שזו טעות- איך זה שהאנשים שמבזים אותך, מייבשים אותך, מטנפים אותך פתרום נזכרו? אז אני אסביר לך- הישראלים מאוד אוהבים לנצח את העולם- שיראו כולם כמה שהם טובים, כמה שהם חכמים ומצבך האמיתי לא ממש מעניין אותם. שר התיירות, שלא ביקר אותך בילדותו, אמר שנצחון שלך יביא הרבה תיירות ועבודה- הוא קיוה לארוחת חינם-לזכות בתואר בלי לעבוד. או יותר נכון "עבודה עברית".
אני יודע שאתה יודע שלא מגיע לך, ושזה יהיה פלא אם ישאר ממך אפילו קצה של אגמון עם הטמטום ורוע הלב של האחראים עליך.
אז אולי במקום להתיימר שאתה פלא עולמי- כדאי לשמור שלא תתייבש לנו ושנקום יום אחד ותהיה הסטוריה, כמו שעשו לאגם החולה.

כותבת כוויתית מברכת את שליט

להלן מה שכתבה אקבאל אל אחמד בעתון "אל קבס" בכווית:
"שליט, יש לך מזל במולדתך, הלוואי שכולנו היינו שליט...תדמיינו: אלף עשרים ושבעה ערבים וערביות הוצבו על כף המאזניים. הכף הזאת ירדה מעדף המשקל. הצעיר הישראלי הכחוש, שקוע העיניים הוצב על כף המאזניים. כף המאזניים של אלף ערבים עלתה עד למפלס של שליט הישראלי היחיד.
אתם יודעים למה קינאתי בשליט...למה ייחלתי להיות במקומו ולמה בירכתי אותו על מולדתו! זה בגלל ערך האדם וחשיבותו במולדתו....בעולמנו הערבי השלטון הוא מי שהורג ומי שעוזר ומעלים מאחורי השמש את נתיניו זכרים ובנות...."
ואני חשבתי לעצמי: אפילו אם הכותבת היא היחידה שחושבת כך- עצם זה שאפשרו לה לפרסם את זה- גם זה סימן.
אבל שישאר בינינו.

Arab League approves sanctions against Syria

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Arab League approved a series of financial sanctions against Syrian President Bashar Assad's regime on Sunday, as Arab nations step up pressure to end months of political violence in the country.

The move to impose new sanctions on Syria was supported by 19 of the 22 Arab League states.

The sanctions are believed to include a travel ban on senior Syrian officials and a halt to commercial flights to the country. Dealings with Syria's central bank would be halted, but basic commodities needed by the Syrian people would be exempted from the list of sanctions.

The vote came shortly after an opposition activist said Syrian security forces had killed 20 people on Sunday.

Qatar's Prime Minister Hamad bin Jassim, who heads the organization's committee on Syria, said the sanctions were approved by 19 of the organization's 22 members.

Syria, which is also an Arab League member, was not present at the talks or the ensuing vote.

Lebanon rejected the penalties, as did Iraq, which "expressed reservations," according to Jassim. The sanctions include a travel ban for senior Syrian officials and the suspension of trade projects with the Syrian government.

"These measures are aimed at staving off international intervention in the Syrian crisis," Jassim told a press conference in Cairo.

He was speaking after the pan-Arab organization held crisis talks on Syria.

The sanctions – the first by the bloc against a member country – were drafted with utmost attention to spare the Syrian people any harm, Jassim added. "These measures have been drafted in a way that will not affect social and development-related aspects inside Syria and its neighbours," the Qatari prime minister said.

Syria's Bashar Assad

The sanctions also include freezing assets owed by the Syrian government in Arab countries and halting dealings with Syria's central bank.

"The aim of today's decision is to stop bloodshed in Syria," said Arab League chief Nabil al-Arabi.

Most of Sunday's deaths occurred in Syria's restive province of Homs, according to Omar Ahsraf, a Syrian activist based in Lebanon.

"The death toll reached 20 and more than 40 were injured," Ahsraf told the dpa news agency, quoting sources inside Syria.

"The Syrian army has also stormed areas near Damascus hunting for army defectors," he added.

Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird said Canada "welcomed" the sanctions.

"This is another important signal from Syria's neighbours that the egregious behaviour of the Assad regime will not be tolerated," he said in a Nov. 27 statement.

"We are encouraged to hear of the Arab League's plans to engage with the UN. The senseless violence occurring in Syria can no longer be ignored. We call on the UN to follow the Arab League's decision and further isolate this reckless and illegitimate regime."

Baird also urged all Canadians in Syria to leave that country immediately "by commercial means while these are still available."

More than 3,500 people have been killed in the Syrian government's crackdown on pro-democracy protesters since mid-March, according to the United Nations.

Canada, U.S, tighten sanctions on Iran

JTA

With new measures tightening sanctions on Iran, both Canada and the United States moved one step further toward effectively cutting off the Islamic Republic's economy from the West.

U.S. President Barack Obama issued the measures on Nov. 21, in the form of an executive order and on Nov. 22, Ottawa followed suit with its own updated sanctions.

Foreign Minister John Baird said Canada was "deeply disturbed" by the International Atomic Energy Agency's recent report on the state of Iran's nuclear program.

That report determined there is "credible" evidence that Iran is pursuing a nuclear weapons capability.

"It is yet more proof that the current regime in Tehran poses the most significant threats to global peace and security today. We are compelled to take further action as a result," he said in a statement.

As a result, the government used the Special Economic Measures Act (SEMA) to impose more stringent sanctions on Iran.

The new Canadian measures include: prohibiting financial transactions with Iran, subject to certain exceptions; expanding the list of prohibited goods to include all goods used in the petrochemical, oil and gas industry in Iran; amending the list of prohibited goods to include additional items that could be used in Iran's nuclear program.

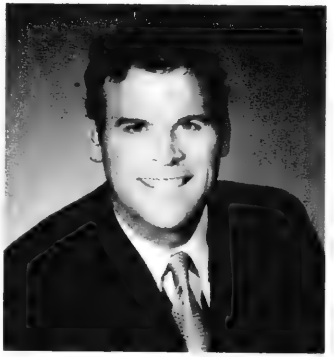
"We are taking aggressive action to cover the known leadership of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard and block virtually all transactions with Iran, including those with the Central Bank, while providing an exemption allowing Iranian-Canadians to send some money to loved ones back in their home country," Baird said.

"Iran's current leaders blatantly ignore their international obligations. They obfuscate Iran's nuclear activities, and they block any international attempt to verify the country's claims. They do so while continuing to violate the human rights of their own citizens, all while undermining regional security."

At a news conference, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton and Treasury Secretary Timothy Geithner said that the U.S. government would treat Iran's banks as a "threat to government institutions." The step, Geithner said, means that any financial institution has effectively been warned: "You are at risk of supporting Iran's nuclear activities" as well as its backing for terrorists.

Without explicit penalties for dealings with Iran's banks, the Obama administration's action is just shy of actually sanctioning all the banks, including the Central Bank, which is what Congress and pro-Israel groups have been demanding.

Such sanctions would effectively force any entity dealing with Iran to choose between continuing such dealings or being cut off from the United States and other western economies. The likely effect would be Iran's near-total isolation from the economies of the developed world.



John Baird

A letter sent to Obama, authored by Rep. Howard Berman (D-Calif.) and signed by leaders of both parties in the House, urged the president to sanction the Central Bank of Iran (CBI), also known as Bank Markazi.

"If a review of the facts confirms that CBI is involved in illicit activities linked to Iran's nuclear program and terrorist activities, we urge you to quickly designate CBI as a facilitator of Iran's weapons of mass destruction proliferation and terrorist activities for the purpose of imposing sanctions on persons that do business with CBI," the letter said.

Meanwhile, France called for outright European Union sanctions on those dealing with the Central Bank and a suspension of all oil purchases from Iran – steps that would go beyond the Obama administration's warning that dealing with Iran places an individual or an entity "at risk."

"The idea of freezing the CBI is a huge step and we are aware of that, but we believe it is the appropriate response to such a game change," a French diplomat told JTA, speaking under his country's customary rules of anonymity.

European foreign ministers are set to convene soon and likely will consider the French call.

The executive order described by Clinton and Geithner also bans dealings with Iran's energy sector, tightening rules that had only banned investments.

Sources with pro-Israel groups said that the tighter sanctions announced by Clinton and Geithner were unlikely to stop Congress from moving ahead with legislative efforts to sanction the Central Bank, but were likely to head off for now a battle between Congress and the White House over such legislation.

The principal hesitation in cutting off Iran outright is that doing so would drive up the world's oil prices. That may soon change, insiders said, with Libya's pending re-entry into oil markets. Libya's anticipated 1.5 million barrels a day would go some way to compensate for the anticipated 2.5 million barrels a day that Iran's exit would cost the world supply.

In an interview that aired Nov. 20 on CNN, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said the "time has come" to deal with the Iranian nuclear program.

Hamas-Fatah meeting

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal said they turned a "new page" in Palestinian unity after meeting in Cairo last week. The meeting was the first time the Palestinian leaders had met face to face since they signed a reconciliation deal in May. The deal called for new elections in a year. The leaders however reportedly did not make progress toward implementing the deal. "We want to assure our people and the Arab and Islamic world that we have turned a major new and real page in partnership on everything to do with the Palestinian nation," Mashaal said, according to the French news agency AFP. "There are no differences between us now," Abbas said. Hamas has refused to recognize Israel, even as part of a Palestinian unity government.

Pipeline hit – again

Saboteurs blew up a gas pipeline 60 km west of the Egyptian town of al-Arish in northern Sinai last Friday, the latest in series of attacks, the state news agency MENA reported. The blast caused little damage and didn't start a fire, because little gas was flowing through the pipeline at the time, due to repair work from a previous attack, MENA said. The pipeline, which supplies gas to Egypt, Jordan, and Israel, was last attacked on Nov. 10. The latest was the seventh since the revolt that ousted president Hosni Mubarak on Feb. 11, although the pipeline was first attacked a few days earlier.

Egyptian troops killed

Two Egyptian security forces were killed on the Israel-Egypt border in one of two incidents involving gunfire. The Egyptian soldiers were killed last Wednesday night during a shootout with suspected Bedouin drug smugglers. The incident occurred about 90 minutes before Israel Defence Forces troops identified a group of armed people, believed to be drug smugglers, trying to infiltrate Israel near Eilat from Egypt. The smugglers did not stop when called on to do so by Israeli troops. The soldiers then fired at the infiltrators' legs. At least one of the infiltrators was hit, according to the IDF. The infiltrators fired back, the IDF reported. Initial IDF reports indicate that the Egyptian police weren't killed by IDF fire, but by the smugglers, the military said. In August, terrorists entered Israel from Sinai, killing 11 Israelis and five Egyptian security forces, leading to tension between the two countries.

Israel may defend Greek drilling

Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon said in Greece last week that Israel will defend Greek oil drilling in Cyprus. Asked at a news briefing what Israel's reaction is to a threat by Turkey regarding drilling in Cyprus, Ayalon said, "If anyone tries to challenge these drillings, we will meet those challenges." Ayalon, the first foreign official to visit Greece since the formation of its new government, added that he didn't think Turkey would challenge any drilling in the southeast Mediterranean. Turkey said last month it would send naval forces to protect its drilling rights.

First of three elections in Egypt underway

Freedom and Justice is not expected to garner an absolute majority in the two houses of the Egyptian parliament, and the party declared in advance that it was not contesting more than 49 per cent of the seats in the lower and upper chambers of parliament. The movement would have an opportunity, however, to link up with a party such as Al-Nour, which is made up of radical Islamic activists, and could also join forces with independent Islamist candidates to form a large bloc that could pass legislation reflecting the spirit of Islam.

At this time, though, it seems unlikely that the Muslim Brotherhood would take part in such a development. It could be that the Brotherhood might actually prefer a political alliance with a secular party.

The round of elections for the lower house that is beginning today is the first of three, with voting taking place in nine electoral districts during each stage. Today's voting is scheduled for the largest and most important areas, including Cairo, Alexandria and Luxor. The election results from this stage will provide a clue as to how the elections will turn out when the final phase is concluded in March, when candidates for the upper house will be elected.

It should be noted that even if the Muslim Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice party does become the largest in parliament and does put together a majority coalition, that does not mean they can revoke Egypt's peace agreements with Israel.

Egypt's foreign affairs and defence will still remain the responsibility of the future Egyptian president, who will be elected in another seven months. On the other hand, the current constitution, which is expected to change once the parliament is in place, permits the legislature to vote to depose the president.

Against this backdrop, it is difficult to understand the position of Israel's finance minister, Yuval Steinitz, who said last week the Arab Spring provided a reason for Israel to cut its defence budget. After all, even if the immediate prospect of a conventional war with Syria or Egypt has declined, the risks of instability have increased.

Israel considers release of Palestinian tax revenue

Jonathan Lis
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Monday that he is considering releasing Palestinian tax revenue that Israel froze for more than a month after UNESCO accepted the Palestinians as a full member.

Netanyahu said the decision to reconsider holding the $100 million (US) in tax revenues comes because the Palestinians have thus far refrained from pursuing any more unilateral moves in international organizations.

Netanyahu added that he sees the Palestinian Authority's reconciliation with Hamas as a solely tactical move.

"We see that their talks with Hamas are only a tactical, symbolic move that has no concrete solutions," he said in a discussion with the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee.

A Netanyahu aide said Israel also intends to release the funds because it has no interest in bringing about the collapse of the Palestinian Authority.

Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad said on Sunday that he will be unable to pay the salaries of tens of thousands of civil servants as a result of Israel's economic sanctions.

Fayyad told reporters that the sanctions have had a "devastating impact" on the Palestinian economy.

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, as well as UN chief Ban Ki-moon, have called on Netanyahu to release the Palestinians' tax money.

Ban noted that Israel is required to transfer the money to the Palestinians under the terms of the agreements between the two sides, adding that tensions need to be eased so that peace negotiations can be resumed.

Jewish education our primary challenge

Nothing is more crucial to advancing this goal than Jewish education. At all levels, from the earliest age in the home, through formal and informal education at all levels, there is no alternative to exposing the next generation to Jewish values, traditions and identity.

This is the primary challenge of our generation: to ensure that the chain of Jewish identity continues on into the future, thus guaranteeing the continuity of our cherished, common heritage. This is a task that is of high priority to the State of Israel, as I know it to be of the Canadian Jewish community. I have every confidence that, together, we can meet it, thus safeguarding the continuity of Jewish identity for our children, grandchildren and future generations.

Avigdor Lieberman is Israel's foreign minister.

Wildly successful toy company started in a garage

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Radio-controlled pilotless vehicles outfitted with video cameras used to be the exclusive domain of high-tech militaries around the world.

Not any more. Joining the CIA and the Israel Defence Forces in employing futuristic surveillance technologies are pretty much any teenager who can afford the $60 to $100 for a video-equipped Air Hog, in particular, the Hawk Eye Blue Sky Air Hog. These radio-controlled beauties are so advanced; all they're missing is a Hellfire missile to take out that nasty classroom bully at the end of the street.

Air Hogs is the creation of Spin Master. The air-pressure-propelled aircraft have been available in the retail market since 1998, and they continue to be a very hot seller for the company, a leader in radio-controlled toys, said Harold Chizick, vice-president of Spin Master.

The product has helped vault the Toronto-based company into the top tier of North American retail toy manufacturers, according to NPD Group, a market research agency, Chizick said. Only Hasbro (Monopoly, GI Joe), Mattel (Barbie, Hot Wheels, Fisher Price) and Lego are bigger.

While Spin Master is a relatively recent entry in the toy market, and Air Hogs is big contributor to its success, the company really hit pay dirt in 2007 when it introduced its flagship product – Bakugan Battle Brawlers.

Anyone with a five-year-old will recognize the little plastic toy that springs opens into a deadly fighting machine, able to dispatch super-powered bad guys, including the sinister Emperor Barodius.

The toys inhabit a universe all to themselves in which Bakugan ensures that peace has returned to Neathia and Gundalia and Mechtogan has been laid low.

Bakugan – and Spin Master – is a real Canadian success story. The product was launched in Canada and "it immediately took off," Chizick said. "It was slower to take off in the United States, but it did take off and it's a hit."

Likewise Air Hogs, which was quite popular in North America, is starting to catch on in Europe. With offices in London, Paris, Munich, Hong Kong, Amsterdam, Bratislava and two new branches to launch soon in Spain and Italy, Spin Master has obtained a global reach.

The branch offices are important, as each market requires the input and knowledge of local people to ensure the best way to develop suitable products and market them, Chizick said.

The company was started in 1994 by Anton Rabie, Ronnen Harary and Ben Varadi, friends who'd recently graduated from the University of Western Ontario. During school, Harary and Rabie had started a business in which they created a collage of photos taken during frosh week, which were sold to students.

They were searching for a business to start after university when it was practically dropped in their laps by Harary's mother, who had just returned from Israel with news about a product called Earth Buddy.

It started as a "kitchen project between the three partners," said Chizick. "It was engineered in the kitchen, and the product was developed in [Ronnen's mother's] garage."

A sort of chia pet that sprouted when watered, it was intended as a Mother's Day novelty. Five thousand units were ordered, but it proved wildly successful. "Within nine months, we'd sold 1.5 million pieces," Harary said.

"That was the springboard for the company to design and sell… products," he added.

When the partners first got into business, they didn't know much about margins and markups, but even with items retailing at $6 or $7, "there was lots of margin," Chizick said.

When the frenzy had died down, retailers were anxious to replenish their stock with something new. "What's next?" they asked, Chizick recounted.

Air Hogs was the next big success, though it took Harary months working with developers in Asia to perfect the first model.

Flick Trix, a miniature die-cast replica of a BMX bike used at the X Games (which focus on alternative sports such as skateboarding), was another success.

"That was a massive hit," said Chizick. "We sold 300,000 units a week, and it brought the company to the next stratosphere."

Since then, Spin Master has broadened its catalogue to include food activities (7-11 Slurpee Maker), dolls (Liv), activities (Glodoodle) and foam furniture.

Along with the hits, there were a few misses: Stink Blasters, a collectible action figure with a gross smell, proved even too gross for the target audience of young boys, and Don't Free Freddy, a toy that was handcuffed and, when freed, would say nasty things.

In 2007 Spin Master began forging licensing agreements with a host of A-list companies, including Disney, Nelvana, Warner Bros., DreamWorks and Marvel. It has working partnerships with Sega Toys, and in 2009, it won Toy of The Year Award for its Bakugan series, which has been turned into a cartoon series on television.

They've recently added app toys such as Appfinity AppBlaster, an accessory to iPhones and "finger-play" devices.

Newly launched this year are AppMATes, a toy that allows kids to play the Disney's Cars 2 game on an iPad.

As a privately held company, Spin Master is reluctant to divulge its financial data, but Chizick said sales are in the hundreds of millions of dollars. "We have had, for the last seven years, double digit growth in sales and revenues," he said.

When it comes to hits and misses, Spin Master has an advantage over publicly traded firms, which might hold on to a weak product too long over worries about what the street will think. "We're realistic and we keep our egos in check. If it's not working, we just move on and not let it be a drag on us," Chizick said.

Many of Spin Master's toys are developed in-house, followed by product testing and focus group input. Many still originate with private inventors.

Spin Master recently took 15 top inventors from North America and Europe to Israel, where they met with 27 youngsters from grades 9 to 12. The kids, participants in Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Science Oriented Youth Program, were brought together for a gentle version of the CBC business show Dragon's Den, in which they demonstrated their toy and game inventions and heard feedback from the experts.

"Spin Master will certainly carry on supporting this program by providing knowledge, expertise and, most importantly, mentoring to all of the talented youths in the program," said Odette Levy, director of the company.

"In addition to this program, we also run an annual program at the Bezalel [Academy of Arts and Design], focused on toy invention. Each year the top students in the program are rewarded with an all-inclusive trip to North America, where they complete an internship at Spin Master offices," Levy said.

Spin Master recognizes Israel as "an innovation hub and have been working hard to foster relationships with Israeli inventors," she said.

"This trip was very powerful as most of the people had never been to Israel. They had an opportunity first-hand to learn about the country and took with them a new educated prospective to the land and its people.

"We regard them now as 'ambassadors' who would spread the 're-branding' program of the Israeli government," Levy added.

Who knows, perhaps one day one of the youngsters will be ready to burst on the scene with a new Bakugan.

Klezmer musician launches collaborative show

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Award-winning musician, composer and producer David Buchbinder is gearing up for his latest performance, Tumbling Into Light.

The show will be a "music-centred, multidisciplinary spectacle," combining music, dance and a multimedia display. It is one of the performance projects being put together by Diasporic Genius, the non-profit arts organization that Buchbinder founded about a year ago.

Diasporic Genius seeks to strengthen the cultural and creative output of Toronto's diverse communities through performance, education and community-building. "I think that we have a huge potential because of, what I call, 'the wisdom of the world' here," said Buchbinder about Toronto's multicultural society.

As a part of Diasporic Genius, Tumbling Into Light will feature four apprentice artists, two musicians and two dancers, who will learn and perform alongside 14 professionals. "It's exciting for them and it's exciting for us," said Buchbinder of working with the apprentice performers.

David Buchbinder

Buchbinder, who played with the progressive klezmer and Yiddish music band The Flying Bulgars, said the music for Tumbling Into Light was originally developed for the band's last album and was then modified to create the show. The band, he added, had a "soft ending," but former band mate and co-writer Dave Wall, a singer, will be performing with Buchbinder in Tumbling Into Light.

The show, first developed about two years ago and since refined, is rooted in the story of the mythic journey from light to darkness and back to light. "We've taken scenes from the Jewish story and made them universal," said Buchbinder.

The dance, choreographed by Andrea Nann, and multimedia elements, he explained, contribute to the music and its storytelling, rather than just accompanying it. "It's about bringing things together in a new way," he said.

Buchbinder added that what he calls "the new hybridity" creates a strong and integrated show for the audience, allowing them to experience the story of the journey in a unique way. "We're being taken there by the songs and the movement and the visuals, "he said. Buchbinder is excited for audience members who saw Tumbling Into Light in its development stage two years ago to witness its growth into, what he said will be, "a really powerful" show. "I'm looking forward to how far we've come with the concept," he said.

Tumbling Into Light is the second performance project to be put on by Diasporic Genius, following Andalusia to Toronto, a show featuring Spanish, Arabic and Afro-Cuban-influenced music that was performed at the Royal Conservatory of Music in late September.

Buchbinder is looking forward to continuing to develop Diasporic Genius in all its aspects, including performance. "We believe we're at the beginning of something that can have a positive impact on the city."

Tumbling Into Light will be playing from Dec.1 to 4 at the Enwave Theatre at Harbourfront Centre. For tickets and information visit http://diasporicgenius.com

Influential U.S. intellectual subject of documentary

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Paul Goodman (1911-1972) was an American Renaissance man, a public intellectual whose astonishing range of interests spanned the gamut from education and psychology to community planning and politics.

At the height of his influence, in the 1960s, when the unpopular war in Vietnam was raging, he was something of a father figure to legions of university students who shared his leftist values and beliefs.

Probably best known for his iconic book, Growing up Absurd, and his role in the founding of Gestalt therapy, Goodman is the subject of Jonathan Lee's biopic, Paul Goodman Changed My Life, which opens on Dec. 9 at The Royal in Toronto.

Lee establishes Goodman's place in American culture very early in his cerebral and artsy film. In a clip from Woody Allen's Annie Hall, a woman at a crowded dinner party asks, "Is that Paul Goodman?"

Goodman, born and bred in New York City, was a man of many parts.

He was a poet, essayist and pop sociologist whose books included The Empire City and Communitas: Means and Livelihood and Ways of Life.

He was a radical and guru of the New Left who railed against the military-industrial complex.

He was a pacifist and anarchist who opposed the war in Vietnam.

He was a gay man who, though married and the father of three children, was an incessant "cruiser."

Hardly ever seen without his trademark corncob pipe, and known for his brilliant conversation, Goodman was one of New York's leading intellectuals.

His peers included Daniel Bell, Irving Howe, Norman Podhoretz, Alfred Kazin and Philip Rahv, all of whom were perpetually immersed in avant-garde ideas and words.

In this documentary, friends and acquaintances remember him as a person who displayed effortless moral courage, who considered himself a professional outsider and who did not suffer fools unless they were physically attractive.

Strangely enough, the details of his childhood are glossed over, except for the fact that his father left the family when he was still an infant, plunging it into poverty and despair.

The sole reference to his Jewish ancestry occurs when his wife, Sally, says

"He was Jewish and that was a total mystery to me."

Lee suggests that Goodman's life took a turn for the worse with the untimely death of his son, Matthew. Grief-stricken by his passing, he became a recluse and suffered a third heart attack.

Although Lee is obviously a fan, Paul

THEODOR HERZL EXHIBITS ON VIEW IN TORONTO, EDMONTON

A travelling exhibition of artifacts related to Theodor Herzl opened in mid-November at the Edmonton Jewish Community Centre, where it will remain on view through Dec. 23. A parallel and much larger exhibit has been on extended view in the Morris and Sally Justein Museum at Toronto's Baycrest.

Like its Baycrest counterpart, the Edmonton exhibit – The Dream Fulfilled: Theodor Herzl and the Jewish State – features "treasures" from the David Matlow collection.

"My motivation in displaying items from my collection is to help explain about Israel's history and correct the many misconceptions about how Israel came to be," said Matlow, a Toronto lawyer who is a partner of Goodmans LLP.

The Edmonton exhibit features such rare memorabilia as vintage postcards, share certificates from the Jewish Colonial Trust and a 1902 receipt signed by Herzl. The Toronto exhibit includes a carnet de bal, a lady's dance locket with a small autograph book featuring signatures of Herzl and other prominent Zionists of the day.

Both exhibits are "a fitting tribute to a man who truly changed the course of history," Matlow said. The Baycrest exhibit remains on display until April 30, 2012.

Names in the News: Canadian lawyer and producer Jerry Levitan was 14 when he interviewed John Lennon and Yoko Ono in Toronto in 1969. Several years ago, he produced an animated short about the experience, I Met the Walrus, which won an Emmy and was nominated for an Oscar in 2008. He has also written a book with the same title.

This year, Levitan has released a new animated film, My Hometown, a collaboration with Ono. It is being shown in Toronto this week as part of a "happening" that also includes a flash mob of dancers and performances by various musicians, some of whom will sing Ono's songs. "To think that my meeting with John Lennon and Yoko Ono back in 1969 has taken me to the Oscars, the Emmys and now a project based on Yoko's work is simply incredible," Levitan muses.

My Hometown is written and narrated by Ono, produced and directed by Levitan and Terry Tompkins, and features illustrations by Jerry's daughter, Rebecca. Tattoo Rock Parlour, 567 Queen St. W., Tuesday, Dec. 6, 8 p.m.

Orkestra hailed as one of city's liveliest acts

Daniel Koren
Special to The CJN

Watching the members of Lemon Bucket Orkestra, the 14-piece, self-described "Balkan-klezmer-Gypsy-party-punk super band," made their way onto the small stage at LOT (Lower Ossington Theatre) recently, with nothing but a dainty red carpet hanging behind them. I had to remind myself that I was still in the cultural hub of Toronto, at an event funded by the Ashkenaz Foundation, and not at a local pub in Kiev.

And that was before the eccentric collective, some members dressed in traditional Gypsy attire, some sporting wild and unusual eastern European-looking garments, even picked up their instruments.

Over the last year or so, the Toronto-based Lemon Bucket Orkestra has acquired a fair bit of media attention, being hailed by many as one of the city's liveliest and most energetic party bands. Sitting with the eclectic group of people at the concert, it was easy to see why.

Lead vocalist Mark Marczyk – who adopted eastern European music and culture while living in Ukraine – barely stopped to take a breath in between sets, emitting an enthusiastic "whopa!" or a shrill whistle every so often, and singing in a variety of dialects. These charismatic gestures and those of the rest of the orchestra easily won over the crowd.

The official website for Lemon Bucket Orkestra says the band "grew out of a conversation between a Breton accordionist and a Ukrainian fiddler in a Vietnamese restaurant on Yonge Street." Since then, although the fiddle and the accordion continue to play a vital role in the group's esthetic, it's expanded to include several violins, bass, guitar, percussion and a complete brass section that includes a sousaphone, a trombone and a flugelhorn.

Using these diverse instruments, the group blends klezmer, punk, folk, Ukrainian, ex-Yugoslav and Romani genres of music. Marczyk has claimed that the members of the group are not purists, never adhering to one particular kind of musical influence. It shows.

The band would engage in Irish-sounding, head-pounding melodies in one set, then transition to Yiddish-soaked klezmer with an engaging accordion solo.

No matter what the influence, every song the band performed was a catalyst for foot stomping and hora-style dancing, the audience constantly clapping their hands in unison with the fierce, upbeat rhythms, cheering at various instrumental solos and admiring the belly dancing of Anastasia Baczynskyj, the group's co-lead vocalist.

In the middle of the performance, Baczynskyj, who often danced waving a small handkerchief in her hand, asked the audience if anyone had ever been to a Jewish wedding, which resulted in a tremendous amount of cheer and applause.

The remainder of the set seemed appropriate for such a momentous occasion. With more than a dozen musicians sharing the quaint stage, all playing their instruments attentively and vigorously – the string section more often than not taking the lead – the music in many ways resembled that of the wedding scene in Fiddler On The Roof.

Members of Lemon Bucket Orkestra come from all over the world, but their birth as a musical force took place in Toronto. They are frequent performers at various locales in Kensington Market, the Great Hall and Horseshoe Tavern, the venue where they held the release party for their debut EP, Cheeky, which was recorded at the CBC in Toronto and mixed by local producer John Bailey.

Though there is nothing "Canadian" about their music, the group continues to take charge of Toronto's "folk party" scene, which, thanks to them, is becoming a widespread movement in the city.

Visit the band's website (www.lemonbucket.com) or CBC Radio 3 to stream a song from their EP.

Writer brings important Mideast issues to the table

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel's long-term future is the subject of Hirsh Goodman's timely and penetrating book, The Anatomy of Israel's Survival (McClelland & Stewart).

Goodman – a senior research associate at Tel Aviv University's Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies, a founder of the Jerusalem Report and a former Jerusalem Post defence correspondent – suggests that two factors will essentially determine this question: Israel's occupation of the West Bank and its relationship with its primary ally, the United States.

Hirsh Goodman

Claiming that Israel's presence in the West Bank is not in its national interest, he says, "For Israel to survive as a democratic Jewish state, the status quo has to change."

He adds, "Israel's occupation is not right. Its settlement policies are not right. The behaviour of fringe settler groups against the Palestinians and their land-grabbing activities are scandalous and criminal."

In short, Goodman notes, Israel must terminate its occupation, either through an agreement or unilaterally with the Palestinian Authority. "Doing so is very much key to Israel's survival, if not the key."

At the heart of this issue is demography, which he bluntly describes as "Israel's biggest enemy." As he puts it, "Today there is virtual parity between the 5.7 million Jews and 5.4 million Arabs in Israel and the territories. With the population of the [Gaza Strip] doubling every 10 years and the birthrate on the West Bank a full percentile point higher than that of Jewish Israelis, numerical equality between them will soon be reached, after which the Palestinians will surpass the Jews."

The implications cannot be wished away. Once the Arab population passes the Jewish population, Israel will be faced with a bleak choice.

If the Israeli government gives the Palestinian Arabs equal rights and the right to vote, Israel will ultimately turn into a binational state of all its citizens and residents. If Israel fails to grant them such rights, Israel will degenerate into a non-democratic, even apartheid, state.

To Goodman, a sober and pragmatic liberal, the choice seems crystal clear.

In his view, Israel can sidestep this dilemma by reaching an accord with the current Palestinian leadership in the West Bank, headed by Mahmoud Abbas.

"With Israel and the Palestinians at peace, no Arab country will have moral justification for going to war with Israel," he claims. "Instead of isolation, Israel will enjoy the support of the rational world."

According to Goodman, time favours neither Israel nor the Palestinians: "The longer peace is delayed, the farther away are the chances for a two-state solution. Demography is moving Israel to the right and the Palestinians to fundamentalism."

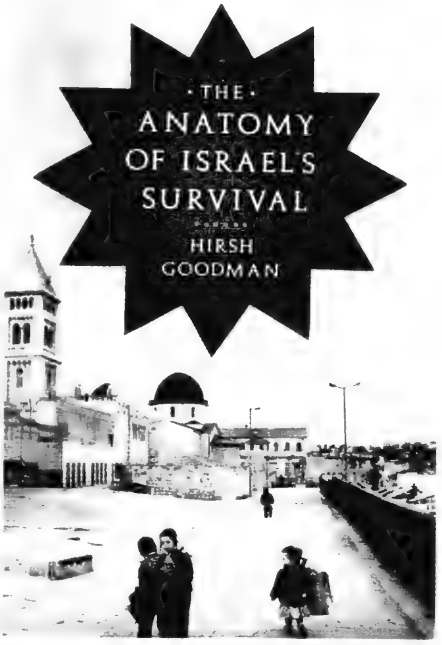
Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, saw the writing on the wall in the wake of the Six Day War, warning that Jews could become a minority in their own country if they did not dispose of the territories. But one of his successors, Golda Meir, was blinded by Israel's power and did not foresee what may well lie in store for Israel, says Goodman.

Being a realist, Goodman acknowledges that peace with the Palestinians is not possible now, given the fact that Hamas controls Gaza. In his view, the divided Palestinians will have to sort out their differences before Israel can make peace with all of them.

The other key to Israel's survival is its alliance with the United States, he observes.

"America is critical to Israel's deterrence, and Israel's military would not be the fighting force it is were it not for American arms sales, financial support and technology sharing. The United States is Israel's guardian angel. It stands up for Israel at the United Nations and other hostile international forums, has a strong influence over Europe's attitude toward Israel, and has shielded Israel from boycotts, embargoes and other hurtful actions. Over the years, America has dispensed tens of billions of dollars in aid to Israel."

Goodman argues that Israel will enjoy the support of Washington only as long as it is regarded as a strategic asset. In practice, this means that Israel cannot spring unilateral surprises on the United States, let alone run spies, such as Jonathan Pollard, on it.



In his opinion, Israeli settlements in the territories are an impediment to its relationship with the United States and harmful to its own broader interests

"Settlements waste resources, complicate any prospect of peace, compromise Israel as a democracy and give ammunition to Israel's enemies," he observes.

But Jewish settlers who wish to remain in the West Bank after an Israeli withdrawal should be permitted to do so, he says.

Israel may yet face a nuclear threat from Iran in the worst-case scenario, he goes on to say. Yet strangely enough, Israel owes the Iranian regime a debt of gratitude: "Their threats and capabilities have forced Israel to focus its mind like never before, with an end result that keeps Israel at the cutting edge of technology, and its economy vibrant and productive."

Israel will survive, Goodman believes. The real question is what kind of a country it will be in the years ahead.

Israel cannot continue to be an occupier. "Occupation will lead to the erosion of Israel's moral fibre," he warns, adding that "secure, permanent and recognized boundaries are integral to statehood and independence. There is no such thing as a permanent country with temporary borders."

It is not too late for Israel to extricate itself from the West Bank, Goodman says. "If it cannot be done with the Palestinians, it has to be done unilaterally."

Israel should preferably end the occupation by negotiating with the West Bank-based PA , hoping it can deliver Gaza, he says.

He is ambivalent as to whether Israel's prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, is capable of signing an agreement with the Palestinians. Netanyahu has the credentials to lead and succeed. But he gives the impression he is more dedicated to holding his right-wing coalition together than "to the future of his country."

The Anatomy of Israel's Survival raises important issues that cannot be swept under the rug. Goodman should be commended for bringing them to the attention of Canadians.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Toronto doctor saves lives in the developing world

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

To Dr. Peter Singer and his colleague, Dr. Abdullah Daar, the glaring disparities and inequities in global health constitute one of the world's greatest ethical challenges.

But instead of carping about this formidable problem, these Toronto physicians are doing something tangible about it, even as you read these words.

While Canadians have a reasonable standard of living, enjoying access to plentiful good food, clean water and sophisticated medical treatment, the bulk of the world's population must cope with a far different and wrenching reality.

In developing countries in Africa and Asia, the lives of too many people are cut short by infectious diseases such as malaria, tuberculosis and HIV/AIDS, which in wealthy nations are preventable or controllable, Singer said.

Treatable non-infectious ailments, from heart disease to diabetes, also ravage communities in the Third World, where nine million children die every year before their fifth birthday, the victims of malnutrition, pneumonia, diarrhea and the like.

The causes are clear: poor diet, miserable living conditions and limited availability to health care.

Singer, the son of Holocaust survivors, and Daar, a Tanzania-born Muslim, are bringing life-saving treatments to the world's poorest and most disadvantaged citizens.

Thanks to new discoveries and technologies spawned by the path-breaking Human Genome Project, these internationally known scientists have placed themselves in the forefront of the biotechnical revolution, which is not only saving lives but also offering the promise of longer, healthier, more productive lives.

"We're taking science from the lab to the village," said Singer, the co-author, with Daar, of The Grandest Challenge

(Doubleday Canada), a newly published book that examines their mission and work in depth.

Singer, a 51-year-old specialist in internal medicine, wears several hats. Apart from being the director of the McLaughlin-Rotman Centre for Global Health at the University Health Network and the University of Toronto, he is a professor of medicine, holds the Sun Life Financial chair in bioethics at U of T and serves as an adviser to the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation, the United Nations and the government of Canada.

For the past year or so, Singer has been CEO of Grand Challenges Canada, a new, non-profit, independent organization dedicated to improving people's health in the developing world by integrating science, technology, entrepreneurship and social innovation.

Grand Challenges Canada is funded by the Canadian government to the tune of $225 million over five years. "Canada is the first country to use its foreign aid program to fund innovation," he noted.

The organization is active in about a dozen countries from Pakistan to Tanzania. "We're open to any country in the developing world," said Singer, who caught the "global health bug" when he was in his mid-30s. "Innovation has no fixed address."

Singer spends about a fifth of his time abroad, mainly in India, China and eastern Africa, ferreting out and inspecting projects. "It's basically a story of hope and enablement for local people to solve their own problems," he said.

Eradicating malaria, which kills 800,000 Asians and Africans yearly, is one of his chief priorities. He and Daar – a professor of public health sciences and surgery at the U of T – are currently working with a company in Africa that produces bed nets to ward off malarial mosquitos.

In further good news, he reports two promising developments. An anti-malaria vaccine, the first to be partially effective, will be introduced in 2016. And technology to modify malarial mosquitos "is moving along."

Until recently, a vaccine to combat meningitis in western Africa did not exist. But earlier this year, the heretofore elusive vaccine was finally unveiled.

"It cost less than 50 cents a dose and will save 150,000 lives in the next 10 years," he said. He added, "Innovation saves lives. That's a story of the flattening of the world with life sciences technology."

Singer's involvement in the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation goes back a decade. "We helped them identify grand challenges, some of which pose ethical challenges."

First, community engagement is essential. "The people have to be in the driver's seat," said Singer. "They have to decide whether they want potentially controversial technology."

A case in point is genetically modified crops, he noted.

Trust between the private and public sector is an issue, too. As an example, he cited infant/young child feeding and nutrition practices. "Breast feeding has to be supplemented, but not replaced, by vitamin and nutrient-rich foods."

During his career, Singer has received about $50 million in grants, and as a writer, he has published more than 300 research articles, running the gamut from ethics in medicine to end-of-life care in Canada.

His parents, Paul and Susan, are Holocaust survivors from Hungary. His father, who would be a dentist, was forced to participate in a death march to the Mauthausen concentration camp in Austria. His mother, having managed to obtain false identification papers, survived in Budapest.

They immigrated to Canada in 1956, shortly after Soviet troops and tanks crushed a democratic uprising in Communist Hungary.

"Canada offered my family opportunities based on merit," said Singer, a father of three children – David, Erin and Rebecca – whose wife, Heather, is a fellow doctor. "These opportunities are denied to young innovators in the developing world."

After specializing in internal medicine at the U of T, Singer studied medical ethics at the University of Chicago, public health at Yale University and management at Harvard University's business school, disciplines that have helped him immensely since then.

Singer met Daar, his collaborator, years ago. "We have a deep and trusting relationship. It's almost like an academic marriage. I hope it's a model of co-operation for mutual understanding between people of different faiths."

He can foresee the day when life expectancy rates in the developing world, often half of those in the developed world, will rise.

"Science and innovation can improve the lot of humanity. It's already beginning to happen."

Sonny Goldstein, CFP
President

Winnipeger chases his NHL dream with Hershey Bears

Harvey Rosen
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Finding Jacob Micflikier, other than in the deep slot attempting to deflect a blue-line drive or pouncing on a rebound near the crease, took a little detective work this season.

Last year, the 27-year-old forward spent time with the Charlotte Checkers of the American Hockey League (AHL) after stints with the Springfield Falcons, Rochester Americans and Albany River Rats.

It turned out that during the summer, the Jewish Winnipeg-born skater was signed to a one-year, two-way deal with the NHL Washington Capitals and is currently skating with their number 1 farm team, the Hershey Bears, who have captured the Calder Cup in three of the past six seasons.

According to Micflikier's mother, Riva, Jacob left the North Carolina team after a breakout season last year in which he scored 29 goals and had 32 assists.

As far as hockey matters are concerned, things are indeed looking up for the 5-foot-8, 180-pound skater who, like so many others of his ilk, wants to continue living the dream.

"His goal has always been to get to the NHL, and when the opportunity presented itself this summer with a two-way contract with the Washington Capitals, he took it. It's the first one he has ever had," Riva said.

"At least they recognized his ability and what he brings. They were willing to give him a vote of confidence by offering the two-way deal," Riva said. If he sticks with the Caps, he would get an NHL salary. He receives a lesser amount for playing in the AHL with the Bears.

"The scenario is that he did well at camp and he's now in the mix to be available for call-up," Riva said. "Jacob thinks he'll still get a shot. The Carolina Hurricanes [Charlotte's parent club] would have re-signed him, but only to a one-way and he wasn't interested.

"He got to play in his first NHL game. It was a pre-season one against the Blue Jackets and I was there," she said. "He and I drove the 28 to 30 hours by car to Arlington, Va., where Washington's training facility is.

"It gave Jacob an extra driver, and he knew I wanted to do the tourist thing. The day that I was going to leave, he was told that he was going to play in Columbus, so I just changed my going-home plans.

"I left him with the car and all of his belongings and flew home. That's what hockey players do. They're nomads. They take all their stuff and they go and stay in a hotel until they get the magic letter that tells them where they can go to find themselves accommodations," Riva stated.

I asked Riva whether, following his four-year stint at the University of New Hampshire, where he notched 58 goals and added 92 assists in 154 NCAA games, if Micflikier was upset when he wasn't selected by a NHL organization in his draft year.

Jacob Micflikier

"Any player would be disappointed if he isn't drafted. There is a certain difference in perception when you don't get drafted. If you're not, you carry that [label] and have to fight your way every time," explained the hockey-wise mom.

Beginning in 2001-02, Micflikier played two seasons in the United States Hockey League with the Sioux Falls Stampede, followed by four outstanding years at the University of New Hampshire with the Wildcats. He then took his skills to the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL) with Stockton Thunder and the Florida Everblades, before moving over to the AHL.

Riva was also very knowledgeable in terms of her son's style of game, which had obviously been noticed by the powers that be in Washington.

"Last year, Jacob found a home in front of the net, and he was very strong there, and it didn't matter if he wasn't one of the taller players," she said. "He exercised... his right to be there. They call it the 'greasy' or 'dirty area' and a lot of his goals came by deflections. You always have to be ready to come to camp. He's solid and very strong for his size. He works out even in the off-season."

Last season Micflikier's Checkers ousted Hershey in the first round of the playoffs. His Hershey coach, Mark French, has so far been very impressed with what he has seen of the feisty Micflikier. He likes that the left-handed shooter is versatile and can play either wing or centre, kill penalties and work on the power play.

How well is the former MVP and assistant captain at New Hampshire doing this early in the season playing with Hershey? Sweet, you might say. After 17 games, he has eight goals and 12 assists, good for eighth in league scoring.

Braun named National League MVP

JTA

NEW YORK — Ryan Braun, the slugging outfielder for the Milwaukee Brewers, became the first Jewish most valuable player in nearly five decades.

The son of an Israeli-born Jewish father and a Catholic mother, Braun was named the National League MVP last week. He received 20 of 32 first-place votes and 388 points in voting announced by the Baseball Writers' Association of America. Los Angeles centrefielder Matt Kemp was second with 10 first-place votes and 332 points.

Pitcher Sandy Koufax of the Los Angeles Dodgers in 1963 was the last Jewish player to win the award. Other Jewish players who have been named MVP are Hank Greenberg of the Detroit Tigers in 1940 and Al Rosen of the Cleveland Indians in 1953.

Braun batted .332 this season with 33 home runs, 111 RBI and 33 steals to help lead the Brewers to the Central Division title.

Some have taken to calling the Los Angeles-reared Braun "The Hebrew Hammer."

"I am Jewish," Braun said last year. "It's something I'm really proud of. But I don't want to make it into something more than what it is. I didn't have a bar mitzvah. I don't want to pretend that I did. I didn't celebrate the holidays.

"It's a touchy subject because I don't want to offend anybody, and I don't want groups claiming me now because I'm having success. But I do consider myself definitely Jewish. And I'm extremely proud to be a role model for young Jewish kids."

PM delays demolition of Jerusalem bridge

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu ordered the Jerusalem municipality and the Public Security Ministry to delay the execution of a demolition order for the Mugrabi Bridge, which connects the Western Wall Plaza to the Temple Mount, a senior official told Ha'aretz on Sunday.

The official said Friday's decision to delay the demolition by one week forestalled the destruction of the bridge that was scheduled to begin late Saturday night and take 72 hours to complete.

However, the site's sensitivity, as well as Egypt's warnings that the move could lead the Tahrir Square protestors to focus their anger on Israel, prompted Netanyahu to delay the demolition. The premier is expected to hold an extensive discussion on the matter in the next few days in an attempt to resolve the issue.

The wooden bridge has allowed tourists, security forces and Jewish visitors to enter the Temple Mount via the Mugrabi Gate, located next to the Western Wall.

Police demanded that it be constructed after part of an unused ramp leading up to the Mugrabi Gate buckled on a snowy night in February 2004.

Benjamin Netanyahu

The Mugrabi Bridge has become a source of tension between Israel and both the Palestinian Authority and Jordan.

Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat ordered the demolition because the bridge was deemed unsafe. A temporary bridge was to be built in its place, allowing safer passage to the Temple Mount.

In recent days, the Islamic Waqf – the religious authority that manages the Temple Mount – launched a public campaign against the demolition, arguing the demolition was part of an Israeli plot to damage the Al-Aqsa Mosque.

A similar campaign was started in Jordan, with the backing of the Ministry of Awqaf Islamic Affairs and Holy Places. Israel's peace treaty with Jordan formalized Jordan's status as overseer of Jerusalem's holy sites, with an emphasis on the Temple Mount.

Sources have indicated that Netanyahu's decision to delay the demolition was also prompted by Jordanian warnings that the move could incite riots in the Hashemite Kingdom.

Earlier this year, Jordanian and Israeli officials reached a draft agreement that would regulate the replacement of the old bridge with a newer one, with cabinet secretary Zvi Hauser making a rushed trip to Amman in order to sign the deal.

However, Jordan backed away from the agreement at the last moment, and the two countries have been trying to resolve the issue ever since.

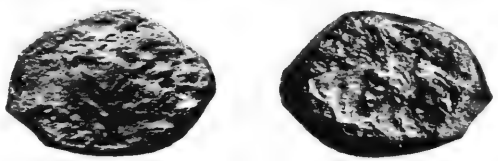
Temple Mount construction finished after Herod, dig reveals

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Recent archeological excavations in Jerusalem show that, contrary to popular understanding, King Herod wasn't solely responsible for constructing the Western Wall.

The Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) announced last week that the discovery of a mikvah alongside Jerusalem's ancient drainage channel challenges the conventional archaeological perception that Herod built the wall in its entirety, saying it's now evident that construction was completed at least 20 years after Herod's death (believed to be in 4 BCE).

The excavations, directed by IAA archeologist Eli Shukron with assistance from Prof. Ronny Reich of the University of Haifa, revealed three clay oil lamps of a type that was common in the first century CE, as well as 17 identifiable bronze coins.



Bronze coins found in recent archeological excavations

The clay oil lamps and bronze coins were found when archeologists sifted through soil removed from inside the sealed mikvah.

According to Donald Ariel, curator of the IAA's numismatic collection, the latest four coins were struck by the Roman procurator of Judea, Valerius Gratus, sometime around 17 or 18 CE – about 20 years after Herod's death.

"This bit of archeological information illustrates the fact that the construction of the Temple Mount walls and Robinson's Arch was an enormous project that lasted decades and was not completed during Herod's lifetime," said the IAA, adding that the find confirms descriptions by the Jewish historian Josephus that state it was only during the reign of King Agrippa II (Herod's great-grandson) that the work was finished.

Couple who formed a cappella group met through mitzvah

Dustin Pollack
Special to The CJN

For John-Michael Erlendson and Elana Steingart, it's hard to fathom how far they've come in just over a year, since the two have been leading the a cappella singing group Countermeasure.

It was in June of 2010 that the newly engaged couple brought their idea to composer and conductor Aaron Gensing.

Erlendson and Steingart wanted to fulfil a niche that they felt was untouched in Toronto's music community – a singing group that was more committed than a community choir, yet casual enough that nobody involved had to quit his or her day job.

Now, the couple, along with Gensing and his wife, has brought together a group of 14 artists. They have performed at private events, jazz festivals, the Queen's Plate, and have even made an appearance on the Food Network, performing a jingle during an episode of Recipe to Riches.

Countermeasure has also received much acclaim, including from Tyler Stewart of Barenaked Ladies, who called the group "awesome."

The early success of a community group like Countermeasure should come as no surprise considering the popularity of music reality shows, as well as the television high school musical drama Glee, which can be credited for making glee clubs cool again.

The "a cappella couple," Elana Steingart and John-Michael Erlendson.

"I would say that shows like Glee have been a huge positive force for a cappella and for Countermeasure," Erlendson said.

"J-M [John-Michael] and I are actual Sing Off fanatics," Steingart added, referring to NBC's reality TV show that features a cappella groups competing for a Sony Music recording contract and $100,000.

"Glee has had a significant effect on promoting the a cappella genre, for both good and evil. As soon as a tune is on Glee, the collegiate a cappella groups go into overdrive learning those songs. But Countermeasure has always been kind of a response to the collegiate a cappella culture, providing an alternative to those kinds of approaches and sounds," Steingart said.

"Glee is to a cappella what [the] Indiana Jones [series] is to archeology: it is both wildly inaccurate and wildly popular. It might bring people into the scene, but it's loaded with a lot of misunderstandings."

Steingart confessed that she wasn't brought up in the world of music. Focused on her studies at United Synagogue Day School in Toronto and later, at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, she didn't have the opportunity to get involved in a music program.

But when she began her undergraduate degree at the University of Toronto Steingart discovered Varsity Jews, an a cappella choir based out of the school.

She instantly fell in love.

"What I love about a cappella is that all you need is your voice and your ears and other people," she said. "As long as you have a good support net around you that's happy to teach, you can learn it and become a musician. It's an amazing way to learn about music that doesn't require any theory background."

Erlendson on the other hand, said music has been pumping in his veins all his life – even before he was born.

"Both my parents are musicians," he said. "My mom and dad were folksingers in a band, so before I was even born I was just a fetus listening to their music... When I was born, I was in this culture that appreciated music and I took it as part of a way of life."

He played piano and drums throughout his childhood and went to Bayview Glen – a small private high school in North York – because he felt the school choir would give him the opportunity to expand his vocal knowledge and skills.

Eventually, his knowledge and passion for music led him to Varsity Jews, through which he and Steingart met in 2006.

Countermeasure hopes to build on its success.

At the time Steingart was in a long-term relationship. But when she became single in 2008, Erlendson's real pursuit for her began.

"He wooed me as hard as he could for an entire year before I felt ready to date him without any possibility of it being corrupted by rebound syndrome," Steingart said. "We got together after the March 2009 Varsity Jews spring concert and have been literally inseparable ever since. We are totally an a cappella couple."

The two are planning to wed next year.

As for the future of Countermeasure, Erlendson and Steingart hope to continue to build on the success the group has had so far. They've recently applied for a grant that would fund the recording of their first album.

They're also constantly looking for opportunities that will allow them to showcase their talent throughout Canada and abroad.

Countermeasure will be performing holiday concerts Dec. 10 and 11 at the Green Door Cabaret in Toronto.

"I like to talk about a cappella as the only post-apocalyptic art form," Erlendson said.

"If everything blew up and there was nothing but zombies roaming the streets and humans huddled in a little room, you could still sing."

For more information about the group, visit http://countermeasuremusic.com/.

Sustainable parking

How often do you look for a parking spot on any given day?

How long have you circled a block waiting for a spot to open up?

How much time have you wasted circling an indoor parking lot to find you cannot fit into a spot that opens up?

Do you use valet parking so someone else can deal with the parking hassle? Do you trust the person driving the car not to damage it?

If you must drive a car because it is more convenient than public transit, would you be interested in using parking that can reduce the amount of gasoline burned and reduce emissions?

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

Both below- and above-ground parking structures can accommodate more cars within the same perimeter of a flat outdoor lot by building up or digging down.

All three parking options allow cars to park side by side and require sufficient space for car doors to open without causing damage to neighbouring cars. Each requires lighting to ensure the safety of the users.

In an indoor underground structure, lights have to be on all the time, and ventilation must operate continuously to make the air breathable for parking patrons. Depending on the height or depth of the structure, both lit stairwells and elevators would draw electricity.

Through its North American subsidiary, an innovative Israeli company, Unitronics, is solving many of these parking-facility problems by applying principles used in physical warehouse logistics management to the automation of the parking process.

By automating the parking system, two to three times the number of parking spaces can be accommodated within the same volume (footprint and height or depth) as a conventional self-park, ramp-access garages.

Due to the precision of the computer-controlled automated vehicle-conveyor system, automated parking systems can use narrower spaces than self-park garages do. By storing the cars door-to-door and bumper-to-bumper and keeping a minimal clearance between them, occupancy density can be increased.

Since there will no longer be pedestrians in the parking garage, height requirements above the car can be reduced by 30 to 50 per cent, leading to another opportunity to increase parking density.

Without car owners in the garage and with cars being stored with their engines stopped, the need for ventilation is minimized and the need for air-conditioning is eliminated, thus saving in utility costs. Lighting would be required only for emergency or maintenance purposes and supporting personnel. The need for stairs and elevators is also eliminated as a result of this automation.

So what are you left with, a sustainable parking solution through reduced car emissions, reduced fuel consumption and lower power consumption. The construction of this type of parking facility would also require fewer materials to be used than a standard parking garage or underground facility.

Insurance costs dealing with collision and damage risk can be reduced as the risk of the owner or designated valet damaging the car is no longer incurred with automated machinery doing the work. Also, the storage area is secure, as it is not accessed by the public.

Happy Chanukah shopping!

COLORFUL VEGETABLE LATKES

4 lg Yukon Gold potatoes
2 lg. carrots
2 small zucchini
1 medium onion
1 egg
1/4 c matzah meal
vegetable oil for frying
salt and pepper

Grate potatoes and onions using grating disk of food processor. Remove from processor into colander over sink. Press on mixture to drain; repeat few times to remove as much liquid as possible. Grate zucchini, place shreds in their own colander over bowl to catch liquid. Sprinkle liberally with salt; toss well. Press on mixture to hasten draining. For added insurance, place zucchini shreds on stack of paper towels, blot up residual moisture.

Grate carrots. In large bowl, combine with drained zucchini and potato mixture. Add egg; mix well. Add matzah meal little bit at a time until mixture starts to dry. Drop by spoonful into hot oil, fry until golden and crisp on both sides. Drain on paper towels.

Ve'ahavta honours the repair people

Sometimes, we Jews have the opportunity to party. That's a good thing, since there have been many times when we've not felt like it or have been prevented from doing so. And, of course, there are the parties, festive and all, where we celebrate our survival, such as Purim, with schnapps and dance, but never forgetting the brokenness that brought us to the party room.

In some ways, Jewish celebrations are like a parody on partying.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Every year Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, holds an annual gala called Starry Nights. It's a beautiful event/fundraiser with song, of course food and consciousness raising. On Dec. 4, 700 people will come together at Koerner Hall in Toronto to celebrate life and talk about our great ability as Jews and non-Jews alike, to share our resources and our tremendous creativity with others toward the betterment of our world. We learn about the impact humanitarian gestures have on our souls and our lives. We embrace our commitment to chesed and tikkun olam.

And we celebrate the many lives we have affected and, in some ways, the brokenness of the world, and the need to have an organization like Ve'ahavta. Jewish merrymaking – a parody on partying.

Indeed the world is broken, some would say shattered. It needs repair. So at Starry Nights we feature the repair people, those individuals who have created a humanitarian toolbox and set about hammering together the shards of a vessel we refer to as our existence. These are brave handymen.

In the past we've had some pretty impressive repair people (keynote speakers), such as Eli Wiesel, Mia Farrow and Bob Geldof. This year, Starry Nights features international singer, songwriter and humanitarian Chantal Kreviazuk. The event will be hosted by Jian Ghomeshi of CBC.

And then there are the Tikkun Olam Awards – a moment when we recognize the simple, quiet and community repair people, the anawim (humble) individuals who have a clear understanding of "parodying on Jewish partying," as they have often lived the strife that came before the festivities and feast.

These are repair people who have spearheaded extraordinary tikkun olam projects without fanfare and ordeal. Some of our award winners over time include Dr. Michael Silverman, world renowned for his work on HIV/AIDS and infectious disease in developing nations, and Gerda Frieberg, a tireless Holocaust educator and activist.

This year the recipients include Alice Bartol (Humanitarian Award); Nate Leipciger and Pinchus Gutter (Remembrance); Dr. Isadore Lieberman (Medical); Karen Goldenberg (Community) and Bilaal Rajan (Youth Leadership).

Recently, I interviewed Karen and Nate on Ve'ahavta TV. Karen expressed to me the wonderment of her childhood, a time when she learned about tikkun olam from both her accountant parents. She said her father treated every client in a special way, and her mother made sure their grandmother had 24-hour care and companionship, from other members of the family. Nate talked about his passion for life despite the fact his mother and sister were murdered, and the fact he and his father were forced on long marches with thousands of other Jews and victims of the Nazis. He is a giant of a man, courageous and brave.

Starry Nights is a Jewish party. It reminds us to party and of the imperative to be valiant when called upon to do so, to enhance our world. Our parties feel different, but we know how to do them well. For more information on how to be a repair person or to attend, see our website at www.veahavta.org.

Retail boycott of Iran unnecessary: CIJA

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Canada recently joined the United States and Great Britain in prohibiting financial transactions with Iran, but a major Jewish community organization believes anti-Iranian sanctions should be even tougher.

CIJA, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, is calling on the Canadian government to target the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) with an enhanced set of sanctions. At the same time, CIJA believes Canadians need not punish ordinary Iranian exporters by refusing to purchase Iranian goods, such as foodstuffs, at the retail level.

Avoiding Iranian goods, such as dates or carpets, would only hurt average Iranians. "Our grievance is not with the Iranian people, so we should have caution that sanctions not have an impact and cause more difficulties for people living under a brutal regime," said CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel. "Sanctions have to target the perpetrators."

Fogel noted that many expatriate Iranians hold a favourable view of Israel. "There was a time that a progressive and highly educated population had relations with Israel, so it's not entirely outside the realm of their experience to see Israel as something other than the little Satan," he said.

About two weeks ago, Ottawa announced a new round of sanctions that "prohibit financial transactions with Iran, expand the list of prohibited goods to include additional items that could be used in Iran's nuclear program and add[ed] new individuals and entities to the list of designated persons [that present a proliferation concern].

Claim Denied

MONTREAL — The Federal Court rejected an Arab Israeli's bid for refuge in Canada. Raiek Salim, 32, originally applied to come here on a work permit through the consulate in Tel Aviv. He wanted to become a licensed pilot and felt he could accumulate enough flying hours here. Although the consulate rejected his request on the grounds he would likely not find work here because of his lack of experience and facility in French, Salim settled in Montreal in 2005. He made a claim for refugee status, which was rejected in 2007. The Immigration and Refugee Board rejected his argument he was the victim of discrimination and harassment in his native country as a Muslim Arab, which prevented him from becoming a pilot. He asked the Federal Court for a judicial revision. Salim now says he can't return to Israel because he says it considers him "a threat to national security."

Farber Gets Award

TORONTO — Former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber has been chosen to receive the Meir Hospital Israel Medal of Merit 2012, along with three other Canadians, doctors Amira and Michael Dan and Dr. Mary Jo Haddad, president and CEO of Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children. The award, to be presented April 22 in Toronto, is given under the auspices of the Canadian Friends of Meir Hospital (CFMH), which supports the Kfar Saba medical centre, Israel's seventh largest. The winners were chosen for their hard work, dedication to communities, remarkable compassion and commitment to improving the lives of others, CFMH said.

Relief Fund Set Up

TORONTO — In response to the worsening humanitarian crisis in the Cree First Nations community of Attawapiskat, on James Bay in northern Ontario, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has established the Attawapiskat Emergency Relief Fund to raise money to assist the community with basic necessities of life. The federation will be working with agencies on the ground to ensure the supplies required most get to the people of Attawapiskat as soon as possible. Couple Gives Birthright Another $5 Million

WASHINGTON — Sheldon and Miriam Adelson are contributing an additional $5 million to Birthright Israel, which the organization says will move 2,000 applicants from wait-listed to travelling this winter.

The gift was announced Nov. 30, a day after the Adelsons were honoured in Washington by the group, doubles their contribution for this year to $10 million.

Sheldon and Miriam Adelson

"In light of this announcement, Taglit-Birthright Israel is now sending letters to 2,000 North American young adults who had applied for a trip this winter but were wait-listed, informing them that they will now be able to go on the free, 10-day educational trip in the coming months thanks to the new funding," the group said. "Nearly 22,500 North Americans had registered for Taglit-Birthright Israel trips this winter and over 10,000 young adults had been wait-listed."

The couple's foundation has given Birthright more than $100 million since 2007. Adelson, a casino magnate, is a major giver to Jewish and conservative causes.

U of T grad students reject divestment motion

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The University of Toronto's Graduate Students' Union (GSU) defeated a motion that called on the university to divest from companies that do business with Israel.

During the Nov. 21 GSU council meeting, members voted 37-25 against a motion that was endorsed by the group Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA), and presented by the GSU's social justice committee.

Andrew Gross

The motion, just three paragraphs long, called on U of T "to divest from and refuse to reinvest in BAE Systems, Northrop Grumman, Hewlett Packard, and Lockheed Martin."

In the past, SAIA groups on Canadian campuses have campaigned to have student unions vote on motions that endorse the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel.

Last February, SAIA's Carleton University chapter tried to present a motion to its student union that condemned Israel and called on the university not to invest in companies that do business in Israel, but pro-Israel students succeeded in convincing council members to shelve it.

However, the motion presented to U of T's GSU last month was carefully worded to avoid mentioning Israel.

Instead it singled out companies that do business in Israel, asking for the university to divest from firms "involved in violations of international law."

Andrew Gross, a political science graduate student and a member of the GSU, said SAIA's new strategy was an attempt "to have their cake and eat it, too."

"On the one hand, they did not mention Israel in the motion itself, so that the motion would not raise any red flags, in that it would seem to be neutral," Gross said.

"On the other hand, had the motion passed... it would have been interpreted by SAIA as a very strong statement against what they call 'Israeli apartheid.'"

Despite SAIA's strategy to refrain from mentioning Israel in the motion, on Nov. 15, a week before the GSU council meeting, the social justice committee held a panel discussion for graduate students to decide whether the GSU as a whole should support SAIA's call for U of T to divest from companies "that support Israel's war and occupation of the Palestinian territories."

Gross was on that panel in an attempt to convince his peers that this motion would not speak for the majority of U of T's 14,000 graduate students.

He also tried to use the platform to dispel claims that Israel is an apartheid state.

In addition to the panel discussion, Gross said that during the council meeting, a social justice committee member distributed flyers with information about the call for divestment.

"It had to do with Israeli actions, the Gaza occupation and that kind of thing – and on the back of it, there was information about Students Against Israeli Apartheid."

Syria and surrealism

From the editor's desk…

At times, indeed very often, one gets the sense that the news emanating from the Middle East could aptly fit the bill in any topsy-turvy world. Lewis Carroll himself, imagining the upside-down Wonderland into which little Alice fell, would have been hard-pressed to surpass, for sheer surreal detail and disbelief, some of the stories we read of the Middle East.

Take for example, the news last month that in the midst of the unceasing campaign of slaughter and abuse by the Syrian government of its own people, UNESCO's executive board unanimously elected Syria to membership on two of the organization's committees, one of which deals with human rights matters.

Then one day later, the same Arab bloc that lifted Syria onto the UNESCO committees voted to suspend Syria's membership in the Arab League.

Go figure.

Hillel Neuer, executive director of the Geneva-based monitoring group UN Watch made the obvious observation about the Syrian ascension to UNESCO's working committees.

"It's shameful for the UN's prime agency on science, culture and education to take a country that is shooting its own people and empower it to decide human rights issues on a global scale."

Canada expressed shock and extreme regret over the UNESCO decision.

"While Canada was not involved in this decision," said Joe Lavoie, a spokesman for Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird, we find it deeply disturbing that Syria was designated by the Arab regional group at UNESCO as a member of the committee on conventions and recommendations, given [Bashar] Assad regime's continual and repeated violation of human rights."

Apparently, the vote was too much even for the conscience of UNESCO's executive director, Irina Bukova. Unable to continue to ignore the incongruity and the absurdity of Syria's elevation within the organization, Bukova, said that the decision was "unfortunate," but she could not intervene or set it aside as her hands were tied by UNESCO convention and protocol.

At the same time that the Syrian diplomats were getting used to the soft leather of the chairs in the UNESCO committee's hearing rooms, the head of the UN's human rights commission, Navi Pillay, pleaded with world leaders to protect the people of Syria from their government's "ruthless repression."

As of this writing, some 4,600 Syrians have been reported killed in the past eight months. The whereabouts of some 14,000 people are unknown. They are either being held in detention or also dead.

Adding depth to the nadir of the disbelief surrounding Syria last week, was the response of Russia. Russia (and China) immediately rose to defend the Syrian despot against any punitive measures from an outraged world.

"We would like to warn against illegal interference by outside forces even under the pretext of protecting human rights," said Russia's envoy to the Human Rights Commission Valery Loshchinin. "This will have serious and unforeseen consequences."

To prove to the world they were in earnest, the Russian government delivered anti-ship, supersonic, cruise missiles to Syria that, according to a Russian official, "will be able to protect Syria's entire coast against a possible attack from the sea."

Russian remonstration on behalf of Syria has increased lately in direct proportion to the increase in world – and it must be added, Arab – condemnation of Bashar Assad and his closely held security service. Now, with the Russians, and to a lesser extent the Chinese too, watching Assad's back, it seems less likely that Assad's blood-soaked hands will soon be stayed against his own people. The killing will continue, and if more Syrian soldiers defect from the army, it will intensify.

Last week, the Arab League approved a series of low-range sanctions against Syria.

The surreal, absurdity of the situation may bemuse. But the slaughter, detentions, rape, torture, anarchy and chaos are a travesty.

In addition and causing great worry, the turmoil in Syria poses an ever-expanding threat to a great many countries in the region, not only to Israel.

As is widely known, Syria is but a puppet regime of Iran. Iran funds the Alawite-run country in return for unfettered access through Syria to its Shia surrogates in south Lebanon.

Iran has grand, atavistic, hegemonic plans for the Middle East that are predicated upon its ambition of acquiring nuclear weapons.

It is, therefore, not only the Jewish state that keeps a careful watch on Syria and Iran. The Gulf states, foremost of course, Saudi Arabia, do too. For they are also within the sights, so to speak, of their ancient Persian nemesis.

Welcome to the topsy-turvy Middle East, where the gun is still the chief instrument of discussion and dialogue.

Mount Sinai expansion to boost maternity care

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

On the brink of opening six new floors of the Frances Bloomberg Centre for Women's and Infants' Health, Mount Sinai Hospital has come full circle.

Joseph Mapa, president and CEO of Mount Sinai since 2001, noted that the hospital opened its doors as a 33-bed maternity hospital in 1923. "Now the first major redevelopment project in recent history [involves] maternity," he said in an interview.

With the addition, which will increase its space by 30 per cent, the Frances Bloomberg Centre, which sees an average of 6,700 births annually, including high-risk obstetrics, will have extra family spaces to care for more than 1,000 infants a year in the neonatal intensive care; labour and delivery rooms that will be bigger and better equipped to deliver babies of high-risk mothers; private and larger rooms to accommodate an inter-professional team that can meet with parents and consult quietly; five operating rooms for Cesarean births, and a new intensive care unit for mothers and babies.

On Sept. 21, Premier Dalton McGuinty announced that the province would further invest in the hospital's infrastructure to include upgrades to its surgical suites, emergency department, critical care unit and in-patient infrastructure.

The hospital – now a 472-bed, patient care, research and academic health sciences centre – has six main centres of excellence: the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, the Frances Bloomberg Centre for Women's and Infants' Health, the Christopher Sharp Centre for Surgical Oncology, the Daryl A. Katz Centre for Urgent and Critical Care, the Centre for Inflammatory Bowel Disease, and the Centre for Musculoskeletal Disease.

Lawrence Bloomberg, a banker, businessman and philanthropist who joined the hospital board 25 years ago and has been chair for 10 years, said he's involved in other community non-profit organizations, but finds the health field most rewarding.

"The last eight to 10 years have been a period of profound transformation [for Mount Sinai.] There have been many milestones. Our budget went from $150 million to $500 million.

"When I was asked to be chair, I gladly accepted. I thought I could contribute to the hospital's mission, because lay people bring in their own skills."

The hospital's focus has also changed to one of patient care, he said. "Instead of being doctor-centric, we look at how we deliver care from a patient's point of view. A doctor's work revolves around quality of care. Our two priorities are talent first and at the same time patients first."

The Jewish community created Mount Sinai, he said, and since its inception, it has always reflected Jewish values. "You can't have a great organization without community support, and our community has always been supportive. [The hospital] takes care of the community at large, but it cannot fulfil its mission without [our] community support."

Mount Sinai is a gift of the Jewish community to Ontario, he said. "Ontario is a great medical centre, and Mount Sinai stands tall against the others."

Mapa said that Mount Sinai is the largest publicly funded organization in Canada founded by the Jewish community. "The ambassadorship of this hospital to the community is huge, and the symbolism is enormous. People identify this hospital with the community and [know] that it is dedicated to the public."

Bloomberg, who is the hospital's longest serving chair, called Mount Sinai a jewel. "It has taken 85 years to get here, but today we're here."

UJA signs violate Vaughan bylaws

Both parties working to resolve issue

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Representatives of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto are working with the city of Vaughan to come to a mutual agreement over 48 UJA signs that violate city bylaws.

The signs, stating "Jewish Toronto Lives Here," appear throughout the Greater Toronto Area in front of institutions such as synagogues, agencies and Jewish schools.

According to an article on yorkregion.com, federation was informed recently that a $500 fee applied to each sign.

For 48 signs, the total would amount to $24,000.

Alan Shefman

Vaughan Coun. Alan Shefman – who says his ward in Thornhill (Ward 5) has a Jewish population of "probably 65 to 70 per cent" – told The CJN that one of the city's enforcement officers had issued a notice to federation about the signs. "It's essentially a warning… that there is a problem here. We try to solve problems as opposed to punish people.

"We're obviously much more lenient when it comes to charities."

Steven Shulman

The issue was first addressed in an informal discussion at a recent meeting of Vaughan's Committee of the Whole attended by Steven Shulman, UJA's campaign director and counsel, and David Sadowski, executive vice-president of Jewish Community Properties of Greater Toronto. Federation representatives presented a deputation about the issue.

Both Shefman and Shulman characterized the tone of the discussions as positive. "The city is working closely with us in a friendly manner to ensure that we have some kind of agreement going forward," Shulman said.

"We have had signs up in the city of Vaughan for years," he noted.

The signs, which are put up annually – with different messages each year – appear during federation's UJA campaign, which begins in late August. The signs stay up "at least through December," Shulman said.

Their purpose is "simply to create awareness of what federation does," Shulman explained, citing work here, in Israel and internationally.

"Ultimately, it's part of a communications focus by federation to create pride in the Jewish community of Toronto, and when we say the Jewish community of Toronto, we're talking about the GTA.

"That was an issue with one councillor," he added, referring to Woodbridge West Coun. Tony Carella, who took exception to the wording of the signs, which referred only to Toronto and not to Vaughan.

Shulman said the cost of the signs and other marketing costs make up part of UJA's campaign budget, totalling "less than 10 per cent of the funds… which is better than virtually any large charity."

He noted that UJA funds "a great deal of social and other services" that benefit "people in Vaughan, and ultimately Vaughan itself.

"What we believe is that this will be brought back to council with a joint recommendation that will be agreed upon by both [parties]," Shulman said. "We expect that it will be early in the new year."

Toughen the sanctions

"No greater threat exists to the security and prosperity of the Middle East than a nuclear-armed Iran," U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta told a Brookings Institution forum last Friday. But no one appears to know what to do about it, and the frustration among Western foreign policy planners with the dangerous theocratic rulers in Tehran is becoming increasingly palpable each day.

Last week, a swarm of Iranians overran the British embassy, smashed windows, hurled petrol bombs and burned the British flag, forcing it to close and embassy staff to flee for their lives. Iranian police stood by facilitating the violence against Britain. The event had the obvious blessing of the Iranian government.

Justifiably, the EU and the West reacted to the Iranian brutishness with indignant outrage. The British expelled the Iranian diplomatic corps. But the Iranians merely smile at such retaliations. The European diplomatic responses to the ransacking of the British embassy matter little to the Tehran regime, much like the lives of the many innocents that have been taken by the terrorists in their pay or the conventions and norms of international law they constantly flout.

Thus, the invigoration last week of the sanctions by western governments was welcome. Canada is to be commended for joining the effort led by the United States and Great Britain. The new sanctions target Iran's banking system. They are in addition to the existing sanctions related to goods used in the refining of oil and the liquefaction of natural gas.

But in light of the fact that the world is in a race against a measure of time presumed by most to be not more than one year, are the new, tougher sanctions enough?

We believe they are not. We support the suggestion of Liberal MP Irwin Cotler that the sanctions should specifically target the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) as well. "The Iranian Islamic revolutionary guard corps has emerged as the epicentre of the nuclear weaponization program, of international terrorism from Argentina to Afghanistan and massive domestic repression," Cotler reminded the world in the House of Commons last week.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) also urges the Canadian government to specifically target the IRGC. (See the related story on page 1.) As CIJA chief executive Shimon Fogel told The CJN, "Sanctions targeting the IRGC as a whole would completely isolate it financially, curtail its ability to contribute to these core areas of concern and undermine the Iranian regime's ability to continue along its current trajectory."

The level of sanctions imposed by the West should directly relate to the level of urgency posed by the Iranian threat, of which, according to Panetta, none greater exists at the moment.

The West must impose even tougher sanctions on Iran.

A three-justice panel of Israel's Supreme Court ruled the Interior Ministry could not write "convert" on the ID card of a woman who immigrated to Israel under the Law of Return after being converted by a U.S. Reform rabbi. Interior minister Yitzhak Peretz, head of the Shas party, said he'd appeal the ruling to a five-justice panel.

Jews as indigenous peoples

Supporters of Israel should consider making use of the continuity of the Jewish people in the Land of Israel in trying to win sympathy for the Jewish cause. Jews never abandoned or surrendered their homeland but were subject to 2,000 years of continuous exile by the conditions created by foreign rulers. Jews became a minority in their homeland, but this does not diminish their rights at all, as the United Nations has determined that indigenous peoples do not lose their rights, so long as they maintain their continuity and their culture in their homeland.

Ever since the start of the Zionist attempt to establish a Jewish homeland in Israel, the Palestinians have insisted that the Jews have no rights at all in any part of Israel. The Jews should make use of their continuity in their homeland, and the UN declaration concerning the rights of indigenous peoples in their homeland, to prove to the world and to the Palestinians, that Israel could never have been a Palestinian land, as it never ceased being a Jewish possession.

One might consider it absurd to expect that the Palestinians would ever admit that Jewish rights in Israel are superior to theirs. But it seems peace can perhaps come in no other way. And if the rest of the world would become convinced of the Jewish case, then the Palestinians might find they would eventually have to adopt the new consensus position in the world.

Jewish education

I agree with Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman who advocates informal and formal Jewish education from the earliest age ("Nothing more crucial that Jewish education" (Dec. 1). His commentary is more than food for thought. It requires the same initiative as the present, generous emphasis that is directed at acculturating our students for university, which unintentionally neglects elementary and high school educations, where foundations begin. I took the word "Jews" and turned it into the acronym J.E.W.S., which stands for "Jewish education warrants scholarship."

Disagrees with Goldstone

While I generally agree with his views regarding Israel proper, Richard Goldstone's Oct. 31 New York Times opinion piece reeks with egregious errors in saying that using "apartheid" to describe Israel's West Bank actions is slanderous ("Apartheid Charge a 'Slander': Goldstone," Nov. 10). He entirely ignores the Jewish settlements, their expansion, and resulting oppression of Palestinians through land seizure, usurping water resources, Israeli-only roads, beatings, checkpoints, special identity cards, and many other apartheid measures, including the creation of Bantustan-like West Bank divisions. His view of the "security barrier," which seriously encroaches on Palestinian land, is also false, as noted in the International Court of Justice's 2004 report. While not an apartheid state itself, Israel has instituted significant apartheid measures in the West Bank and justly deserves the charge.

London club to celebrate centenary

Oxford and St. Georges Club members was set up in 1914 as a refuge for Jewish boys and girls in the east end of London whose families had fled the pogroms of eastern Europe. To celebrate its centenary, the club is making plans to organize a special function that might bring together many of the thousands of past and present members. A website – at www.ostg100.co.uk – has been created so that a newly formed committee will be able to ascertain the scale of interest that this occasion might attract. The name Oxford and St. Georges signified the club's founder, Sir Basil Henriques, hopes and ambitions for the Jewish children in the east end of London: "Oxford" for the university he attended and "St. Georges" for the parish where the club was located. Every member of the club was selected by his or her peers and become a proud owner of the club badge.

Can education alone save the Jewish People?

Students at play at Jewish pre-school in Toronto.

Since biblical times, we Jews have been a famously contrary lot, and the erosion of traditional values in the modern period has only deepened the divisions. Yet there is a single article of faith proclaimed with startling unanimity and certitude by all who profess to care about the survival of the Jewish people.

From one end of the broad Jewish spectrum to the other, from secular humanists to the most rigidly devout, Jewish education is promoted as the key to securing the Jewish future. In last week's CJN, Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman added his powerful voice to the chorus. As he put it, "Nothing is more crucial to advancing this goal [of ensuring the continuation of a strong Jewish identity] than Jewish education. At all levels, from the earliest age in the home, through formal and informal education at all levels, there is no alternative to exposing the next generation to Jewish values, traditions and identity."

I began entertaining doubts about the conventional wisdom regarding Jewish education years ago, and these have only increased as I raised my own children and became ever more involved in the lay leadership of the Jewish schools they attended. Let me make clear that I am not saying I no longer value Jewish education. Rather, what I mean is that in the distant past, the lives of our people were suffused with a critical mass of Jewish content, and this preserved in them a strong sense of self as Jews. Today, however, the great majority of Jews wish to replace the actual practice of Judaism with mere knowledge of Judaism. As a consequence of this shift, we tend to have overblown and unrealistic expectations regarding the efficacy of Jewish education in building Jewish identity.

Robert Eli Rubinstein

In 1986, the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, commissioned a "Task Force on Assimilation, Intermarriage and Jewish Identity", which I was privileged to co-chair. Following an intensive investigative process, the taskforce issued a report setting forth recommendations for counteracting the erosion of affiliation among Jews. Looking back, I am struck by the fact that almost all the recommendations involved promoting Jewish education in one form or another. In the years since, our community's deep conviction that Jewish education is the panacea for assimilation has continued to grow, as reflected by its ever-expanding investment in Jewish educational facilities and resources. Yet parallel to this trend and notwithstanding our heroic efforts, we have witnessed a relentless increase in the rate of attrition.

Some years ago, I was visiting in Borough Park, a Brooklyn neighbourhood heavily populated by readily identifiable chassidic Jews. While strolling along the main street on a sunny Sunday afternoon, I came across a group of people wearing baseball caps and clutching cameras, listening to a tour guide's animated explanation of the significance of the different types of garb worn by the local residents. I was intrigued to learn that these were members of a synagogue adult education group from Long Island, who had come to catch a glimpse of how their ancestors in eastern Europe lived long ago. They were no doubt having a fine educational experience learning about their ancient heritage, but this does not mean they had any interest in living significantly Jewish lives themselves. It is the difference between being a spectator at a sporting event and being a player: the self-perceptions and actual commitments of the two are simply incomparable. And if the goal of "Jewish education" is to ensure that there will be Jews in the world of the future, no one could seriously argue that the photo-snapping tourists from Long Island were as likely to have Jewish grandchildren as the bemused black-clad chassidim walking by.

Our Jewish community is one of the most affluent, generous, and dedicated in the world, and we are justifiably proud of the wonderful schools and other institutions that we have created. The great majority of parents I know who send their children to day schools wish them to be Jewishly knowledgeable, so that one day they will be in a position to make informed decisions about how they will choose to fulfil themselves as Jews. Deep down, they hope their children will ultimately vindicate their own life choices by choosing to be just as non-observant as they themselves are. Many are the stories of day school parents, including even some leaders of the community, who have called the principal to complain indignantly about a particular teacher who "brainwashed" their child into requesting that the family start having Shabbat dinners together on Friday nights, at an hour when the parents customarily go out with their friends.

I have acquired from my own Holocaust-survivor parents an appreciation for the sacred imperative after Auschwitz of transmitting a strong Jewish consciousness to the next generation. Although my parents never attended Jewish schools, which simply did not exist in small prewar European communities, their Jewish identity has always been unwavering and vigorous, absorbed intuitively from the personal example set by their own parents in the family home. Yes, I know, times have changed. For this reason, our challenge today is to identify the success factors of times past and try to make them work in our contemporary situation.

The truth is that it requires very little objective knowledge to live a vibrant Jewish life, and in our increasingly interconnected world, this knowledge is easy to attain. The real issue is the individual Jew's degree of motivation to seek it out and act on it. I can agree with Lieberman and many others that Jewish literacy is a worthy objective, but on the available evidence, I have my doubts that it necessarily leads to the development of a strong Jewish identity. One can acquire a comprehensive Jewish high school education, one can even become a university professor of Jewish studies, without necessarily forming an emotional commitment to living a Jewish life. The key to forming such a commitment is actually doing the rather simple things one has learned about, and doing them consistently. Such observance can move beyond mere nostalgia or folklore and become an integral part of a person's being. An individual who embraces an all-encompassing core of Jewish activity is apt to seek a like-minded spouse, and together they will strive to raise children on this model.

A respected Jewish community professional recently told me that she herself did not observe any Jewish rituals because she never had the benefit of a day school education. I responded that it does not take very much education to know how to light Shabbat candles, for example. All that is required is the determination to do it and the ability to strike a match. My ancestors, like hers, knew what they had to do to live richly satisfying Jewish lives, without having enjoyed a formal Jewish education. Clearly, something has changed dramatically. If we truly care about securing the future of the Jewish people, as we profess, we owe it to ourselves to examine what that "something" might be, and what we need to do about it.

The celebrated 19th-century German Jewish bibliographer Moritz Steinschneider was a modern man with modern sensibilities, unwilling to lend credence to any religion, including his own. People would ask him in puzzlement why a totally non-observant Jew had chosen to spend his days cataloguing musty old Jewish books with such loving devotion. His unsettling response was that he saw it as his mission to give Judaism a decent burial. If they wish to avoid being among the pall-bearers, the many present-day Jews who share Steinschneider's modern sensibilities yet yearn paradoxically for a bright Jewish future, need to discover meaning and satisfaction in the Jewish experience beyond merely being knowledgeable about it.

As we survey the contemporary scene, there is, to be sure, much to cause us consternation. But in all fairness, there is also much to give us hope. In Montreal and Toronto and other hubs of Jewish life, we see young people creating dynamic new communities where they devise innovative, stimulating and joyful new ways to reconnect to their sources and celebrate the age-old treasures of Judaism. Throughout our long and tortuous history, we Jews have rebounded from countless existential crises by pulling together. I am confident that in the end, we shall once again meet the challenge, for "a threefold cord is not quickly broken."

Repeal of 'Zionism equals racism' was key

This Dec. 16 will mark the 20th anniversary of the United Nation's repeal of the infamous resolution 3379, declaring Zionism to be racism.

The repeal was an extraordinary moment, a most unexpected moment especially because even Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar believed the General Assembly had never rescinded one of its resolutions. The Jewish community and the Israeli government are making a major mistake by not celebrating this surprising turn of events. Jewish activists need to see that sometimes the good guys win. And the world still needs to learn that singling out one form of nationalism – Jewish nationalism, meaning Zionism – and calling it racism, is untrue, unfair, antisemitic, and an obstacle to any kind of Middle East peace progress.

Gil Troy

in Montreal

The daunting challenges facing then-Israeli president Chaim Herzog in 1983 when, eight years after the resolution, he began campaigning for repeal included the UN's anti-Israel bias and its bias against overturning its own decisions. In fact, it had happened once before – when the General Assembly accepted Spain for membership in 1950, despite having barred Fascist Spain from the UN in 1946 because of its Axis ties. The bigger challenge was the continuing UN bias against Israel and the strong Arab-Third World bloc hostile to a change. But UN leaders realized that the resolution had hurt the world organization badly. Sir Brian Urquhart, the UN under-secretary general for 14 years, best known for proposing the blue helmets for UN peacekeeping forces, called the resolution "the stupidest thing anybody ever did at the UN… an absolutely mindless piece of provocation," which "did nothing for the Palestinians."

While Herzog pushed from Israel, Jewish communal leaders and grassroots activists worked on convincing their respective governments. The American Jewish Committee's worldwide network of representatives lobbied repeatedly for repeal. At many meetings, when the AJC representative raised the issue, the diplomats explained that "no resolution" had ever been repealed. They "basically were rolling their eyes," the AJC's executive director David Harris recalls, and thinking: "How quickly can I get these folks out of my office without being called an antisemite?" Eventually, the AJC held more than 100 meetings, swaying diplomats as far removed from the conflict as those from South Korea and Japan. The World Jewish Congress, B'nai B'rith and others joined the campaign. Harris calls this "nudnik diplomacy" – after the Yiddish word for a pest. But, "lo and behold, the nudniks prevailed."

They prevailed because western democracies such as the United States and Canada were fed up with the UN functioning as the Third World dictators' debating society. And the nudniks prevailed because when the Soviet Union collapsed, the newly freed eastern European countries voted for repeal to exorcise their Soviet-era crimes and mentality.

Of course, this story lacks a happy ending. Even though the Soviet Union collapsed and the UN repealed the revolting resolution, the ugly libel that Zionism is racism became the lens through which many of Israel's enemies saw Israel, Zionism and the Jewish people. And this new big lie received a new lease on life at the UN when in 2001, the UN's World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia, and Related Intolerance, in Durban, South Africa, turned into an anti-Zionist, antisemitic, anti-western hatefest.

Irwin Cotler, a Canadian member of the Parliament and a leading human rights lawyer who attended – and returned ashen-faced – would remember it as "truly Orwellian… A conference dedicated to the promotion of human rights as the new secular religion of our time increasingly singled out Israel as a sort of modern-day geopolitical anti-Christ."

Still, Israel and the Jewish community should celebrate the repeal's 20th anniversary, because the repeal testifies to the power of communal concern and effective grassroots action. The repeal reminds us just how harmful the new big lie that "Zionism is racism" has been to Israel, the UN and the peace process – it is difficult to compromise or trust when you're being called a racist.

The repeal shows how the discourse about Israel all too often escalates from legitimate criticism of Israeli actions to broad attacks on Israel's very legitimacy and right to exist. It reminds us that words count and ideas matter – criticizing Israel is one thing, but making false accusations about racism or apartheid is something else. And, to our great sorrow, it reminds us that lies still must be combated aggressively, effectively and systematically.

Jumping off cliffs

There I stood, facing 18 women in Israel's Ramon Crater. I would be the first to rappel the cliffside. Over the years, I have watched six of my other tour groups do this frightening and beautiful descent down a cliff face, and I have chickened out on each one.

But this time would be different. I put on the helmet and the harness, and stepped out into the void, under me the vast red canyon and over me the blue sky. Holding me was my own strength, and the rope in the hand of the instructor. I climbed down the cliff, one foot at a time. Then there was no cliff at all, and I hung from the rope and looked around me at the grandeur of creation. A few moments later, my feet touched the ground. And I knew, at that moment, the feeling of pure fear mixed with pure faith.

I simply had to jump off that cliff in Israel just two weeks ago. It was symbolic, because after 20 wonderful and successful years as rabbinic director of Kolel in Toronto, I am moving on, and for me it is somewhat like leaping into the great unknown. In 1991, I opened Kolel with the support and vision of the Reform movement. We believed that Toronto was ready for a unique adult education centre that would teach traditional texts from a liberal perspective. Some people laughed at that idea: what liberal Jew would want to study Talmud, or devote several hours a week to tackle a traditional text? They predicted we would fold in six months.

Twenty years later, we have been an independent institution, had our own building, and become part of the Jewish community centre. I am proud to say we have taught literally thousands of students. We had 10 summer retreats where adults came for five solid days of serious Judaic study. We established the first one-day Hebrew crash course. We started a Tikkun Shavuot that became legendary. We offered the first-ever Women's Cantorial Concert. We initiated Conversations About Conversion, which reached out to prospective Jews-by-choice. We celebrated first 10 years and then 20 years of Half The Kingdom. We marked the 30th anniversary of the ordination of women with a panel of the first Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist female rabbis, and it was the first time the three of these pathbreaking women had ever appeared together.

We offered the first Jewish 12-Step course. We ran the first interdenominational panel of rabbis teaching text together. We pioneered the concept of niche educational tours, including the never-heard-of-before idea of Israel culinary tours. We launched a full, online Jewish learning site, called Open Book. We ran seminars on everything from Gender and Judaism to Death and the Afterlife. We developed the two-year Learning for Leadership and the four-semester Hebrew Step Program. We have taught scores of interfaith couples how to live Jewishly. We have opened the gates of Judaism to those on the margins along with those in the centre. We have taught the teachers of day schools and supplementary schools. We have helped Jewish couples raise Jewish children. We have even made shidduchim between young Jews who ended up married.

I am grateful beyond words for these years and for the relationships Kolel has forged with other rabbis and institutions in Toronto's Jewish community. I am proud of the time we operated mid-town Toronto and proud of the recent time we have been part of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and now the Prosserman JCC. It is almost the end of 2011, 20 years later. Change is challenging. Change is growth. I'm excited that Kolel's legacy will continue to thrive at the Prosserman JCC. For me personally, it is time to jump – pure fear mixed with pure faith.

I leave Kolel with a very fond thank you to all the people who have held my rope tight: my secretarial and rabbinic assistants, my rabbinic, cantorial and educator colleagues of every denomination who have taught courses, the JCC staff who have championed Kolel these last years, and all my students, from whom I have learned so much. I am remaining in my adopted hometown of Toronto and will begin a new project next fall with the incredible vision of the Reform movement once again. I will continue to write this column monthly, another source of great joy for me, so stay tuned here for more details, and happy jumping.

Arab Spring is still a work in progress

A year ago this month, a young street vendor in Tunis, Mohamed Bouazizi, set himself ablaze after police threatened to confiscate his wares. He was impoverished, deeply in debt and his family's sole breadwinner. Eighteen days later, he succumbed to his wounds, a burning symbol of the injustices, economic disparities and heavy-handed authoritarian political system weighing down Tunisian society.

Bouazizi's death touched off mass demonstrations and forced the president, Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, to resign and flee into exile in Saudi Arabia after 23 years in power. Shortly afterward, inspired by Bouazizi's martyrdom, a 49-year-old Egyptian restaurateur, Abdou Abdel Moneim Jaafar, set himself alight in front of Egypt's parliament building. He, too, was a catalyst. His self-immolation led to nation-wide protests against the status quo, as exemplified by president Hosni Mubarak's regime.

When Mubarak stepped down after 18 days of turmoil, the Arab world was already inflamed by the so-called Arab Spring, a spontaneous, leaderless mass movement whose effects were already felt in Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Yemen and would soon engulf secular dictatorships in Libya and Syria.

The revolutionary fervour, a watershed in the modern Middle East, was suppressed in Jordan and Saudi Arabia when the monarchies there offered cosmetic concessions. But elsewhere, the regional upheavals have left an indelible impact and empowered Islamic political parties.

In Egypt, the largest and most powerful Arab country, the status quo essentially remains in place despite months of unrest.

Mubarak, charged with corruption and complicity in the deaths of more than 800 demonstrators, was succeeded by his long-serving defence minister, Field Marshal Mohamed Hussein Tantawi, the head of the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces, a self-appointed body composed of 20 generals.

With the military still at the helm, little has changed. The Egyptian armed forces ousted the monarchy in 1952, and ever since then, its leaders have been in charge. Gamal Abdel Nasser ruled from 1954 until 1970. His successor, Anwar Sadat, was an army officer as well. After Sadat's assassination in 1981, Mubarak, his vice-president and a former air force commander, took over.

Tantawi is a member of that old boy's club. He sacrificed Mubarak and his closest associates so that the military could preserve its powers, prerogatives and privileges.

Mubarak and his two sons, Gamal and Alaa, are currently under house arrest and face the death penalty.

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

Their trial, which began last June under the full glare of television cameras and was widely seen as a populistic sop to the masses, has been adjourned until Dec. 28.

At first, Tantawi promised to turn over control to a civilian government by September. But then, to the consternation of many Egyptians, he announced he would stay on until parliamentary elections, ratification of a constitution and election of a president in 2013.

Tantawi has not lifted the 30-year state of emergency, and he has sought powers that would enable the armed forces to interfere in domestic politics and render that institution immune from civilian oversight.

As a result of renewed protests in Tahrir Square in late November, which claimed the lives of more than 40 demonstrators, Tantawi agreed to accelerate the transition to a civilian government.

But his associate, Gen. Mukhtar el-Mallah, announced that the military has no intention of ceding power, even after last week's phased parliamentary election, the results of which will not be known for months. "Egypt is not Tahrir Square," he declared. "We will not relinquish power because of a slogan-chanting crowd."

According to some observers, Egypt's exercise in democracy has been devised to marginalize liberal, progressive and secular Muslims and the nation's Coptic Christian minority, all of whom were in the forefront of last winter's revolution. With the economy stagnating and the suspicion growing that the military is stoking sectarian divisions for its own ends, Egyptians are once again in a cranky and rebellious mood.

The ripple effects of the Arab Spring have inundated Syria, the self-styled beating heart of Arab nationalism.

Syria's president, Bashar Assad, has promised to enact sweeping reforms since rioting broke out last March. And while he has tinkered with the system to placate opponents, he has not fundamentally changed it. Instead, his security forces have dealt brutally with dissenters, having committed war crimes in killing more than 3,500 civilians.

Initially, protestors demanded real changes in governance and policy, but Assad's crackdown has been so bloody that they now demand regime change. Once basically peaceful in nature, the popular revolt in Syria has grown increasingly violent as soldiers and officers have defected in droves from the army.

Under the leadership of the Free Syrian Army, a militia composed of hundreds or possibly thousands of defectors, guerrillas have attacked Syrian military convoys, the offices of the ruling Baath party in Damascus and air force intelligence headquarters outside the capital. Assad's standard claim that "armed gangs" are behind the troubles has become a self-fulfilling prophecy as Syria lurches closer to a civil war.

Never in its history has Syria been so isolated as it is today. The Arab League suspended its membership and imposed sanctions on Syria after Assad failed to abide by an Arab League plan to end the violence. Assad had pledged to remove armoured vehicles from the streets, halt violence, release all political prisoners and allow special monitors and journalists into the country. But he reneged on these promises, prompting the usually ineffectual Arab League to take action. Prior to this unprecedented development, King Abdullah II of Jordan became the first Arab ruler to openly call for Assad's resignation.

With U.S., European Union and Canadian sanctions also in place, the Syrian economy is beleaguered.

Gen. Mohamed Hussein Tantawi

Assad has managed to alienate even friends. Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, and Russia's president, Dmitri Medvedev, have urged him to step down if he cannot implement promised reforms. Even China, one of his staunchest allies, has advised Assad to move faster to honour his promises.

In all probability, Assad will try to "tough" it out, hoping he can somehow prevail. If this is the route he chooses, his fate may be bitter. Assad may go the way of Moammar Gadhafi, the eccentric dictator of Libya, who was killed in ignominious fashion by rebel fighters in October after failing to crush a revolt that had spiralled into a full-fledged civil war.

The situation in Syria has not reached such depths, and NATO has no plans to intervene in Syria, as it did in Libya. But Assad's days may well be numbered.

Yemen's dictatorial president, Ali Abdullah Saleh, has finally stepped down after three decades, having transferred his powers to colleagues and family. But Yemen is still awash in violence.

In Tunisia, where the least bloodshed has occurred, a moderate Islamist party won a plurality of the votes in a recent election. In Bahrain, where pro-democracy protests were put down by the king's security forces and troops from Saudi Arabia and the Gulf Cooperation Council, resentment runs deep.

It's clear that the last chapter of the Arab Spring has yet to be written.

Canadian yeshiva holds first convocation

Chancellor decries lack of community support

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

A dissonant note was struck at the inaugural convocation of the Canadian Yeshiva and Rabbinical School when its newly installed chancellor bemoaned the lack of Jewish community support for the new institution.

"I was deeply disturbed and even distressed when I heard that certain sectors of the local community have not given the support that this sacred institution deserves. Rather, they sought to crush it as millstones crush wheat," said Rabbi Daniel Sperber at the celebratory event Nov. 27 at the University of Toronto's Isabel Bader Theatre.

The school, which began offering classes to the community in September, expects to open its seminary in 2012. It needs the "total support of all members of the Toronto Jewish community and indeed the Canadian Jewish community," Rabbi Sperber said.

"Some elements of this community may find difficulty in accepting the fact that a new institution is being created which may challenge certain basic tenets of their Jewish position. To them, I would ask that they be silent."

Rabbi Sperber also noted the uniqueness of the school being part of the Toronto School of Theology (TST), a consortium of seven theological seminaries affiliated with the University of Toronto. A veteran of interfaith dialogue, he noted that such interactions clarify areas of common ground and "fortif[y] our own faith," while at the same time fostering an appreciation of other religions.

Martin Campbell, chair of the board of governors of TST, expressed its commitment to supporting the new yeshiva.

Among other speakers at the convocation was Senator Linda Frum, who brought greetings from Prime Minister Stephen Harper. Former British prime minister Tony Blair, who now runs a foundation he established to promote understanding about religions, expressed support in a video.

Rose Wolfe, chancellor emerita of the University of Toronto, also took part as installing officer.

The new yeshiva, which has an interfaith advisory board, is housed at U of T's University of St. Michael's College. It is not affiliated with any Jewish denomination. Instead, the school hews to what is described on its website as "classic" or "pre-denominational" Judaism.

In an interview following the convocation, Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, the school's rosh yeshiva and the driving force behind its creation, told The CJN that supporters of the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary "might worry that this will draw away from the Jewish Theological Seminary, when we don't think it will, because JTS follows a much different pattern of Halachah than we do."

As well, he added, some Orthodox people question whether the yeshiva is "really" traditional, because of the Conservative background of some of its faculty members.

Rabbi Tanenbaum served as a second rabbi at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation until his retirement in 2009. Beth Tzedec ended its affiliation with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism in 2008. Rabbi Wayne Allen, the yeshiva's provost, was longtime spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, which is Conservative. Rabbi Sperber, a 1992 recipient of Israel's prestigious Israel Prize for his scholarship, is a professor of Talmud at Bar-Ilan University and president of its Jesselson Institute for Advanced Torah Studies. He describes himself as centrist Orthodox.

Explaining part of the raison d'être behind the establishment of the new yeshiva, Randall Starr, chair of its board of governors, said at the convocation, "Up until now, Canada has had to go outside its borders to fill its pulpits and other rabbinical positions."

In his address at the convocation, Rabbi Tanenbaum said the school is initiating "a 25-to-50-year plan to reinvigorate Canadian Jewry. Each year, we aim to send out another wave of rabbis – rabbis who understand and speak Canadian – to organize, to develop and to lead underserviced Jewish communities."

The yeshiva's honorary chair, retired senator Jerry Grafstein – who once considered pursuing rabbinic studies – called the convocation "a splendid and striking event."

New consul general announced

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Israel's current consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, Amir Gissin, still has more than seven months to serve, but his replacement has already been named.

Next summer, Australian-born DJ Schneeweiss will replace Gissin.

A Nov. 29 report in the Australian Jewish News confirmed Schneeweiss as the heir apparent to Gissin.

Asked for his thoughts on his replacement, Gissin told The CJN he was happy with the pick.

"Schneeweiss is one of the Israeli foreign service's rising stars, and his appointment to Toronto reflects the importance of this city for the government of Israel."

The CJN interviewed Schneeweiss –Israel's former deputy ambassador in China – in March while he was in Toronto as co-ordinator of Israel's anti-boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) strategy department, his current role with the country's foreign service.

The paper will interview Schneeweiss on his new post closer to his arrival next summer.

Cholent cook-off

Michelle Bitran
Intern

It might not look so appetizing, but it tastes delicious. Cholent has been a staple of Jewish food around the world for hundreds of years. That is the reason why Project Tish, a grassroots organization dedicated to giving young Jews a Shabbat experience, chose to hold a cholent cook-off that would crown the creator of Toronto's best cholent.

Project Tish, named for the traditional festive gatherings after Shabbat dinners, has been active for the last five years. The organizers host Shabbat dinners, often in their homes, for the university-aged Jewish community, regardless of levels of religious observance. Each dinner attracts 20 to 30 guests, and cholent is often on the menu.

Ontario MPP proposes Jewish Heritage Month

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Ontario Liberal MPP for Eglinton-Lawrence Mike Colle wants May declared Jewish Heritage Month in Ontario.

On Nov. 30, Colle moved a private members' bill at Queen's Park – the Jewish Heritage Month Act – that he said would, if passed, offer Ontarians an opportunity to "recognize the important contributions that Jewish Canadians have made to Ontario's social, economic, political and cultural fabric."

The bill already has all-party support. It was co-sponsored by New Democratic Party MPP for Parkdale-High Park, Cheri DiNovo, and Conservative MPP for Thornhill, Peter Shurman.

Colle, in a statement on his website, said May was chosen because it is "a significant month for the Jewish Canadian community. Various Jewish artistic and cultural events such as the UJA Walk for Israel, Toronto Jewish Film Festival and Jewish Music Week occur in May. Holocaust Remembrance Day and Israeli Independence Day also frequently occur in May."

Mike Colle

The bill is slated to come up for debate in early 2012.

Speaking to The CJN after he put forward the bill, Colle said the impetus behind drafting the bill stemmed from the proclamation of June being Ontario's Italian Heritage Month when Bill 103, the Italian Heritage Month Act, received royal assent in the legislature last October.

Shurman was also a co-sponsor of this bill.

"I thought we should do something to celebrate all the contributions that came from the Jewish community," Colle said.

Asked if these bills could open the door for controversy if other communities want to have their own months of recognition, Colle said there are already months dedicated to other groups, including a Chinese Heritage Month, as well as the Italian Heritage Month.

"If they're done in the vein of inclusivity and social harmony... I'm approaching this as we will celebrate and honour any group that's made a positive contribution to Ontario. We don't want to limit anyone," he said.

He said he envisions Jewish Heritage Month as a way to educate all of Ontario's children about the Jewish community.

Colle said he'd consulted with many of his Jewish constituents about this for the past year and received "overwhelming" support from them for the idea.

David Spiro, Greater Toronto co-chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), commended Colle on the bill.

"The Jewish community has a long, distinguished heritage in this province spanning well over 200 years. More than half of our country's 360,000 Jewish Canadians live in Ontario. We are proud of the role our community has played in the province's history, and will continue working with Ontarians of all backgrounds to help ensure that Ontario remains a great home for future generations," he said in a statement.

"We hope that, through our varied programs and events, Jewish Heritage Month will be meaningful not only for the Jewish community, but for all the people of Ontario."

Author takes aim at 'western self-loathing'

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Western self-loathing, which has led to a decline in western values, the growing radicalization of Islam, and the sham of human rights commissions were all grist for Mark Steyn's mill last Thursday night.

The columnist, essayist and author, known for his strident criticism of militant Islam, staunch defence of western values and gleeful disregard for political correctness, spoke to a packed, appreciative house at Holy Blossom Temple.

In a freewheeling conversation with local Jewish educator Elliott Malamet, Steyn took aim at what he said has become the looseness and complacency of western conduct and beliefs.

At the root of anti-Americanism "is western self-loathing." But he chided Americans for becoming soft. "You can't be a great power and go to the beach. You cannot be a hyper-power and say, 'We'll watch Dancing With the Stars.'"

While many believe America is "scary," a lot of people are beginning to realize it's "not scary enough." Meantime, the West's lack of self-confidence "gets worse in each generation. And we're to blame."

Steyn, whose latest book is titled After America: Get Ready for Armageddon, said that "it's easy to fight evil. The hardest thing is to recognize it."

One example is the alleged Islamic honour killings of the Shafia sisters, a horrific case now before the courts in Kingston, Ont. "Ninety-eight per cent of Canadians look away," Steyn said. "We have to be dragged inch by inch to face what happened — in Canada.

"It's not enough to sing O Canada and swear allegiance to the Queen. Future generations will curse us when they understand the freedoms we inherited and squandered because it was easier to look away."

Mark Steyn

U.S. President Barack Obama is another example of someone who doesn't understand radical Islam, Steyn went on.

What Obama and others "ignore" is the transformation of Islam. "Islam itself has changed. Seventy per cent of the vote in Egypt [last Monday] went to Islamic parties. Egypt got worse because the Muslim world got worse. When the president cannot see that and speak the truth, we are in deep, deep trouble."

Steyn, who affably referred to himself as "a right-wing lunatic," took aim at Canadian human rights commissions, which have been attacked by the right for squelching and policing free speech. Steyn himself, together with commentator Ezra Levant, were the subjects of a Canadian Human Rights Commission probe for publishing controversial remarks and images about Islam.

Steyn said he is "staggered at how far the left will go" to protect and advance the work of human rights panels.

"Bernie Farber [the former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress] and a lot of Canadian Jews are on the wrong side of this issue. Jews of all people should know that empowering the state to police what you think and what you say will not turn out well," Steyn said to applause.

If and when a law eliminates human rights commissions, "you can call it the Steyn-Levant law," he said to further applause.

On the subject of Israel, Steyn said more and more western intellectuals are publicly saying that the creation of the Jewish state had been a mistake. "There is something proudly wicked about that."

He warned that the "complicity" of the West, if allowed to continue, will lead to the "most evil events of all."

Referring to the superiority of western, particularly British values, Steyn said that "there's a reason Haiti is Haiti and Barbados is Barbados. And somehow, it's impolite to mention that."

The evening was co-sponsored by Torah in Motion.

Time to broaden dialogue on Israeli Arabs: UJA

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Helping Israeli Arabs succeed economically and socially will guarantee a strong Jewish and democratic state.

That was the message put forward at a Nov. 27 conference hosted by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's committee on Israeli and Arab issues.

A packed hall of about 150 people at the Lipa Green Building listened intently.

It was the first conference in Toronto of its kind, and was part of a series that had held prior events in Washington, D.C., and Philadelphia.

The committee, created in May 2010, exists to encourage dialogue within the mainstream Canadian Jewish community on the sometimes thorny topic of how Israeli Arabs are treated in Israel.

Jeffrey Stutz, the committee's chair, said its goal is to communicate the importance of strengthening the Israeli Arabs' social, economic and educational situation.

"Israel will be strengthened as a Jewish and democratic state by ensuring that its Israeli-Arab minority enjoys equal rights and opportunities," he said.

Israeli Arabs constitute about 20 per cent of Israel's population.

Aside from Stutz, speakers at the conference included Israel's consul general to Toronto, Amir Gissin; Prof. Elie Rekhess, an expert on Arab-Israeli relations with Tel Aviv University's Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and Arab Studies; Abeer Halabi, a Druze social worker with Israel's Merchavim Institute for the Advancement of Shared Society; Raji Srouji, a Palestinian and the sports manager of the city of Nazareth, and Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Also speaking were two Israeli medical students living in Toronto, one Jewish, the other Palestinian – Anat Kapelnikov and Alaa Amash respectively – who spoke of their experiences getting to know each other's cultures and breaking through social barriers to become friends.

Gissin said he was speaking as a representative of all Israelis and that the 1.4 million Israeli Arabs had been "marginalized."

"It's reflected in the way resources are allocated to them," he said. "Under Israeli law, all citizens are equal. When Israeli citizens stand before the court, there is no difference between Jews and Arabs. No, the difference is on another level."

Gissin then laid out two sets of statistics that caused the crowd to gasp. The first was the comparison of how many Jewish – excluding the haredi community – and Israeli-Arab women participate in Israel's workforce.

Nearly 66 per cent of Jewish women versus only 23 per cent of Arab women are participants in Israel's working sector.

"This gap represents hundreds of thousands of women who could be in the workforce," Gissin said.

The next statistic, the one that drew the more audible gasp from the audience, was the comparison of Jews to Arabs living at or below Israel's poverty line as defined by Israel's statistics bureau.

While approximately 12 per cent of Israeli Jewish households fell into this category, more than 57 per cent of Arab households were defined as poor.

"This is an unacceptable gap," Gissin said. "The main challenge of the Israeli government is to narrow these gaps."

During his address to the audience, Rekhess said that Israel's real problems don't lie in the West Bank or Gaza. The challenge going forward is how to keep the country both Jewish and democratic.

"There cannot be a more controversial topic," he said. "There is a demographic problem. The Arab birthrate… is still higher than the Jewish growth rate."

And 83 per cent of the population of Arabs in Israel identify as Muslim, with the other 17 per cent split evenly between Christian Arabs and Druze.

This leads to serious questions on how to continue to integrate the majority Israeli-Arab Muslim population into a Jewish democratic state.

The conference provided no answer to that question. Instead, it was intended to engender debate on the issue.

Rekhess said the government has to "acknowledge" this issue as a first step. Furthermore, he said, it's both a Jewish and moral imperative to solve the problem, and that by doing so, Israel's economy and its international image will improve.

He said there would be "a price for neglect."

For her part, Halabi said she has grown to understand both the Jewish and Arab points of view on Israel's nature, but that as a Druze, she still feels uncomfortable with her own identity.

"I'm a Palestinian, a Druze and an Israeli. But my identity is in conflict," she said.

Srouji said he felt that as a Palestinian, he could integrate into a Jewish Israel and still keep his identity. But there were serious issues for the government to address.

"Only three per cent of the government workforce is Arab," he said, adding that nearly 500 Arab towns within Israel's current borders had "disappeared" since 1948.

He said his programs helping Jewish and Arab children play sports together in Nazareth held out the rays of hope for a future peace between the peoples.

"Children [naturally] play together when you leave them alone," he said.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said he believes there are ways to help Israel stay Jewish and still be a true home for Israeli Arabs as well.

By way of example, he used the Canadian and Israeli national anthems to illustrate how solutions can occur and identities are maintained without strife.

He noted that the French version of O Canada contains a line that speaks of "marching with the cross."

"Canadian Jews know how to deal with that… they don't sing that line," he said to laughter, alluding to how Israeli Arabs might choose to deal with a similar awkward moment in Hatikvah.

In his closing remarks, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said conferences such as this one help "maintain the possibility that we can hold Israel together as both a Jewish and democratic state."

Stutz said his committee will now focus on efforts to publicize more events, recruit volunteers and ultimately become part of the Jewish Federations of North America's (JFNA) Social Venture Fund for Jewish-Arab Equality and Shared Society.

The cost of joining the fund is $50,000 a year, Stutz said. Twenty members currently administer the fund.

"It would give us a seat at the table and help [the Canadian Jewish community] have a say" on what projects the funds are allotted to in Israel, he said.

Gail Zucker, JFNA's senior director of consulting, told The CJN that the social venture fund has "raised more than $3.5 million since its inception in 2007 and allocated over $3 million towards a portfolio of programs in the areas of education and economic development, with a particular focus on women's empowerment and capacity building."

JIAS celebrates its 90th anniversary

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Marking the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Toronto's 90th anniversary, author and filmmaker David Bezmozgis spoke at the agency's annual general meeting about his family's immigration experience with JIAS Toronto 30 years ago.

Bezmozgis, who is the celebrated author of Natasha and Other Stories and The Free World, and was named one of The New Yorker's 20 most promising fiction writers under the age of 40, centred his speech around his family's JIAS Toronto file.

Reading from a copy of his family's file, which was opened in 1979, Bezmozgis became emotional, choked back tears, and said more to himself than the audience, "I didn't expect that."

Bezmozgis, a Latvian who immigrated to Toronto with his parents in 1980 when he was six years old, said that throughout the file, his family was described as "refugees," and "stateless."

"It is strange and eerie to see us reduced this way in clerical black and white," he said.

"It is true? Did this happen? Is this really who we were?"

He said his "need to tell a story about this [immigrant] community, a story that hadn't been told before," compelled him to write two books, a number of short stories and a feature film about his experience.

He said that while reading the file, he was struck by "how much in the past it all is."

Bezmozgis said that today his family is "as far removed from the USSR immigration as the previous generation, the generation of Holocaust survivors, was removed from theirs, when we arrived in Canada in 1980.

"By the time we arrived in Canada, those people had been ensconced in this country for three decades."

He recalled visiting his parents' friends who had moved to Toronto about three years earlier.

"I remember being astounded by their fluency with the culture and the language – so much further along than we were. How envious I was of them. How inconceivable it seemed that we would one day attain their ease, the ease that comes with being in a country for a grand total of three years."

Thirty years later, he added, "here I am, standing before you, recalling those early days."

He said he also learned details about his parents and grandparents that he'd never known from some of the documents in his family's JIAS file.

"Many of our parents and grandparents kept no record, no diaries or journals, and much of what documented their lives in the Old Country was left behind," Bezmozgis said.

"In addition to the great help JIAS provided to three generations of immigrants, it also gives us a rich trove of historical data, data that likely exists no where else."

Bezmozgis said it's hard for him to contemplate "an organization that has been so intimately involved in the great dramas of Jewish life over the past 90 years… and not wonder what it'll look like in another 30 years, let alone 90."

JIAS Toronto executive director Janis Roth also addressed the agency's staff, board of directors, volunteers and clients about its accomplishments, developments, challenges and aspirations.

"For the first time since 2003 we have seen our budget slip into the red and all indications are that budgets will get tighter and tighter in the years to come," Roth began.

She said Citizenship and Immigration Canada is cutting $30 million from its Ontario budget in 2012.

"[But] against this backdrop of budget freezes and cuts, JIAS Toronto had a most remarkable year."

In addition to the expansion of services, programs and scholarships, JIAS Toronto launched a rebranding campaign.

Roth said JIAS Toronto clients encouraged the staff to share stories of hardships and new beginnings with the community.

"We realized we needed a new face, a fresh start – one that would capture the profile of the immigrants moving here and would reflect the fresh start they were making," Roth said, adding that changes to their website and information materials now reflect that.

Protecting kids is our sacred trust

Rabbbi Sean Gorman

Over the last several weeks, we have been witness to another display of abuse, scandal, and cover-up.

We have watched as revelations of sexual exploitation have rocked Penn State University. We have seen a president and a beloved coach lose their jobs over this disaster, appropriately. Sadly, we will continue to watch as the victims of this series of crimes suffer the nightmares for years to come.

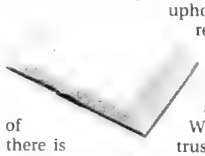
While witnessing the ongoing travails in Pennsylvania, the Jewish community has been reading about the Akeidah – the binding of Isaac on the altar, the subsequent birth of Rebecca, the death of Sarah, and the marriage of Isaac to Rebecca.

Jewish tradition performs "midrashic math" to conclude that Isaac was 37 years old at the time of the Akeidah. The math is predicated on the fact that Sarah was 90 years old when Isaac was born, and 127 years old when she died. The Akeidah took place right before her death.

The problem with this midrashic math is that Rebecca was born during the time between the Akeidah and Sarah's death. This means, Rashi says, that Rebecca was three years old at the time of her marriage.

There are many issues with the calculation of Isaac's age. For starters, how could a three-year-old

Rabbinic Reflections



Rivkah bring water for all of the servant's camels? But there is another concern though of much greater significance. Rebecca agrees to go with the servant to marry a man she has never met. Jewish values can never countenance a midrashic tradition that allows a mere toddler to commit herself to such an adult undertaking, with all of its intimate ramifications.

Ibn Ezra, a Spanish commentator from the late 12th century, reads our text differently. He sees Isaac as a teenager. This places 13 years between Isaac and Rebecca, and removes the stench of crime and betrayal from our tradition.

We have been entrusted with raising and protecting our children. This sacred trust is so much more than feeding them and placing clothing on their backs. We uphold that sacred trust by reporting what we know as soon as we know it, with no regard to whether or not it has already been reported. We uphold that sacred trust by flatly rejecting any text that seems to indicate that our youngest and most vulnerable might be subject to such treatment. We uphold that sacred trust when we remember that protecting our children must not be only a set of actions, but also a constant theological mindset.

Rabbi Sean Gorman is spiritual leader of the Pride of Israel Synagogue in Toronto.

Propaganda in an academic guise

Recently, the Olive Oil Project that I initiated four years ago was launched with a wildly successful gala reception for 500 people at the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto. It was hosted by the consuls general of Israel, Greece, Italy and France. The evening was capped by a wonderful tasting, where we all basked in the glow of friendship and fraternity that the evening had brought about. It was a moment to be treasured.

The next day consisted of a scholarly conference organized and hosted at St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto by its principal, Prof. Domenico Pietropaolo. The week before, Pietropaolo had organized a moving presentation on the Holocaust in Italy as part of Holocaust Education Week. It highlighted St. Mike's commitment to, and friendship and solidarity with, our community.

I was expecting the usual pedantic, academic presentations on olive oil from the conference, which Pietropaolo had so ably put together. But the papers presented covered a broad range of topics, from the 20th-century German poet, Gottfried Benn's fascination with Italy and the olive, to an examination of the olive oil industry at the ancient site of Tel Ekron, located on the coastal plain of Israel between Jerusalem and the Mediterranean.

Ekron was the first major industrial olive oil complex so far discovered in the Mediterranean. The complex dated to the 7th century BCE, when the mighty Assyrian Empire held sway over the eastern Mediterranean coast. (It was the Assyrians who destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel in 722/721 BCE and deported some of its inhabitants, giving rise to the legend of the Ten Lost Tribes).

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

But amid all of these fascinating, but mostly esoteric, talks there was a hidden time bomb. The title of the last paper briefly got my antennae up. It was called "A Comparison of the Olive Oil Industries in Tuscany and Palestine." The word Palestine should have been a warning, but I attributed no malevolent motives to its use. However, the talk itself turned out to be nothing more than pro-Palestinian propaganda masking itself in an academic guise.

As chair of that session, I was confronted with the choice of letting the speaker, a "reputable" academic, continue talking, or stopping her and thus denying her "academic freedom." The day of the talk was Remembrance Day, and out of respect for the occasion, when we honoured those who had died defending freedom of speech, I decided to let her speak, even though I disagreed with what she was saying.

Dan Bahat, the well-known Israeli archeologist, who is a visiting professor at St. Mike's, sat in the audience. He and Judith Cohen of York University stood up and vociferously challenged the speaker on her half truths and innuendos.

But it still leaves the question as to how far one has the right to exercise academic freedom. The conference brought home the fact that even in the spirit of co-operation that it was designed to foster, one has to be ever mindful of the sinister and devious evolution of both antisemitism and anti-Zionism.

Thanksgiving at Chanukah

Midrashic Moments

Rachael Turkienicz

The holiday of Chanukah is approaching and every year it's important to refresh our thoughts about the event as we enjoy family, candles, dreidels and latkes. We are well aware of the victory of the Maccabees and how the few were victorious over the many. We remember that the war against the Jews was waging on two fronts – there was engagement with a foreign enemy as well as an internal one, the traitors within the Jewish people. There was a tremendous call for Jewish unity as the Maccabees rallied around the cry, "Whoever is for God should come to me."

The women of that era were as involved as the men in maintaining a strong front against the enemies. While the men were away, engaged in warfare, the women were in the towns and cities maintaining Jewish culture and paying the ultimate price. We study the story of Judith and how her victory and inspirational leadership reads into the story of Chanukah. But it's important to remember all the details and see what we can learn from them as well.

The hero of the Jewish people was Judah the Maccabee. We learn of his strategies in battle and his perspective on the enemy. The Book of the Maccabees describes to us how he rededicated the Temple and cleaned up the abominations that had been brought into the Temple, including foreign gods. We pay attention to the name Maccabee and connect the meaning to the word "hammer." We have paid attention to everything except his first name: Judah.

Because we're so familiar with this name and are so comfortable with it, we forget to ask what we can learn from his name that connects to Chanukah. The first time the name Judah is used by a Jewish person brings us to yet another woman: Leah. Our matriarch, Leah, gives birth to her fourth child and states that she is now giving thanks to God, and she named the baby Judah. The name itself means thanking God. The midrash tells us that until Leah came up with that concept, no one had thanked God.

We say prayers on Chanukah that clearly express our gratitude to God, and it's the hero himself, Judah, whose name directs us to this gratitude. Yet at the same time, we're taught to be careful about gratitude for victory in war. It's clear that while we're thankful for our victory, is that the same thing as rejoicing over the death of the enemy?

There's a midrash that states that when we thank God for a victory, the sages quote a verse that says, "Give thanks to God" but does not then say "ki tov" (for He is good). According to the sages, "The Holy One does not rejoice at the downfall of the wicked."

There was no limit to the cruelty enacted against the Jewish people as described in the Book of the Maccabees, but we don't gauge our gratitude according to the wickedness of the enemy. We follow the name of Judah and always give thanks to God, but we must separate that from rejoicing over the death of an enemy.

Nobel and the Jews: a repeat affair

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

When the Nobel Prizes are presented on Dec. 10, five of the 13 individuals who will be honoured are Jewish. Once again, those winners will be disproportionate to a community that represents 0.2 per cent of the world's population. Today, some theories behind those numbers.

First the facts. The Jewish Virtual Library has put together a list of Jewish Nobel Prize winners since the Nobel Foundation of Sweden first awarded prizes for excellence in physics, medicine, chemistry, economics, literature and world peace. "Between 1901 and 2011, around 850 Nobel Prizes were handed out. Of these, at least 170 [recipients] are Jews." [http://bit.ly/jnobel8]

When looking at why so many Jews have excelled at the Nobels, one must surf carefully. You can find yourself mired in Jewish websites that not only take pride in these accomplishments, but also take a swipe at other ethnic groups who have not fared as well. Then there are the antisemitic sites that are happy to point out that not only do Jews control the banks and media, but they also have a corner on the fields of literature, chemistry, medicine, physics, economics, and even peace. And finally, there are the sites that I recommend – those that exhibit pride (and hopefully, humility) in the achievements of what members of the Jewish community have been able to produce.

According to Uzi Arad, director of the Institute of Policy and Strategy at the Interdisciplinary Institute, in Herzliya, Israel, "the reason for the disproportionate number of Jewish winners is the premium Jews have placed on learning and scholarship. The tradition of reflection and scholarship has sharpened the inquisitive Jewish mind. It takes an inquisitive, nonconformist mind to break into new areas and make discoveries." [http://bit.ly/jnobel11]

Writing in Commentary, Charles Murray used the Nobel statistics as a starting point for asking why Jews have excelled disproportionately in the arts and sciences since the 18th century. He examined historical factors like "occupational selection," the importance of literacy among Jews, and heredity – and he set off a firestorm of reaction. [http://bit.ly/jnobel12]

One writer took him to task for using the Nobel Prize as a gauge for intelligence. "Consider that women comprise some 50 per cent of the world's population, but fewer than five per cent of Nobel Prize winners (one of Mr. Murray's favourite metrics). Sweden, with only one-10th of a per cent of the world's population, has contributed approximately five per cent of Nobel laureates. Are Swedes therefore smarter than women?" [http://bit.ly/jnobel13]

One of the most interesting pieces I came across is by Lazar Berman of the American Enterprise Institute. Using the Nobel numbers as a starting point, he delves into the nurture versus nature debate and traces Jewish (Ashkenazi and Sephardi) achievements since the Middle Ages. He focuses on IQ as a predictor "of success in academic subjects and most jobs" and points to studies in which Ashkenazi Jews score significantly higher than surrounding populations. [http://bit.ly/jnobel16]

Israeli Aaron Ciechanover, the 2005 Nobel Prize co-winner for chemistry, was succinct when he explained why his country excels at the Nobels. "The human brain is the only natural resource that Israel possesses." [http://bit.ly/jnobel14]

Winnipeg Hillel introducing new leadership model

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Hillel Winnipeg is in the process of adopting a new leadership model that is intended to cast a wider net and attract more student participation.

"We are just beginning to implement our new approach," says Hart Jacob, Hillel Winnipeg's director. "Rather than having a formal structure with a formal executive, we are creating a number of micro committees – smaller interest groups under the Hillel umbrella."

Jacob came up with the idea for the new direction last summer after attending the Hillel Leadership Institute in St. Louis. "This is a model that is being tried on some American campuses," he says.

Last year, he points out, Winnipeg Hillel had a small group of core students who ran the organization. "They worked well together, but there was too much for them to do," he says. "We believe that our new program will engage more students and expand student involvement."

He reports that before starting on the new direction, he met with last year's Hillel student leadership and solicited their views. "There was some hesitation about doing away with titles," he says, "but, in the end, everyone was on board."

One of the limitations that Hillel Winnipeg has faced over the years in attracting students, Jacob notes, is that Winnipeg's two universities are commuter campuses. Students live at home rather than in university dormitories, unlike Queen's University, he said, where there are a number of Jewish students in residence. The Winnipeg Jewish students have long-established friendships and aren't looking to university to meet new people and make new friends.

The micro groups, he says, would be driven by students' interests. For example, Jacob notes, young Chabad Rabbi Shmuley Altein comes to the University of Manitoba every Tuesday for a lunch-and-learn program studying Jewish religious texts with students under the Hillel banner.

"We also have an Israel advocacy group, a sports group, a Shabbat group and a social group established," Jacob says. "And we have a social-action group in the works."

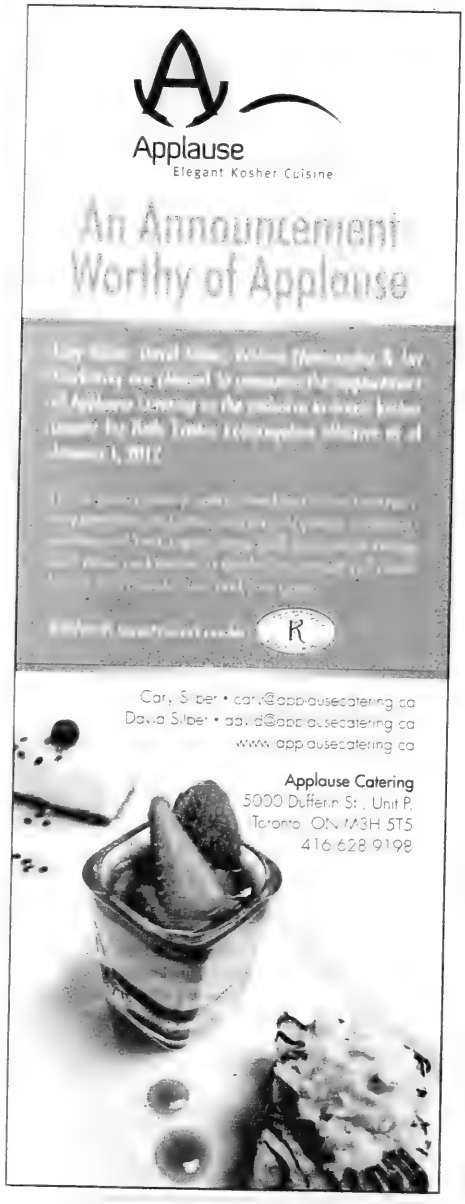
He notes that the new approach should encourage students to focus more on their interests and take ownership of their groups. Each group would have a leader or contact person. Jacob's role would be that of the co-ordinator providing support, resources and guidance to the different groups.

Jacob will continue to organize macro programs, such as visiting speakers from Israeli universities, and arrange for fellowships, scholarship and travel to Jewish-themed conferences for Jewish students on campus.

He estimates that there are between 600 and 800 Jewish students enrolled at the University of Manitoba and the University of Winnipeg. Many of them are from families that have immigrated from South America, largely Argentina, and Israel in the last 10 years.

Jacob says the Russian/Israeli and South American-born students prefer to integrate with the Canadian-born students rather than form their own cultural groups.

"From the point of view of the larger group, it's great having students from a different country and culture and perspective involved," he adds. "They bring different ideas and excitement to our groups and programs."



Although motion rejected SAIA refuses to concede defeat

As students debated whether the motion should pass, Gross said council members eventually put an end to the debate, deciding that they spend more time focusing on issues that directly affect U of T's graduate students.

In the end, a majority voted against the motion.

"I am relieved that the motion failed, because cooler heads prevailed," Gross said.

"We showed very clearly that the motion was inherently duplicitous and false... and a harmful act of propaganda."

Brandon Lablong, Hillel of Greater Toronto's special programs co-ordinator, said he worked with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs to help students at U of T develop a strategy and present arguments that would get the motion defeated.

"The beautiful thing about this is that it really was a student initiative. These grads, who are all academics, were able to independently learn up on the issues," Lablong said.

Although the motion was voted down, the social justice committee and SAIA haven't conceded defeat.

The committee had planned to urge the GSU this past Monday to have each section of the three-paragraph motion considered as a separate resolution.

The first paragraph calls on U of T to divest from the four aforementioned firms. The second calls on it "to refrain from investing in all companies involved in violations of international law," while the third urges it "to work with students, faculty and staff to undergo a democratic and transparent process to ensure accountability of its investments to principles of social and environmental justice."

The committee would have needed to get the approval of two-thirds of the roughly 100 GSU council members to break up the motion and have each part considered individually, Gross said last week, ahead of the Dec. 5 meeting.

Lablong predicted that even if the committee were to secure that approval, "It won't go very far because separately, it's very vague.

"And the first part of the motion, which calls for the divestment from the four companies, has already been [defeated]."

BUDDY DAY: On Nov. 22, all the students at Robbins Hebrew Academy Beth Tzedec campus participated in the first Buddy Day of the year. Younger and older students paired up and took part in a fun activity: they worked together to create a collage of their dream school, then presented it to the other groups. They explained their ideas in English, Hebrew and French. Pictured, from left, are Emily Gertin, Noah Shap and Benny Barish.

ISRAEL WEEK: Grade 11 students at Ulpanat Orot participate in an activity about Israel as part of the inaugral Israel Week at Bnei Akiva Schools planned by the school's shlichim in honour of Kaf Tet B'November, Nov. 29, 1947, the day the UN Partition Plan for Palestine was accepted at the United Nations, paving the way for the establishment of the State of Israel. Pictured, back row from left, are Maytal Perlman, Sarina Brenman, Leora Mayer, Tamar Gross, Sarah Gomolin, Leora Newman, Kayli Green, Sarah Laszlo, Debra Felsher, Elisheva Riaboy, and, front row from left, Keshet Eklove, Mrs. Rachel Frankel, Tali Serman and Talia Shiel.

BLUE AND WHITE DAY: Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill campus celebrated the anniversary of the UN vote for the partition plan, which happened Nov. 29, 1947, with a blue and white day at school. Pictured are Grade 3 students and school shinshinim Ariel Levy and Michal Cohen.

Israel has an interest in Jordan's stability

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

The Middle East is undergoing unprecedented change and uncertainty, with Islamist forces in the ascendency. They've been pre-eminent in elections held recently in Morocco and Tunisia, a role many expect will be repeated through the complicated election process underway in Egypt. In this atmosphere, in which Islamists are openly hostile to the Jewish state, Israel finds itself increasingly isolated.

It's all the more surprising, then, to read in the Nov. 29 New York Times not only that Israeli President Shimon Peres met with Jordan's King Abdullah the day before in the king's palace in Amman, but that Abdullah announced it publicly. That's not the act of an Arab leader who fears negative consequences from the country's Palestinian majority and the prominent Muslim Brotherhood.

What accounts for this unusual development?

Ostensibly, King Abdullah's rationale for meeting Peres was to try to promote re-engagement between Palestinians and Israelis in what many consider to be a moribund peace process. After all, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has refused to return to the negotiating table with Israel without preconditions. Instead, the Palestinians have sought statehood recognition at the United Nations and have formed (however symbolic) a "unity" government with Hamas – a movement that calls for Israel's destruction.

It would seem that King Abdullah, who recently met with Abbas in Ramallah, is fighting a major uphill struggle to keep Israeli-Palestinian negotiations alive, a role previously played by Egypt under former president Hosni Mubarak.

But just how much currency can Abdullah expect to gain with this diplomatic initiative? Some analysts point to Abdullah's increasingly tenuous hold on power, with challenges from the Muslim Brotherhood, a restive Palestinian population demanding an end to second-class status, and now elements of his traditional political base: the "East Bank" Bedouins who are suffering economically.

At a deeper level, King Abdullah may not be seeking to placate the Palestinians in his kingdom, but rather to preserve his Hashemite rule against the rising tide of Islamist forces, including those coming from Iran, which also exerts growing influence in Iraq on Jordan's eastern border.

According to Nicolas Pelham ("Jordan Starts to Shake," New York Review of Books, Dec. 8), although this has gone largely unreported, hundreds of Jordan's well-trained security personnel gave substantial help to the Saudi-led crackdown on the Shia rebellion in Bahrain several months ago. "But in their new guise as the Gulf's security contractor, the East Bankers have found a new role. Jordan's inclusion in a larger club of Bedouin tribes further enhances their status and leverage in dealing with the kingdom's Palestinian majority," Pelham writes.

In turn, the Saudis have surpassed the United States as Jordan's biggest financial backer, underwriting the monarchy with more than $1 billion this year. For the Saudis and other members of the Gulf Co-operation Council, the main threat to be addressed is Iran. On this crucial subject, Israel's interest in a stable Jordan melds with Saudi Arabia's, even though this fact remains largely unspoken.

Jeffery Goldberg and Marc Ambinder's cover story in the December issue of the Atlantic magazine ("The Ally From Hell: What to Do about Pakistan") is a gripping, deeply disturbing must-read. This goes even for those who, over the years, have followed reports about the double game nuclear-armed Pakistan has been playing with the Americans. While tentatively engaged in the fight against Al Qaeda and other terrorist organizations, major elements of Pakistan's security service have supported groups that strike American forces in Afghanistan and have co-ordinated terrorist attacks in India.

The value of the Goldberg-Ambinder 10,000-word essay, the result of six months of interviews, is in the details, such as: "In a country that is home to the harshest variants of Muslim fundamentalism… including Al Qaeda, the Haqqani network, and Lashkar-e-Taiba… [small tactical] nuclear bombs capable of destroying entire cities are transported in delivery vans on congested and dangerous roads."

Iran's looming nuclear threat is bad enough, but the more immediate risk that's insufficiently discussed in the media is the possibility that Pakistani weapons could fall into the wrong hands in the very near future.

Paul Michaels is director of research and media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

NCSY honours leaders

Compiled by CJN Staff

NCSY Canada recently honoured Fran and David Woolf for decades of leadership in our community.

Forty years ago, the Woolfs and a small group of like-minded people took on the responsibility of funding, fostering, and leading the growth of a youth organization dedicated to inspiring and educating unaffiliated Jewish teens. Today, NCSY Canada runs dozens of programs every week, numerous Shabbatons throughout the year and summer programs in Israel. In the 1970s, participants numbered in the dozens. NCSY in 2011 reaches thousands of teens across in the Toronto area and across Canada.

David Woolf was NCSY Canada's chair for more than 40 years, and he has also served on the boards of B'nai Torah Congregation and Jewish Family and Child, "David and Fran exemplify leadership and devotion to the community," said Rabbi Glenn Black, CEO of NCSY Canada "Their house was always open to young people, and their hearts have always been open to the needs of klal Yisrael."

The Woolfs were recognized at NCSY's sold-out 31st annual concert, featuring the band Eighth Day, Lev Tahor and Shlomo Simcha, at the Toronto Centre for the Arts on Nov. 27. A scholarship fund has been established in their honour.

Last shul in downtown Ottawa sells building

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Congregation Beth Shalom is on the move again, this time quite literally. Having accepted an offer from a local developer to buy its valuable downtown Ottawa property because it can't afford to maintain it, the congregation will now have to decide where and when to move.

In a 142-24 vote on Nov. 6, shul members approved the sale, which closes in March.

The offer from condominium builder Claridge Homes was for $15 million, with a possibility that the price could increase by up to $9 million if the city allows the developer to increase the site's density, the Ottawa Citizen reported.

The money will go toward finding a new location and erecting a new building, likely in suburban west Ottawa.

As the oldest congregation in the city – an amalgamation of the two earliest congregations, Adath Jeshurun and Agudath Achim – the 350-family Beth Shalom has faced its share of challenges over the past few years as demographics and synagogue attendance practices have changed.

Beth Shalom Synagogue

Having been an Orthodox congregation until a decision in 2003 to offer mixed, "family seating," the congregation hoped that the new arrangement would attract new members. Unfortunately, that didn't happen. In addition, the Orthodox rabbi and cantor at that time both left the synagogue. Eventually, after being unaffiliated for several years, the congregation joined the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues.

In 2005, the congregation embarked on a major refurbishment project, hired a new rabbi and introduced new programs, all in an effort to increase membership and bring people back downtown from the suburbs. By 2008, with the renovations complete, the congregation celebrated with a festive 50th-anniversary party.

Architectural designer Murray Cohen told The CJN at the time: "I have been a member of the shul since 1954. I was brought up on York Street. I think that architecture is like literature and art, part of our culture. I was proud to participate in creating a design that will satisfy the vision today and, hopefully, last another 50 years."

Now, only three years later, a number of factors led to a decision to sell the property and move to another location. The present building was, until a few years ago, occupied by both Beth Shalom and the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) as well as the offices of the former Ottawa Vaad Ha'ir and various other Jewish communal offices.

When the JCC moved to the new Jewish Community Campus in Ottawa's west end in 1998, the synagogue opted to stay put. That left it with a great deal of vacant space, which it rented out to various tenants.

Synagogue president Ian Sherman, whose family is among the congregation's founding families and who is now serving his third two-year term as president, said, "We have an 81,000-sq.-ft. property that frankly is too big for us. We are a landlord for a significant portion of the property. We want to be in the shul business, not the property management business."

A development task force, chaired by Brent Taylor, made a recommendation to the shul's board of governors to sell the property and relocate the congregation.

Although there is a certain amount of nostalgia for the current shul building and not all members are happy with the decision, Sherman noted that there was an 85 per cent approval rate to proceed.

"The emotions of doing what we are going to be doing are as intense for me as they are for anyone," Sherman said. "This is my life. My 52 years of shul life has been spent at Beth Shalom, but it is the right thing to do, the right time, and an incredible opportunity to capitalize on our value."

The next phase of finding a new location and actually moving will take from 30 to 48 months. "In the meantime, it is business as usual," Sherman said.

Nursing home auditor files report

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The ongoing saga of the Simkin Centre – also known as the Sharon Home – Winnipeg's longtime Jewish nursing home, seems to be taking a more positive turn following the Nov. 25 release of a new report by consultant Peter Kafka that focuses on board accountability and staff management.

"Peter Kafka clearly understands our situation and our community," said Jonathan Kroft, a former Jewish Federation of Winnipeg president and new Simkin Centre board member who has been designated to speak for the board. "Our board has unanimously accepted all of his recommendations in principle."

Harriet Berkal Sarbit also voiced her group's approval of Kafka's report. She's the spokesperson for a group of families who have made public their concerns about cases of poor care for Simkin Centre residents.

The controversy was touched off about a year ago following the death of Lilyan Peck, a 93-year-old resident of the home, shortly after she was transferred from the home to a hospital, where she was found to be suffering from severe, untreated bed sores.

"We feel vindicated by this report," Berkal Sarbit said.

Kafka has been CEO of the Louis Brier Home, Vancouver's Jewish nursing home, for the past eight years. He was asked by the Winnipeg Regional Health Authority to study accountability and staff management at the Simkin Centre. His report is based on a number of on-site visits and interviews with stakeholders in September and October.

In examining the operation of the Simkin board, Kafka described a closed shop where there are no criteria for board membership or term limits. He recommended maximum term limits, clear nomination guidelines that open the board to participation from a wider range of community members, an orientation program for board members and annual evaluations of board members.

Kafka painted a picture of poor staff morale brought about by a combination of factors, including ongoing negative publicity over the past year, unrealistic expectations from some of the families, "a lack of perceived leadership" and a "lack of trust" among some members of the staff.

THE HEART OF AUSCHWITZ

It sits like a jewel in a museum showcase, a cloth-and-paper valentine created in the midst of horror.

The Heart of Auschwitz is a book made in the shape of a heart by Auschwitz inmates to celebrate the 20th birthday of fellow prisoner Fania Feiner. It contains wishes of its 20 authors who risked their lives to present this gift. Through a remarkable journey around the world to find the authors, the filmmaker brings the women's beautiful gesture back to life.

Cotler wants inquiry into 'byelection' calls

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler feels vindicated now that the Conservative Party has acknowledged that it authorized the spate of partisan phone calls to his constituents in November.

But the battle is not over yet.

Where he and the Tories continue to differ is exactly what was said by the callers, who represented themselves as pollsters, during those conversations.

The Conservatives maintain they were trying to identify supporters and have not broken any rules. The proposed scenario of Cotler's resignation was not an outlandish one because rumours of Cotler's resignation have been circulating since he was first elected in 1999, said Conservative House leader Peter Van Loan.

Irwin Cotler

Cotler maintains that, according to the numerous testimonies from those called that his office has received, they were falsely told that a byelection was coming soon because he was stepping down.

The Conservative admission came after Cotler provided the House of Commons with what he described as further evidence that the party is behind the calls.

On Nov. 22, Cotler rose for a second time on a question of privilege to press his case that the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs should investigate the matter. He first raised the matter Nov. 16 and is awaiting a ruling by Speaker Andrew Scheer.

In that first intervention, Cotler identified the Ontario-based polling firm Campaign Research as responsible for the calls, and noted its ties to the provincial and federal Tories. Cotler now cites a quote since then from Saulie Zajdel, the Conservative candidate in Mount Royal in the May 2 federal election: "I have nothing to do with it. It is a party thing." It is contained an interview published Nov. 18 on the website iPolitics.ca, which describes itself as independent and non-partisan.

Since the election, Zajdel was hired as a regional aide to Canadian Heritage Minister James Moore and Industry Minister Christian Paradis.

Cotler also quotes Conservative Party spokesperson Fred DeLorey from the same article as saying the party "does not comment on operation matters," when asked about the polling.

"To my mind, [this] implies some level of involvement," Cotler said.

A list of people known to have received the calls, which spoke of an "impending" or "imminent" byelection, has already been submitted to the House. Some were told by the caller that they were acting on behalf of the Conservatives or Prime Minister Stephen Harper and that their support was requested, he said. Cotler's office received one report from a Hampstead household that it was solicited for a financial donation to the Conservatives for the "byelection."

Cotler, who denies that he is vacating the seat, reiterated that the calls are not only false and causing confusion, but are impeding his ability to perform his duties effectively, which constitutes a breach of privilege, according to parliamentary rules. After this latest foray, he received support from Bloc Québécois MP André Bellavance and Green Party leader Elizabeth May.

"As the honourable member says himself, if there is a rumour in his riding of a byelection, the honourable member becomes a lame duck," Bellavance said. "We have to shed light on what is happening."

May said, "I suggest that this is mischief-making at a local level in relation to a member's intentions and to the member's good standing… Mr. Speaker, your ruling on this kind of unhelpful, deliberate misleading of the electorate, which is clearly anti-democratic at its very base, will put it to rest and make it stop."

Winnipeg child, family services marks 60 years

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's Jewish Child and Family Service (JC&FS) will celebrate its 60th anniversary and the 100th anniversary of Jewish social services in the city throughout 2012.

The JC&FS was established in 1952 to bring all the disparate Jewish social service organizations together under one roof.

The JC&FS is planning to kick off its Century of Caring celebrations on Jan. 22, with a family carnival at the Asper Jewish Community Campus. The celebrations culminate with a gala evening on May 24 at the Fort Garry Hotel (the hotel provides kosher catering), featuring internationally known Canadian jazz singer Sophie Milman, herself an immigrant to Canada from Russia via Israel.

Throughout the year, said JC&FS president Heather Leonoff, the agency will be carrying on a fundraising effort called L'Dor V'Dor, to raise money for an endowment fund to help secure the agency's long-term financial needs.

"As a child growing up in the Jewish community here, I took many things for granted," says Sheree Lercher Davis, who is co-chairing the gala evening with Tracy Leipsic. "As an adult, I have come to appreciate the social safety net that the Jewish Child and Family Service provides for our community and especially the children. It is because of the support of the agency that needy Jewish children can have bar and bat mitzvahs, go to camp and participate in the March of the Living."

The JC&FS operates a wide range of children's program, including protection services and foster-home placement; family support and counselling programs; seniors programs and programs to help new immigrants. The agency also has free-interest loan programs.

"We are the only religious-based community given a mandate to care for its own," Leonoff said.

She noted that when the JC&FS was founded 60 years ago, 30 community leaders stepped forth to establish the agency. "The last of that group passed away a few months ago," Leonoff said. "Now it's time for the next generation to step forward. The agency was there for our parents and grandparents. We must ensure that it is there for our children and grandchildren."

Winnipeg's first Jewish community was established in the 1880s with the arrival of the first small group of Jewish immigrants from Russia. Over the next couple of decades, the Winnipeg Jewish community grew slowly. By 1901, according to figures reported in historian Alan Levine's Coming of Age: A History of the Jewish People of Manitoba, the Jewish population here was 1,156.

Jewish communities historically looked after their own. The small community had established its own (first) cemetery in 1883 and had started several synagogues. But as far as self-help organizations are concerned, 1912 was the watershed year for Winnipeg's still young Jewish community. Between 1901 and 1912, the Jewish population grew to more than 9,000, with another 2,500 to 3,000 living in rural Manitoba. It was in 1912 that members of the community began creating social service organizations to help the needy in the community.

In 1912, two Jewish orphanages, which soon amalgamated, and a nursing home for Jewish seniors were founded. And the next year, the first landsmanshaft – or free loan association – was started up. By 1926, according to the late Harry Gutkin's Journey Into Our Heritage, there were 32 Hebrew loan societies operating in Winnipeg, with a combined membership of more than 1,000.

Regular staff meetings recommended

He recommended holding regular staff meetings and conducting annual staff satisfaction surveys. He also urged managers to circulate among staff, patients and families in order to improve access and communications.

"While most families are satisfied with the care and support their family members receive," Kafka wrote, "lack of access to and lack of visibility of senior staff was a common theme. Many families did not feel welcomed by the staff and felt the staff resented their involvement."

Kafka called for specific protocols to deal with complaints from family members and rapid response to those complaints. He also called for the creation of a family council, as well as regularly scheduled family events such as open houses to make family members more comfortable, and he recommended Sunday and holiday recreation activities that would include family members.

Although he didn't criticize Simkin Centre CEO Sandra Delorme directly, Kafka described at great length the kinds of the qualities that a CEO should exhibit.

While Delorme capably oversaw the institution's move from its longtime north Winnipeg location to its new south Winnipeg home in the early 2000s, the CEO's focus now, he wrote, should be on engaging staff, families and residents and creating a positive atmosphere at the home.

Last February, Simkin's board renewed Delorme's contract for another five years, but she has been on indefinite leave since October.

"We hope she will be back soon," Kroft said. "We will have to see how things go.

"Overall, Mr. Kafka praised the quality of care at the Simkin Centre," Kroft added. "But in health care, no institution is ever perfect."

The Simkin board has created a task force to implement Kafka's 35 recommendations "as quickly as is reasonable," adding, "This will takes some years."

Kafka foresees a timeline of one to three years. "The most important aspect of my report is what kind of impact it will have on Simkin Centre residents and their families," he said.

Stretching can reduce lower back pain

Stretching and strengthening your body can improve mobility and ease many types of pain, from arthritis to lower back pain.

A new study published in the Archives of Internal Medicine found that yoga or intense stretching classes can help improve function and reduce symptoms of chronic lower back pain. The study used adults with chronic, moderately impairing lower back pain and divided them into three groups. One group did a weekly yoga class, the second group did a weekly intensive stretching class, and the third group used a self-care book about reducing back pain.

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

More than 50 per cent of the participants in the yoga and stretching groups showed a substantial improvement, compared to only 23 per cent in the self-help group.

Both the yoga and the stretching groups reported a decline in lower back pain and a reduction in their use of medication. Yoga's benefits are largely a result of the physical aspect of stretching and strengthening the muscles.

The yoga and stretching participants reported benefits lasting for about six months from when they started taking the classes. Sixty-two per cent of the yoga class and 82 per cent of the stretching class enjoyed the benefits so much they said they practised at home three or more times a week, improving their results.

Most individuals who suffer from chronic lower back pain and arthritis tend not to move enough, or at all. Over time, this inactivity makes the pain worse.

This study, the largest to date on yoga and back pain, reinforces the message that exercise is safe and beneficial for individuals with chronic lower back pain. Stretching regularly can help keep you more flexible, and thus help your body distribute its weight more efficiently.

Both yoga and stretching help relax overly tight muscles that contribute to pain, stiffness and immobility. An exercise program may also help you lose weight, which can reduce the stress on your joints, also decreasing pain.

For best results, an exercise program should include both flexibility and strength training modified to your specific needs. But always check with your doctor before starting any new exercise program.

Treats to satisfy your sweet tooth

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

Looking for a new treat for the family? Or to sell at this year's bake sale? Or tote to a family reunion?

Well, look no further. The roster of recipes below will surely fit the bill and satisfy any sweet tooth. Quite apart from being a perennial favourite, the addition of chocolate nougat to brownies elevates them from the merely excellent to the unimaginably divine. The cupcakes have the added sophistication of espresso powder, subtle enough to be ignored by kids, but approved of by adults. They're also great without the icing as a mid-morning treat.

CHOCOLATE NOUGAT BROWNIES

1/2 cup unsalted butter
2 oz. unsweetened chocolate, chopped
1 oz. bittersweet chocolate, chopped
2 eggs
1 cup granulated sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
1/2 cup all purpose flour
1/4 tsp. baking powder
pinch salt
1 cup chopped Toblerone bar

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease an 8-inch square baking pan.

In a small saucepan set over low heat, melt butter with unsweetened and bittersweet chocolate, stirring constantly. Set aside.

Using hand-held or upright mixer, beat eggs until broken up. Gradually pour in sugar; beat until pale and thickened. Beat in vanilla. On low speed, beat in chocolate. Using wooden spoon, stir in flour, baking powder and salt. Stir in 3/4 cup of the chopped chocolate bar. Transfer mixture to prepared pan.

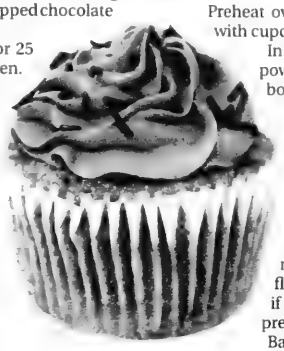
Bake in centre of preheated oven for 25 minutes. Carefully remove from oven. Scatter remaining 1/4 cup of chopped chocolate bar on top. Bake for another 5 minutes. Cool in pan on rack. Makes 16 squares.

BANANA ESPRESSO CUPCAKES WITH CHOCOLATE BUTTERCREAM

1-1/2 cups all-purpose flour
1-1/2 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. instant espresso powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1-1/2 cups mashed bananas (about 3 large bananas)
1/4 cup milk
1/2 cup unsalted butter, softened
3/4 cup granulated sugar
1 egg
1/2 tsp. vanilla
2/3 cup miniature chocolate chips (optional)

Chocolate Buttercream:

1/2 cup unsalted butter, softened
1 cup icing sugar
3 oz. bittersweet chocolate, melted
2 tbsp. whipping cream



Preheat oven to 350. Line 12-cup muffin tray with cupcake liners.

In bowl, combine flour, soda, espresso powder and salt; set aside. In separate bowl, stir together bananas and milk; set aside.

Using hand-held or upright mixer, beat butter until creamy. Gradually add sugar; beat until light and fluffy. Scrape down sides of bowl. Beat in egg. Beat in vanilla.

With wooden spoon, alternately stir in flour mixture and banana mixture, beginning and ending with flour mixture. Stir in chocolate chips, if using. Divide batter evenly among prepared cups.

Bake in centre of preheated oven until tops of cupcakes are golden and centre of cakes spring back when lightly pressed, 25 to 30 minutes. Cool in pan on rack.

Buttercream: Using hand-held or upright mixer, beat butter with sugar until fluffy. Slowly beat in melted chocolate, scraping bowl often. One tablespoon at a time, beat in cream. Ice each cupcake. Cupcakes can be refrigerated for up to 3 days. Makes 12 cupcakes.

A taste of Yiddish nostalgia – in English

Dorothy Lipovenko
Special to The CJN

Millions of cooks are in each other's kitchens every day without leaving home, posting so many good recipes online that cookbooks are longer my go-to source for innovation.

But cookbooks are still irresistible, if not for their lush photographs, then as a must-read for the culinary backstory of a people, their culture and history. That's why The Yiddish Family Cookbook, like a home-baked, sugar-dusted kichel cookie, is a nostalgic treat for food historians and recipe enthusiasts alike.

Almost a century has passed since H. Braun's Yiddish-language Dos Familien Kokh-Bookh, rolled off the presses of the Hebrew Publishing Co. in New York in 1914. (No one knows for certain H. Braun's gender, but it's assumed the author is a woman.) Braun aimed to give immigrant Jewish women a primer on tasty, healthy cooking that stayed faithful to Jewish dietary laws in their new home in America, where diverse, sometimes overwhelming food choices might have little resemblance to what they put on the table in the old country.

But Braun had something else in mind too: to make newcomers comfortable not just in the modern American kitchen, but also as consumers in the marketplace. To that end, she wrote in Yiddish and gave readers a transliteration of modern terminology to boost their confidence with shopkeepers and merchants.

Bracha B. Weingrod

Bracha Weingrod was given a copy of Familien as a housewarming gift when she and her husband moved into their new apartment in Israel in the early 1970s. The text was banged up and dirty, but appreciated by the Winnipeg native and Yiddish educator who'd been raised with a love of the mamaloshen.

The book sat untouched for many years, and not until Weingrod retired from teaching would she renew her acquaintance with it. But when she did, it blossomed into an ambitious project – a translation of the Yiddish text into a slimmed down, English-language edition for a new generation of readers.

"It was a labour of love," Weingrod said on a recent visit to Montreal, where she spoke about The Yiddish Family Cookbook at an event sponsored by the Jewish Public Library and Na'amat Canada.

"It was as if my Aunt Sonia, leaning on the kitchen counter, was giving me a recipe and instructing me in the tricks of the trade of good cooking, peppered with her Old Country wisdoms and humour," Weingrod writes in the preface.

Prospective publishers didn't bite. So Weingrod published the manuscript herself, using a crisp, clean format that mixes wonderful vintage photos (tenement kitchens, exteriors of knish and pickle stores) with dozens of recipes culled from the original 600.

She had much to choose from, since Braun had cast a wide net with recipes for traditional Jewish fare (fish, appetizers, meat), as well as modern eats such as sandwiches, "macaronis" and even candies.

But regardless of what was on the stove, Braun's recipes "spoke" to readers in a voice that was equal parts teacher, neighbour and welcome wagon.

Braun knew her audience: eastern European women who stuffed goose and rolled strudel but would sniff the fresh culinary breeze blowing through their kitchens with creations such as Lemon Ices and Indian Trout. And, as a champion of lighter foods to improve digestion, Braun is prescient in touting olive oil as the best fat to cook with, and swapping lemon juice for salt. But it is Braun's prose that makes the book such a delightful treasure, flecked here and there with high culture: "'Sauce, says a French cook, 'is the tone setter of food.'"

To soften what might be culinary culture shock, Braun told it like it was: "Sandwiches play a great role in the diet of Americans. And this is very important."

Recipe hounds will delight in recipes for Horse Cake and English Soup, while those with a sweet tooth will run to the stove to try Chocolate Caramels. And readers who just want to journey back in time will surely hear the manic chopping of herring before they taste it Braun's way.

The Yiddish Family Cookbook can be purchased at Amazon.com.

Latkes – where did they come from?

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

"Latkes derive originally from Italian ricotta pancakes. Being fried and made with dairy made them suitable for Chanukah. The Germans began using potatoes for pancakes in the late 18th century, after which it evolved into the classic recipe of eastern Europe." (From The Encyclopedia of Jewish Cooking by Gil Marks)

A rabbi, historian, social worker, chef and teacher, Marks spent three years doing diligent research, which he eventually compiled into 700 pages of detailed entries spanning continents and centuries of Jewish cuisine. His "encyclopedia" also includes 350 recipes of traditional Jewish dishes. Marks explores how Jews have adopted local dishes and adapted them to Jewish tastes, dietary laws and lifestyles, then helped transmit these foods from one area and culture to another.

Marks was selected as one of the 50 most influential Jews of 2010 by The Jewish Daily Forward. He won a James Beard Award for his book Olive Trees and Honey. Self-taught (he never took a cooking class in his life), he used to complain about his mother's food. She told him to make his own, so he did! Marks loves to cook – he told me he rarely buys bread and prefers to make his own. He loves traditional Jewish food but enjoys the diversity of Sephardi and other cuisines.

In his impressive reference book, The Encyclopedia of Jewish Cooking (Wiley), Marks helps readers learn about the foods and culinary traditions of various communities, including how the humble latke has evolved over time.

"Before there were pans, and long before ovens, ancient cooks dropped a little gruel on a hot rock of a campfire, resulting in thin cakes that were tastier than plain gruel or cakes cooked directly in the embers of the fire. From these rudimentary beginnings sprang a vast array of breads and pancakes, but the two were originally the same. After the advent of pottery, flatbreads and legume patties were cooked on terra cotta griddles and later on metal griddles or skillets. To prevent sticking, these pan breads were often cooked in a thin layer of fat or deep-fried, for added flavor and texture.

He describes the continuing culinary adventure of how pancakes and latkes have evolved to become the latkes that we know today.

It seems that around the same time that pancakes were experiencing a revival in Medieval Europe, two forms of food emerged as traditional Chanukah fare – fried foods and dairy foods.

After the Spanish expelled the Jews from Sicily in 1492, the exiles introduced ricotta cheese pancakes (called cassola in Rome) to the Jews of northern Italy. Consequently, cheese pancakes, which are a combination of fried and dairy foods, became a natural Chanukah dish. A biblical term for pancakes, as well as the modern Hebrew word, is levivot. The most prominent Ashkenazi term for pancake is the eastern European latke, derived from the Ukrainian word for pancake and fritter, oladka, by way of the Greek eladia (little oilies), ultimately from the Greek elaion (olive oil).

Marks explains that soft cheese and butter were luxury items in northeastern Europe, and that oil was scarce and expensive. The principal fat available for frying was schmaltz, which was prohibited with cheese. More tweaking of the pancake batter occurred over time, substituting rye or buckwheat flour, turnips and other vegetables. And then the potato arrived.

The potato latke is actually a relatively new innovation. Marks writes: "The Maccabees never saw a potato, much less a potato pancake. When the Spanish first brought the potato to Europe from its native South America, it was considered poisonous and many centuries passed before it gradually gained acceptance as food."

German Jews began making potato pancakes from mashed cooked potatoes, potato flour or grated raw potatoes. Since geese were the source of much of the schmaltz in central and Western Europe, potato pancakes were generally fried in it and were often served with gribenes (cracklings) as an accompaniment to roast goose for Chanukah. Upper-class Germans viewed the potato as "poor man's food."

In 1840, potatoes were planted in large numbers in Ukraine and Poland after a series of crop failures. Potatoes quickly emerged as the staple of the eastern European Jewish diet, providing a cheap way to feed the exploding Jewish population. The humble potato latke eventually gained respectability and became the most widespread eastern European Chanukah pancake, accompanied by braised brisket instead of roast goose. Applesauce became the most popular topping, replacing sour cream, which was forbidden with meat dishes.

Potato pancakes came to America in the mid-19th century along with German immigrants. Recipes appear in both Aunt Babette's (Cincinnati 1889) and the first edition of The Settlement Cookbook (Milwaukee 1901), both written by German Jewish authors.

Crisco vegetable shortening was introduced in 1911, and shortly after, advertised itself for frying "Chanukah latkes." Vegetable oil later became popular and sour cream once again became an acceptable accompaniment.

In the 1950s, packaged potato pancake mix appeared, later followed by commercial frozen latkes. Cooks then began using ingredients in their latkes such as cauliflower, spinach and zucchini, even adding Cajun spices and jalapenos. Miniature latkes, topped with sour cream and caviar, became chic fare at cocktail parties.

Potato latkes, crisp on the outside and tender on the inside, still remain the favorite Ashkenazi Chanukah pancake. Some like their spuds coarsely grated, producing a lattice of crispy, golden brown shreds, some prefer them minced, while others like a combination of the two textures.

Gil Marks not only knows the history and evolvement of latkes, he also knows the secret to success. He writes: "The secret to making crispy potato latkes without absorbing a lot of fat is to fry the batter in enough hot oil or schmaltz (about 1/4 inch), enough so that the latkes glide in the pan."

GIL MARKS' ASHKENAZIC CHEESE PANCAKES (KAESE LATKES/LEVIVOT GEVINAH)

2 cups (16 oz.) farmer cheese, pot cheese, or drained ricotta cheese
4 large eggs
about 3/4 cup all-purpose flour
2 tbsp. sugar or honey
1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
about 1/2 tsp. table salt or 1 tsp. kosher salt vegetable oil or butter for frying

In a large bowl, beat together the cheese, eggs, flour, sugar, vanilla and salt until well combined.

In a large skillet or griddle, heat a thin layer of oil over medium heat.

In batches, drop the batter by heaping tablespoonfuls and fry until the top is set and the bottom is lightly browned, about 3 minutes. Turn and fry until golden, about 2 minutes.

Serve with sour cream, yogurt, maple syrup, jam, cinnamon-sugar or fresh fruit. Makes about 26 3-inch pancakes.

Chanukah fare in the Roman Jewish ghetto

Randy Fingrut
Special the CJN

This past October my husband, Jack, and I enjoyed the trip of a lifetime. We toured Italy and it was glorious. Italy is breathtakingly beautiful. We visited not only the well-known cities of Italy, all so very different from each other, but also more than half a dozen Tuscan medieval hill towns, walled cities perched high on mountains.

I can't tell you how many of my 1,700-plus photos are of bakeries, gelaterias, fruit and vegetable markets, restaurants, cheese, meat, olive oil and wine stores, but there are a lot. We also had the pleasure of being able to attend the International Chocolate Exhibition in Perugia, which, to my joy, started the day we arrived in Perugia.

During our travels, we were quite surprised to learn that almost all of the restaurants in Italy serve Italian food. It may be regional, but it is still classic Italian cuisine. You do not find sushi, souvlaki or spring rolls anywhere.

Our last stop before leaving Italy was the Roman Jewish ghetto, a small, quaint part of Rome. It has a beautiful, stately synagogue, Il Tempio (The Temple), which boasts a wonderful museum of Roman Jewish life.

The ghetto's main street, Via Portico d'Ottavia is still the centre of Jewish culture in Rome. The street has a fascinating area of historical ruins existing beside old Roman-style homes and storefronts. But most notable is the fact that the street is abundant with Jewish restaurants. Oddly, with a few exceptions, the menus of these restaurants look very much like those in every other restaurant in Italy. They serve mostly traditional Italian food, but with cucina ebraica, flavours of the Italian Jewish kitchen.

Italian Jews have always been exceptionally fond of vegetables and have developed countless ways to prepare them. It is said that the Jews brought the artichoke and the eggplant to Italy, much to the dismay of the Christians, who believed them to be the vile food of the Jews. The Roman Jews, using olive oil, which was inexpensive and plentiful, battered all types of vegetables, then fried them in the olive oil, creating wonderful fritti misto. It was a great delicacy to tempt Romans both inside and outside the ghetto.

In Italy, the preferred Chanukah foods are customarily these fried vegetables as well as other fried Roman Jewish treats. There is quite a range of fried foods served at this holiday. Savoury fritters, for example Frittelle Di Patate, potato latkes, are served along with the fritti misto. They are followed by sweet fritters, like Frittelle Di Chanukah, doughnut-like puffs made with fruit and honey, fried pastries such as Cartellate E Pinoli, honey and pine nut pinwheels. Frittelle Di Riso Per Chanukah, Italian rice fritters, are also enjoyed by the Roman Jewish community at Chanukah. Consider featuring some of these tasty Roman treats at your table for a wonderful change this Chanukah.

If you plan to make these delicious treats, start with the pinwheels. Then you can reuse the olive oil for the fritti misto (the fried vegetables) if you wish.

CARTELLATE E PINOLI
HONEY AND PINE NUT PINWHEELS

2 1/2 cups all-purpose flour
1/8 tsp. salt
1/4 cup sugar
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 egg, beaten
1 tbsp. dry sherry, warm
1/2 cup warm water
2/3 cup olive oil, for frying
Topping
1/4 cup honey
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 cup toasted pine nuts

Place the flour in a large bowl. Make a well in the centre and add salt, sugar, olive oil, egg, sherry and water. Mix until it forms a ball. Knead mixture until dough is smooth. Cover with plastic wrap and let it rest for one hour. Roll out the dough to less than 1/4-inch thick and cut into strips about 1 inch wide by 8 inches long.

Pinch one end of the strip and then continue to pinch about every 3/4 inches all the way along. Roll the dough into a circular shape by crimping it together along the strip. Use a toothpick to fasten. Heat olive oil and fry the pinwheels until they turn a deep golden colour. Drain on paper towel and remove toothpick. Place pinwheels on a parchment-covered cookie sheet. Warm honey in the microwave, add the cinnamon and pine nuts. Place a tablespoon of the mixture in the top of each pinwheel. Serve immediately or store in a paper bag.

FRITTELLE DI MELANZANE
EGGPLANT FRITTERS

2 large eggplants
salt
1/4 cup flour
2 eggs, beaten
3 garlic cloves, crushed
1 tbsp. dried parsley or 1/4 cup fresh parley chopped finely
1 tbsp. dried basil or 1/4 cup fresh basil chopped finely
2 cups breadcrumbs
1 cup grated Parmesan cheese
1/4 cup olive oil plus more if needed
1 lemon

Peel and slice the eggplant about 1/2-inch thick, salt both sides and let drain on paper towels for about 30 minutes. Pat excess water out of the eggplant with dry paper towels. Prepare three flat bowls or plates. In the first, place the flour, in the second the eggs, and in the third the remaining dry ingredients mixed well. Dip both sides of each eggplant slice first into the flour, then the egg, then the breadcrumb mixture. Press additional crumbs down onto each eggplant slice making sure they are completely covered.

Heat olive oil in a large frying pan. Cook about four eggplant slices at a time until they turn golden brown on both sides, and are fork tender. Add more oil if necessary with each batch. Drain well on paper towels. Serve hot or cold with a drizzle of lemon juice.

Note: Eggplant slices may be baked on a foil-covered baking sheet. Preheat oven to 350. Drizzle olive oil over foil, making sure all areas are well covered. Place eggplant slices in oil and then turn them over so that both sides have touched the oil. Bake for 30 minutes until golden brown and fork tender.

Lots of latkes

Rivka Tal
Special to the CJN

Chanukah without those crispy fried potato pancakes known as latkes would be like… Purim without hamantaschen –unthinkable!

Fried foods commemorate the Chanukah miracle of the oil that lasted eight days, and the Hasmoneans' victory over the Greeks. And somehow, latkes became the star of the eight-day Chanukah show. Even the sound of the sizzling, bubbling oil – not to mention the smell – evokes memories of holidays gone by and is exciting for the kiddies.

Yes, you can buy ready-made frozen latkes, and some of them aren't bad at all, but making them yourself is a time-honoured tradition worth the effort.

The following important decisions are up to the hostess. Do you want to serve your latkes topped with applesauce alongside the traditional brisket for a meaty meal? Or in line with the Chanukah tradition of serving dairy foods, do you prefer the just-as-traditional sour cream toppings? Maybe a spin of a dreidel can help you decide. Not to worry: Chanukah lasts eight days, so you can have it both ways. And even try some potato alternatives, like zucchini latkes.

Here are some latke tips:

Be sure to use russet, also known as Idaho potatoes. They have lower moisture content than other potatoes and will fry up better.

Grating the onion along with the potatoes helps keep the potato mixture white.

Keep the oil hot. When oil is kept very hot (around 350 degrees F), foods tend to absorb less of the oil. Make sure to adjust the heat to ensure the oil stays hot but does not burn.

Latkes can be browned first in a small amount of oil, and then baked at a high temperature to finish off the cooking process. Baking at around 425 can produce a crispy pancake.

Latkes falling apart? Be sure to squeeze out the excess moisture from the shredded potato mixture very well. Add a bit of flour, if necessary.

POTATO LATKES

2 lb. russet potatoes, peeled
1 large onion
1/4 cup flour
3/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1 egg, lightly beaten
1/3 cup vegetable oil

Shred or grate about half the potatoes using a hand grater or food processor fitted with the medium shredding disc.

As the potatoes are shredded, transfer them a bowl of ice water. Grate the onion and add it to the potatoes. Shred remaining potatoes. Set aside for 5 minutes and then drain the potatoes in a large colander, rinsing under cold water. Squeeze or press out excess water.

Place the potatoes in a large mixing bowl. Stir in flour, salt and pepper. Add the onion and egg; mix well.

In a large, heavy, non-stick skillet, heat 1 tablespoon oil over medium heat. Using a tablespoon, spoon potato mixture into skillet, using about 2 tablespoons per pancake. (Skillet should hold about 4 pancakes at a time.) Flatten mixture slightly with a spatula. Cook the latkes until browned at the edges, about 4 minutes. Then flip and cook another 4 minutes or until golden brown, crisp and cooked through.

Remove latkes from the skillet. Drain on paper towels and then transfer them to a serving platter. Keep warm in a 250-degreee F oven until serving.

Cook remaining pancakes in batches, using 1 tablespoon oil in the skillet for each batch. Makes about 16 latkes.

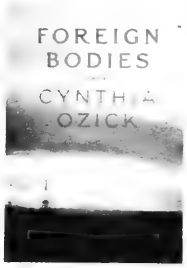
Fiction



Cynthia Ozick's sixth, and possibly her best novel, is modelled after The Ambassadors by her idolized "master" Henry James.

Set in postwar Paris, Foreign Bodies (Houghton Mifflin Harcourt) is a shimmering sea of exquisite sentences that washes over the shore of the reader's consciousness, wave after wave bearing the delightful flotsam of keen allusions, puns, symbols, metaphors and memorable phrases.

At the heart of The Joyful Child by Norman Ravvin (Gaspereau Press) is a charming sketch of a father-son relationship. The joyful child of the title is four-year-old Nick, innocent, playful wide-eyed and curious.

Ravvin's third novel is a subtle, sensitive piece about the ephemeral nature of life and childhood innocence.

David Bezmozgis's Giller-finalist The Free World (Harper Collins) is certain to reinforce his reputation as top-rate writer.

Set in 1978, the novel focuses on three generations of the Krasnansky family, who travel together from Riga to Rome, where they subsist in a bureaucratic purgatory as a panoply of consular officials determine whether their final destination will be Canada, America, Israel or some other country.

Gary Shteyngart's third novel Super Sad True Love Story (Random House) is a dystopian novel of an Orwellian future in which an almost-totalitarian America is ruled by one party, the Bipartisans. Shteyngart's writing is highly satiric and explodes with energy and inventiveness. He can well be compared with Nabokov for his wordplay, Huxley for his vision and Woody Allen for the humour.

In The Dovekeepers (Simon & Schuster), author Alice Hoffman deftly remasters and retells the iconic story of Masada from the viewpoint of four ficticious women.

The author of Here on Earth, an Oprah's Book Club selection, covers a period of four years around 70 CE as the Romans sack Jerusalem and wage war against 900 Jewish rebels and their families in Masada.

Sherlock Holmes returns in Anthony Horowitz's The House of Silk (Mulholland Books), the first book officially sanctioned by the Conan Doyle Estate.

In this exciting page-turner, Holmes and Watson chase criminals through London's seedy back streets and opium dens and discover a secret group that includes the highest levels of government.

In 16th-century Venice, Hannah Levi, a midwife, is awakened from sleep in her small home in the Jewish Ghetto by a Christian man who wants her to assist in his wife's difficult delivery. This is forbidden by her rabbi and by a Papal Edict.

She agrees to do it in exchange for enough money to rescue her husband from slavery in Malta. The Midwife of Venice (Anchor Canada), Roberta Rich's debut novel, is simply outstanding.

Book straddles the line between truth and fiction

Fourteen centuries after the release of His last game-changing, The Qur'an, God returns with his latest tell-all, The Last Testament: A Memoir by God (Simon & Schuster).

Such is the premise behind co-author David Javerbaum's funny but highly irreverent and blasphemous book that mocks all three major faiths.

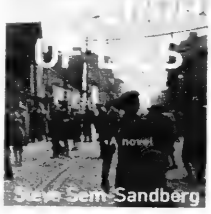
The Emperor of Lies, (Anansi) by Swedish author Steve Sem-Sendberg manages to straddle the line between fiction and non-fiction.

The Emperor of Lies is about Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski, the real-life 63-year-old Jewish businessman and orphanage director, who ruled over the Lodz Ghetto like a king. Was he an opportunist or a pragmatic strategist who managed to save Jewish lives?



Non-fiction

Kenneth Slawenski's J.D.Salinger: A Life (Random House), published just a year after Salinger's death at 91, is an impressive, balanced and masterful literary biography of one of America's most famous — and famously reclusive — authors.

For Salinger fans, J.D. Salinger: A Life is an illuminating account that fills in a great many mysteries about a writer who has earned the worshipful reverence of legions of fans.

In An Exclusive Love: A Memoir (Knopf Canada) author Johanna Adorjan imagines the last day of her Holocaust surviving grandparents' lives, from the moment they wake up to their final minutes together holding hands as they commit suicide at night.

In the hands of another writer, this memoir could have been mushy and overly sentimental. But Adorjan sensibly avoids that trap and it reads like an ode to her beloved grandparents.

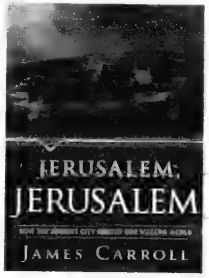
In Jerusalem, Jerusalem: How the Ancient City Ignited Our Modern World (Houghton Mifflin Harcourt), James Carroll attempts to show how Israel's capital city has been the fulcrum of most major events in world history, from ancient times to 9-11.



As a concise history of the western world, describing the dichotomy between the actual city and the apocalyptic fantasy it has inspired, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, makes for fascinating and thought-provoking reading.

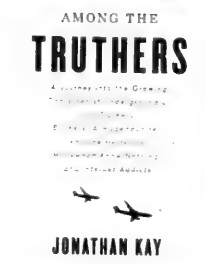
Jews control the world. Israel harvests the internal organs of murdered Palestinians. Barack was born outside the United States. The Mossad warned Jews to stay away from New York City on 9-11.



As crazy as these claims sound, they are treated as the gospel truth by the tenacious and self-assured band of conspiracy theorists explored in In Among The Truthers (Harper Collins) by Toronto journalist Jonathan Kay.

New look at Anne Frank family

Hank Greenberg

MARK KURLANSKY

Hank Greenberg's decision to sit out a baseball game because it fell on Yom Kippur endeared him to Jewish fans and defined him for the rest of his career.

But ironically as Mark Kurlansky points out in his first-rate biography Hank Greenberg: The Hero Who Didn't Want to Be One (Yale University Press), this was possibly the only time in his adult life he actually observed Yom Kippur.

Treasures from the Attic by Mirjam Pressler (Doubleday) is an important addition to the canon of Anne Frank literature.

Based on a treasure-trove of letters and documents found in an attic belonging to Anne's aunt, Helene Elias (Otto Frank's sister), this moving and heart-warming book is an insightful look at the Frank family before, during and after the war.

The Garden of Beasts: Love, Terror, and an American Family in Hitler's Berlin (Crown) is author Erik Larson's gripping and remarkably full account of William E. Dodd's (America's ambassador to Berlin in 1933) time in Hitler's Third Reich.

It is a chilling book that reveals the dark soul of not just one but a whole nation of psychopathic killers whose demonic rampage would leave Europe and Russia strewn with millions of dead.

Maus, one of the best-known books addressing the Holocaust, has received a new and intriguing treatment from its author.

Presented alongside a dazzling collection of illustrations, MetaMaus (Pantheon) is a weighty and lavishly produced volume built around substantial interviews Maus author Art Spiegelman gave to Chicago-based academic Hillary Chute between 2006 and 2010.

In The Arrogant Years: One Girls' Search for Her Lost youth from Cairo to Brooklyn (Ecco), Lucette Lagnado pens a parallel memoir to her award-winning 2008 book The Man with the Sharkskin Suit.

While that book focused on her father, this one highlights her mother, Edith, as well as the author's own difficult adolescence in her new country.

The role of Jewish Americans in the U.S. Civil War is laid out in considerable detail in Jews and the Civil War (New York University Press), an eclectic collection of essays edited by Jonathan D. Sarna and Adam Mendelsohn.

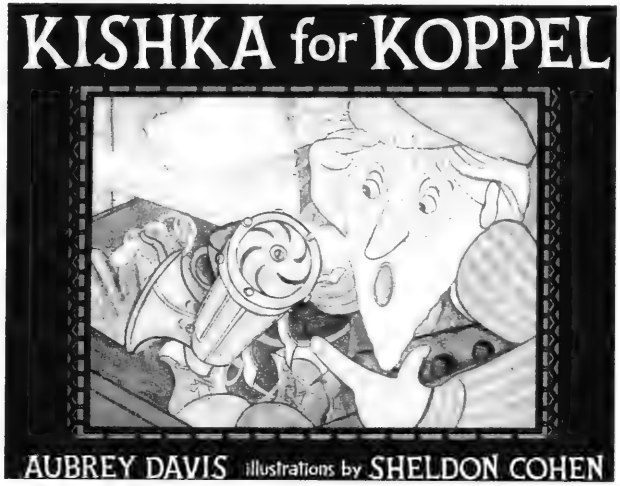
Books for children



Mordechai Ben-Dat
Editor

I Go to the Dentist is a positive, upbeat tale of a visit to the dentist by two young children and their mother. The mother and her young son watch smilingly as the little girl sits in the dentist's chair.

Told in playful rhyme, reminiscent of a kindergarten nursery tale, I Go to the Dentist is the most recent offering of the seven-piece set in the Toddler Experience series by Hachai Publishing, based in Brooklyn, N.Y.

Written and illustrated by Rikki Benenfeld, the book is a light and delightful text colourfully illustrated on each page. In keeping with Hachai Publishing's mission, the story comes with a theological message that buttresses the story's cheerful message.

Kishka for Koppel (Orca Book Publishers) is a heartwarming tale of magic and unbelievable events in the lives of a poor husband and wife, Koppel and Yetta.

Koppel is a junk collector who works hard, struggles to make a living and loves his wife very much. They live in a simple home. And it is obvious that their lives are not easy.

But Koppel and Yetta's lives change forever when Koppel brings home a magic meat grinder. Imagine! A meat grinder that has such fantastic powers and spellbinding abilities that it can change the world.

And it does change Koppel and Yetta's world. The old married couple has a wild adventure as they cope with the magic of the meat grinder and the consequences of their wishes.

Aubrey Davis has written a clever, playful story for young children loaded with wondrous surprises, happiness, a bit of heartbreak, a lot of kishka and a great deal of special meaning.

Sheldon Cohen's illustrations are full-bodied, richly coloured and add extra nuance to Davis' words. Young readers will be delighted with the story.

Iran pressures Hamas not to leave Syria

Avi Issacharoff and Amos Harel
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran has applied intense pressure to Hamas in an effort to persuade it not to leave Damascus, threatening even to cut off funds to the organization if it did so, Palestinian sources have told Ha'aretz.

The Iranian pressure also included an unprecedented ultimatum – namely, an explicit threat to stop supplying Hamas with arms and suspend the training of its military activists.

According to the sources, Hamas is abandoning its headquarters in Syria and looking at other Arab states as an alternative location for its political command centre. Hamas' move comes despite intense Iranian pressure on the organization to refrain from relocating.

A Syrian opposition spokesman said recently that once Assad is toppled, his successors have no intention of preserving the strategic alliance between Damascus, Tehran and Hezbollah.

According to the Palestinian sources, only "second and third-ranking" Hamas activists are leaving Damascus, while senior members of the organization's political wing, headed by Khaled Meshal, are remaining in the Syrian capital.

The Hamas activists on the move, the sources say, are those responsible for the activities and funding of the organization's military wing, as well as some members of the political leadership. Most have left together with their families to a number of destinations, including Gaza, Sudan, Qatar and Lebanon.

The Palestinian sources have defined the relocation activities as a hasty abandonment of Syrian President Bashar Assad, who until recently was Hamas' strongest ally in the Arab world.

Efforts on the part of the Syrian and Iranian regimes to ascertain whether Hamas is indeed fleeing Damascus have been met with denials from the organization's leadership.

"Hamas has not made any new decision, and there has certainly not been a decision to leave Syria," a member of Hamas' political bureau, Salah Al-Arouri, told Ha'aretz, adding that if a family or two had left Syria, they had probably done so for personal reasons.

"The organization's top officials are here in Damascus. Our relations with the state and Syrian people are excellent," Al-Arouri said. "We respect all Syrians whomever they are. We have no intention of interfering in Syria's internal affairs."

Nevertheless, in recent days, a number of Hamas officials, particularly among the leadership in Gaza, have called explicitly for the organization to distance itself from Damascus in light of the ongoing violence and bloodshed in Syria and the severe harm suffered by the country's civilians.

Khaled Meshal

Ha'aretz has learned that Hamas has made a decision to abandon Damascus without letting the Syrian authorities know. The decision was made by the organization's senior leadership in the wake of the harsh criticism voiced against top Hamas officials in Gaza and abroad because of their ties with the Syrian regime.

This criticism, coupled with the ongoing violent suppression of the demonstrations in Syria and the reported killing there of more than 4,000 people, intensified the dilemma facing the Hamas leadership – to continue to stand by its Syrian patron, or to abandon the Syrian capital and thus make it clear that Hamas, considered a part of the Muslim Brotherhood, is distancing itself from Assad.

The Arab League's decision to suspend Syria from membership of the organization and impose economic sanctions on Damascus tipped the scales, with Hamas finally deciding to covertly evacuate all its activists from Syria and leave behind only the organization's highest-ranking officials so as to preserve a low profile of activity there. Among the Hamas officials who are still coming and going from Damascus are Mousa Abu Marzouq (Meshal's deputy), Izzat al-Rishq, Al-Arouri and Meshal himself.

Meanwhile, on Sunday, Syrian television aired pictures from a military exercise conducted last Saturday in the eastern part of the country. During the military drill, Syrian armed forces launched a Scud B missile, with a range of some 300 kilometres. The broadcast also included pictures of the firing of rockets with ranges of 150 to 200 kilometres.

It appears the Syrians were looking to show the international community that Assad still has the ability to set the Middle East alight if he so chooses, particularly if the international community intervenes militarily.

British lawmaker questions Jewish ambassador's 'loyalty'

JTA

LONDON — A British lawmaker came under fire for suggesting the country's Jewish ambassador to Israel is biased because of his religion.

Paul Flynn, a Labour party parliamentarian, claimed, two weeks ago, that Britain's ambassador to Israel, Matthew Gould, "was serving the interests of the Israeli government," the Associated Press reported.

"I do not normally fall for conspiracy theories, but the ambassador has proclaimed himself to be a Zionist and he has previously served in Iran, in the service," said Flynn, who has served in the House of Commons since 1987 and represents the Welsh district of Newport West.

Challenged to defend his comments by Britian's leading Jewish newspaper, the Jewish Chronicle, Flynn said that the ambassador to Israel should be "someone with roots in the U.K. [who] can't be accused of having Jewish loyalty."

Flynn's comments were widely condemned by British officials, including the Foreign Office and parliamentarians from across the political spectrum, the Jewish Chronicle reported.

Flynn denied the comments were antisemitic.

War against Iran's nukes has already begun

Yossi Melman
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

The war is underway, though no one declared it and no one will confirm it. It's the secret war against Iran's nuclear project. It did not start this week or last month. It has been going on for years, but only faint echoes have reached the public.

In June 2010, the press reported that the computer system operating the uranium enrichment centrifuges at Natanz had been infected with a virus. A deadly worm, known as Stuxnet, had infiltrated the controllers, manufactured by Siemens.

Three weeks ago, a huge blast ripped through a Revolutionary Guards' military base 40 kilometres west of Tehran. The explosion could be heard as far away as the capital. Dozens of people were killed, including the head of Iran's missile development project, Gen. Hassan Tehrani Moqaddam. Tehran still attributes the explosion to accident.

Last week, there was a powerful explosion in Isfahan, Iran's third-largest city, which has a uranium conversion plant on its outskirts. It is not yet clear what was damaged in the blast.

In a report on Monday in the New York Times, American and Israeli intelligence officials said the explosion caused a major setback to Iran's long-range missile program and completely destroyed the base.

According to the report, satellite photos taken after the blast show that the base was almost completely destroyed, which amounts to a serious setback to Tehran's missile development.

A top Israeli security official said the explosion could delay or stop further Iranian surface-to-surface missile development, but warned that it was far from halting all of Iran's military options.

Iran has vehemently denied that the blast was carried out by Israel or the United States, and western intelligence and defence officials say the consequences – the setback of Iran's military program – are more important than the cause.

"Anything that buys us time and delays the day when the Iranians might be able to mount a nuclear weapon on an accurate missile is a small victory," one western intelligence official told the New York Times. "At this point, we'll take whatever we can get, however it happens."

The officials said surveillance photos showed that the Iranian base was a central testing area for advanced solid-fuel missiles, which are better equipped than older, liquid-fuel designs to carry warheads long distances.

These incidents involved three key elements of Iran's nuclear program. The first is uranium conversion (which comes after the mineral has been mined), the second is enrichment, and the third is the delivery means.

Coupled with other incidents, including the assassination of several Iranian nuclear scientists, these events have worried the ayatollahs' regime, causing reactions ranging from embarrassment to anger. The public response usually follows a pattern: first a sweeping denial, then a limp and stuttering admission that "something happened," and finally the claim that it was an "accident." This shows that the regime does not know exactly what to say, and that its voice is not uniform. It also reflects the fierce dispute within the regime's top ranks. The leadership is divided, and the reactions come from a range of ministries, rival organizations and competing media outlets.

The kind of sabotage used in Iran requires sophistication, financial and technological resources, agents and precise intelligence. Someone, for example, had to know that Moqaddam would be at the base that day to supervise a test, apparently of a new missile engine.

Infecting the computers required access to them: a person with a flash drive had to have plugged it into the system. The prevailing assumption is that foreign intelligence agencies are initiating, managing and executing the secret operations.

The Iranians and international media outlets believe these operations are the work of Israel's Mossad, and possibly also a western partner such as the CIA or Britain's MI6.

Former Mossad director Meir Dagan

The Mossad's campaign to assassinate the Black September members behind the 1972 Munich Olympics massacre was codenamed "Wrath of God." Last week, when asked whether God had carried out the recent operations in Iran, former Mossad head Meir Dagan smilingly said yes. Dagan is known to be an ardent supporter of secret operations, as he told Yediot Achronot explicitly this week. He believes it will be at least two years before Iran can assemble a functioning nuclear weapon. This assessment may be based on past secret operations and on Dagan's faith that future actions can indeed disrupt Iran's progress.

A senior American official went even further. President Barack Obama's special assistant and co-ordinator for arms control and weapons of mass destruction, proliferation and terrorism, Gary Samore, said in May 2011, "I'm glad to hear they are having troubles with their centrifuge machines, and the U.S. and its allies are doing everything we can to make it more complicated." Do we need any clearer statement that humans are behind the "hand of God"?

Even if the Mossad or the CIA are not involved in these incidents, the speculation that they are serves western intelligence bodies by enhancing their image as "omnipotent," and heightening the Iranian leadership's fear. This is known as psychological warfare.

Still, with all due respect for western intelligence's great efforts – including what is probably unprecedented operational co-ordination – it is unlikely these operations could have succeeded without inside support, meaning from individuals or groups ready to help sabotage the ayatollahs' regime. It should be remembered that Iran is a mosaic of ethnic minorities, almost all have reasons for disliking the regime, and some have their own underground, armed militias.

The theory about inside help gains traction given that, in addition to the military targets, other sites – including oil facilities, gas pipelines, trains and military bases – were also damaged over the past year. Last year, there was a considerable increase, of at least 10 per cent, in "breakdowns" and "accidents" at Iran's strategic infrastructure sites. Some were caused by poor maintenance, due in part to the international sanctions, but the volume of these incidents may also indicate the "hand of God" was involved. If this is the case, then it's possible that internal Iranian opposition groups (as opposed to exiles) are stronger and even better organized than generally thought.

It is almost certain that Tehran's patience is about to run out. This was seen in the student mob's attack against the British Embassy last week. This was not spontaneous rage: it was a warning from a regime that realizes someone has declared war on it without leaving marks or fingerprints.

Sooner or later, the ayatollahs' regime will decide to react and will order its secret intelligence and operational units to retaliate. If and when this happens, Iran will take steps to conceal its involvement in such activities. However, past experience proves that despite the caution and sophistication of the Iranian secret services, they have often failed in obscuring their fingerprints.

Israel pulls ads

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is cancelling an ad campaign aimed at luring Israeli expatriates home that some American Jews found offensive. The ads, produced by Israel's Ministry of Immigrant Absorption, attempt to convey the message that the children and families of Israeli expats will not have Israeli identities if they stay in the Diaspora. The Jewish Federations of North America called the ads "insulting," and the head of the Anti-Defamation League said they were "demeaning." "The Ministry of Immigrant Absorption's campaign clearly did not take into account American Jewish sensibilities, and we regret any offence it caused," Michael Oren, Israel's ambassador to the United States, said in a statement.

Israel releases funds

Israel released tax money that it held from the Palestinian Authority after Germany said it was a condition for purchasing a submarine, according to a German newspaper. Germany told Israel it would not complete the sale of a sixth Dolphin submarine to Israel unless it made the concession, Welt am Sonntag reported Sunday. The sale was approved Nov. 30, the same day that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he would release the $100 million in tax revenue collected by Israel for the PA. Israel has three of the Dolphins, worth about $500 million each, with another two on order and awaiting delivery by 2013. The German government is discounting the new submarine by about one-third of its cost. Israel's Dolphins are widely assumed to carry nuclear cruise missiles, a capability that Jerusalem neither denies nor confirms.

Shalit went on hunger strike

Former captive Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit launched a hunger strike that put his life in danger shortly before his release.

The hunger strike is what led in part to Hamas agreeing to an exchange, as the terror group feared Shalit would die and it would lose its main bargaining chip, Yediot Achronot reported Sunday. The daily Israeli newspaper cited an intelligence report on Shalit. According to the report, shrapnel fired during the kidnapping entered Shalit's body, barely missing vital organs, and the wounds eventually healed. The report also said that Iran and Hamas gave misleading information to Israeli intelligence on Shalit's whereabouts, hoping that an Israeli rescue force would enter a booby-trapped house in northern Gaza. Shalit reportedly was guarded by the same four Hamas members throughout his captivity. Meanwhile, Shalit's grandfather met Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Dec. 1 to update him on Shalit's rehabilitation and said he has recovered from the physical ordeal of his captivity. "Gilad has put on weight. He really is back to normal," Netanyahu's office quoted Tzvi Shalit as telling the prime minister.

Settlements an impediment to peace

Harry Schachter

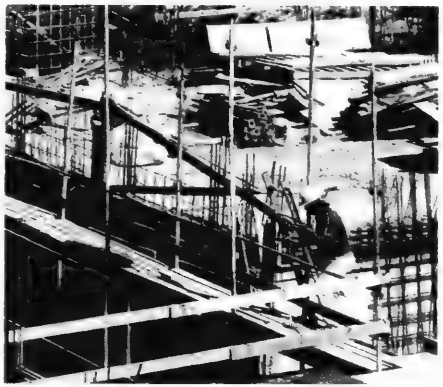
Opinion

As has been the case so often in recent years, we have reached a discouraging impasse between Israel and the Palestinians and in any movement toward a peace agreement. The controversial Palestinian application for admission as a state to the United Nations has stalled, but so has any momentum toward meaningful negotiations.

What hasn't stalled, regrettably, is violence in the West Bank. This month the United Nations issued an update on Israeli settler violence in the West Bank, and the information that report provides is disturbing. The weekly average of settler attacks that resulted in Palestinian casualties and property damage has gone up by 40 per cent in 2011 compared to 2010, and by more than 165 per cent since 2009. Nearly 10,000 Palestinian-owned trees, mainly olive trees, have been damaged or destroyed by Israeli settlers. So far this year, three Palestinians have been killed and 167 injured by Israeli settlers. One Palestinian was killed and another 101 injured by Israeli soldiers during clashes between Israeli settlers and Palestinians.

It must be said that at the same time, there has also been violence by Palestinians against Israelis. Eight Israeli settlers have been killed and 30 others injured by Palestinians this year, according to UN figures. It is a dispiriting and deadly cycle of violence.

About 500,000 Israelis live in the settlements in the West Bank and east Jerusalem, and they remain central to the difficulties underlying any possible peace negotiations. The Palestinians have demanded a freeze on settlement construction and expansion before they will sit down to negotiations, and they are backed in this call by the United States and others. Israel has occasionally slowed down construction or offered partial freezes. But construction continues. Most recently, Israeli authorities approved plans to build more than 1,300 new homes on the Gilo Slopes in east Jerusalem, creating more of a barrier between the West Bank and Arab east Jerusalem, and making it that much harder to create a Palestinian state with east Jerusalem as its capital. According to Israeli-American author and journalist Gershom Gorenberg, who recently visited Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal on a book tour, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu could have blocked the Gilo plan but chose not to. "Instead," writes Gorenberg, "he showed his compulsive commitment to settlement building."



A construction site in Gilo, a neighbourhood in southern Jerusalem, that is considered to be a settlement because it is outside the borders of Israel on June 4, 1967.

The organization that I belong to, JSpaceCanada, sees the expansion of settlements as a serious obstacle to peace. This is far from a radical view.

The Harper government speaks strongly in support of Israel, but the official position of the government of Canada remains that Israeli settlements in the occupied territories are a violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention and constitute a serious obstacle to achieving a comprehensive, just and lasting peace.

Over the years, all the significant negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians – at Camp David and Taba, and more recently between former prime minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas – have laid out proposals that in various ways swap land, incorporate some existing settlements into Israel, but require other settlements to be dismantled. That's not going to change. Every serious scenario for a peace deal sees at least a quarter of the settlers in the West Bank having to return to Israel proper. Meanwhile, the continuing construction in the West Bank and east Jerusalem establishes more and more "facts on the ground" that in the judgment of leaders such as former president Bill Clinton make a final resolution more difficult and the eventual uprooting of settlements more disruptive. That's over and above the ongoing violence and tension in the West Bank from extremist settlers.

An end to the cycle of violence in the occupied territories can only come with a peace agreement. It's our view that it would be entirely reasonable for Israel to freeze construction in order to enter meaningful peace negotiations. Unfortunately, this is not likely to happen given the current state of politics in Israel, where Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman recently threatened to bring down the Netanyahu government if it goes ahead with the demolition of two West Bank outposts, as ordered by the Supreme Court. But as Ehud Olmert wrote in an important New York Times op-ed article recently, "The time for true leadership has come."

Some argue that the combination of Israeli intransigence on one side, and Palestinian rejectionism and disunity on the other, means that the peace process is dead and a two-state solution can never be achieved. The push by the Palestinians for statehood at the UN and their admission to UNESCO are signs, in this view, of a new diplomatic and symbolic strategy that is at least in part a shift by the Palestinians away from the peace process. But it would surely be a mistake to give up. The negotiations between Olmert and Abbas in 2008 seemed to come very close, and we continue to believe that a negotiated settlement that results in two states for two peoples living in peace and security is the best, indeed the only way, forward for Israel and the Palestinians.

JSpaceCanada is a progressive Zionist organization. It supports a negotiated settlement that results in two states for two peoples living in peace. It opposes all attempts to delegitimize Israel through sanctions, boycotts or divestments. It is also opposed to the expansion of settlements because they are a serious obstacle to peace and, ultimately, counter-productive to Israel's security.

Harry Schachter is a former television news producer and a member of the JSpaceCanada co-ordinating committee.

Israeli MK lauds McCarthy

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Israeli lawmaker who sponsored a bill to limit funding to left-leaning NGOs said American Joseph McCarthy was absolutely right.

Likud lawmaker Ofir Akunis told a political television show Sunday night that McCarthy, who presided over a committee that investigated Americans suspected of sympathy with the Communists in the 1950s, "was right in every word. The fact is, they were Soviet agents."

Akunis' bill would ban political organizations in Israel from receiving donations of more than approximately $5,500 (US) from foreign governments and international organizations. Its progress is currently frozen in the Knesset at the request of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Akunis later told the Israeli daily Ha'aretz that he does not support McCarthyism, under which people were accused without sufficient evidence, and said he meant that McCarthy was right about Soviet agents infiltrating the United States.

Over the weekend, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton criticized the state of Israeli democracy, referring in particular to Akunis' bill.

Iron Dome protects Israel, but at what cost?

Ido Efrati
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Thursday, April 7, 2011, will be etched forever in the memories of engineers at Rafael Advanced Defense Systems. That evening Iron Dome successfully withstood its first challenge by intercepting eight of nine Grad rockets fired at Ashkelon from the Gaza Strip. For a moment, anxiety gave way to national pride.

Still, this was just one milestone in Israel's arming itself against rocket attacks. By 2015, defending Israel's sky will be the world's costliest for its size. This dubious distinction is a result of political and security realities that the country faces, but also stems from a series of strategic decisions with far-reaching economic implications.

Israel faces continued firing from Gaza, from Hezbollah arming itself with long-range rockets, and a threat from Iran. The cost of developing defences and integrating them into the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) is estimated at upward of 20 billion shekels ($5.3 billion US), with the United States footing half the bill.

The defensive umbrella over Israel is composed of four levels: Iron Dome, aimed at short-range threats of four to 70 kilometres; Magic Wand – also called David's Sling – currently under development, intended for a range of 70 to 250 kilometres; the Arrow 2 missile defence system – in operational use and deployed in two batteries – addressing threats from a distance of 600 to 1,000 kilometres; and the Arrow 3 system – also under development – for interception of longer-range ballistic missiles. In addition, Patriot missile batteries have been deployed in Israel since the 1990s.

Nearly $1 billion ($266 million US) has already been invested in developing Iron Dome and deploying its two operational batteries. A special U.S. grant of $205 million was recently awarded for the procurement of four additional batteries. Ultimately, the system will include as many as 13 batteries and the project's total cost will exceed $1 billion (all figures US).

Another 10 billion shekels ($2.66 billion) are being invested in the Arrow 2 project, with continued U.S. support. U.S. investment in Israel's defence systems has risen steadily, from $35 million in the mid-1990s to $200 million annually in recent years. This is in addition to roughly $100 million from the U.S. Defence Department budget.

All this is meant to provide Israel with a missile defence system ready for action. But if Israel needs to make intensive use of these capabilities, the cost of defending its skies will grow much larger – and not just because of the need to replace every missile launched. The cost of a missile ranges from $70,000 for Iron Dome to between $700,000 and $1 million for Magic Wand, and up to between $2.5 million and $3 million for each Arrow 2 missile.

To avoid bankruptcy in the next war, Israel can't ignore economic considerations.

Iron Dome launches a $70,000 missile against every $200 Qassam fired. This celestial confrontation between cutting-edge technology and a primitive pipe was preceded by hundreds of millions of dollars, invested in development and operational implementation.

"These systems are constantly being developed against the changing threats," said Arie Herzog, head of the Defence Ministry's Homa Missile Defense Agency. "For one thing, human life is most important and doesn't have a price," said Herzog. "The basic economic equation is wrong: the cost of the missile should be compared with the cost of direct and indirect damage that would occur if it reached its target. From this viewpoint, it is economically logical."

However, since 2007, when Israel decided to equip itself with the Iron Dome system, there has been controversy over investing billions in protecting Israel's skies

"No system can provide full protection, not Iron Dome, Magic Wand or any other alternative," said Yiftah Shapir, a senior research fellow at Tel Aviv University's Institute for National Security Studies. "If rockets are shot, some will reach their targets. If you look at it in a military or economic context, you'll see it isn't logical to spend a penny on a system like this, but from a political vantage point the money isn't wasted."

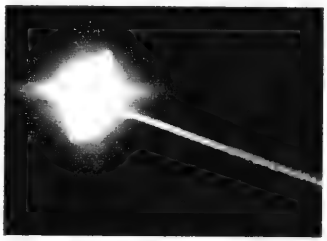
"The damage from each rocket isn't great," Shapir claimed. "In Sderot, for instance, the physical damage doesn't match the disruption of life and the impact on daily routine. We aren't talking just about Sderot anymore, however, but about larger cities like Be'er Sheva and Ashkelon, and even Rishon Letzion. In this sense a defensive system won't do anything."

"To protect Be'er Sheva alone, you need to deploy dozens of batteries and, still, life will be disrupted," claimed Shapir. "The Grad rocket is cheap and simple, and therefore easy to make and launch on a large scale."

Former security officials counter that the acquisition of defence systems is mainly to provide the political echelon with room to manoeuvre. It can mean the difference between being dragged into an expensive war and the possibility of minimizing damage, exercising restraint or reacting in various other ways.

Uzi Rubin, one of the developers of the Arrow program, said Israel's enemies have no fewer than 13,000 warheads capable of hitting the coastal cities, including 1,500 that can target Tel Aviv. He claimed the IDF has never completely come to terms with the need to defend against rocket attacks.

Brig.-Gen. (res.) Tzvi Shor, a former financial adviser to the chief of staff and head of the Defence Ministry's budget division, is president of the Magen Laoref (Home-front Shield) non-profit organization. He insists it will be impossible to implement the multi-level defence system in a regional war from an economic viewpoint, as long as it's just based on missiles against missiles. If Israel tries to intercept every projectile launched in its direction, it will collapse economically, according to his calculations.



A rocket from the Iron Dome system is tested in southern Israel.

Supporters of the defence system counter by saying defensive zones will be predefined and missiles will be fired selectively, depending on where the incoming weapon is headed. So even if Israel is bombarded with 1,000 rockets a day, the system will launch intercepting missiles at a fraction of these.

But the defence establishment still estimates it will cost tens of millions of dollars a day, but even the defence establishment agrees economic considerations will need to be taken into account in the next war.

Oded Amichai, an expert on laser systems who has worked at Rafael, founded Magen Laoref in 2008. One of the organization's goals is to promote the introduction of laser missile intercepting systems into the multi-level defence formation, alongside Iron Dome.

Laser systems appear to be a cost-effective solution compared with other systems. In a letter sent by Magen Laoref in July to the prime minister and to heads of the defence establishment, the organization claimed the cost of destroying a threat using the U.S. Skyguard laser system would be just $2,000 to $3,000. It claimed that eight laser systems stationed around the Gaza Strip with a $500-million investment would provide surrounding communities with blanket protection.

Laser defence development began with the United States and Israel signing a co-operative agreement in 1996 following sustained attacks on Kiryat Shmona by volleys of Katyushas. Northrop Grumman led the Nautilus project, which involved Israel Aircraft Industries, Rafael, Elbit Systems and Tadiran Electronic Systems as subcontractors.

The idea was to produce an operations system to intercept – at the speed of light – every Katyusha fired from Lebanon at communities in the Galilee. Israel and the United States invested about $400 million in the initiative. Between 2001 and 2004, there were 46 trials for shooting down various sorts of rockets and mortar shells in White Sands, N. M. The trials registered complete success.

"The range was up to five kilometres, and Nautilus worked right from the outset," said Yossi Arazi, who served until 2007 as Northrop Grumman's representative in Israel. "The Americans received money to plan the next step, an improved system with a 10-kilometre range with an airborne version, on the basis of this system."

In 2004, before trials were performed on the Skyguard system, the defence establishment decided to quit the project and stop funding its development. Following this, the Americans decided to freeze the project and wait for the maturation of a new laser technology based on crystals known as solid-state laser, which was hailed as the weapon of the future. Solid-state laser is in its formative development stages and faces as yet unsolved physical challenges.

Local leaders from the communities surrounding Gaza began to push for laser systems when they realized that Iron Dome wouldn't protect them against shelling.

"For the communities around Gaza who are without a solution, it's like being a bedridden patient while two doctors argue over a cure," said Alon Shuster, head of the Sha'ar Hanegev Regional Council. "I'm not saying that there aren't special interests, but I don't think that a passion for lying or any conspiracy is what motivates this system… The Rafael people received permission from the rabbis to work around the clock. But the bottom line is that it doesn't protect us."

Israel invested 1.5 billion shekels ($399 million) so far in passive protection for communities around Gaza. According to Rubin, it would be cheaper to invest in missiles instead of laser until solid-state laser technology is developed. He said there are several considerations to take into account: "One is using Israeli technology. We have already been developing anti-missile missiles for 20 years, since the Arrow, and are the world leaders. Laser is a foreign technology, and even when Israel was a partner, we were left on the sidelines and not given access to the core information… Another consideration is export potential. There are many IDF weapons systems funded by the profits of our companies from exports."

Meanwhile, expenses for protecting the home front, through both passive and active means, continue rising. Everyone hopes we won't need these defensive systems. But if they need to stand the test of a regional war, then Israel will have its answer for how effective they are in relation to their cost. A senior official in the defence industry said, "Israeli systems are advanced and at the cutting edge of technology, but I have no doubt that, in case of war, the defence establishment is counting on U.S. assistance for additional missile systems."

The game is afoot once again

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

By his own admission, the author of the best-selling series of Alex Rider young adult books has a hard time saying no to new projects.

So when the Conan Doyle Estate approached Anthony Horowitz to write the first officially sanctioned addition to the Sherlock Holmes canon, the London-based author jumped at the chance.

"I knew I'd be interested, I'd read all of his books when I was 16 or 17," Horowitz said during a recent Toronto visit. The only condition he asked for was to have complete control over the project.

"I didn't want to show them my notes, I didn't want to tell them the story, I didn't want them to read the manuscripts," he said. "I just wanted to do it on my own. I had to write what I wanted to write, not what other people want me to write."

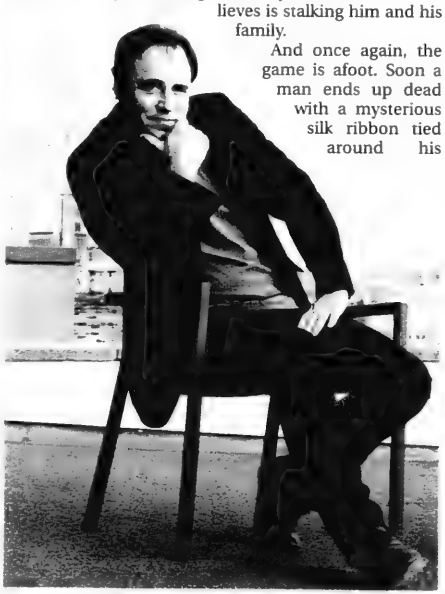
Four months after accepting the project, Horowitz completed The House Of Silk: A Sherlock Holmes Novel (Mulholland Books), and when he finally did meet some members of the Conan Doyle Estate, they were pleased with the final product. "They've been universally positive and happy with the work that I've done."

The premise behind The House of Silk is that Holmes' loyal friend and longtime chronicler, Dr. Watson, is an old man looking back at his long career with Holmes, now dead. He feels that before he dies, he has to finally write the story he kept secret all these years, a story so shocking that it would tear apart the entire fabric of society if it were published. After he writes it, he seals the package and gives instructions that the manuscript cannot be published for another 100 years.

"[That's why] this book hasn't been seen for a hundred years, because there's something that Watson wanted to hide, [but] he's compelled to write it to finish the collection," Horowitz said. "I really liked the idea of Watson being old, looking back."

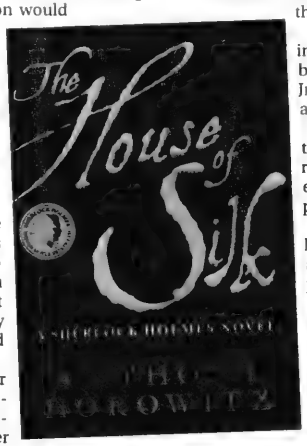
The House of Silk blends two separate but ultimately intertwined stories. It begins innocently when an art dealer visits Holmes at his 221B Baker Street home asking for his help in dealing with a mysterious man he believes is stalking him and his family.

And once again, the game is afoot. Soon a man ends up dead with a mysterious silk ribbon tied around his arm, and the detective finds himself drawn into a complicated web that involves a top secret cabal of people at the highest levels of society.



Anthony Horowitz

"As soon as I was approached, I had a lot of ideas – things that seemed obvious to me from the start," Horowitz said. "This had to be a dark story, had to be something with a scandal and something Watson would not want to write about."



Horowitz drew on a real historical incident to form the basis of the plot of The House of Silk. "It's based on a true scandal that took place in 1891, and I often thought there was an interesting story there to write. And then when this was offered to me, I remembered that."

Horowitz said he didn't want to improve on Conan Doyle's books or give them his own take. "The challenge was to give it a modern sensibility, that is to say, it must be a fast page turner with surprises and twists and turns, whilst remaining true to the 19th-century language, idiom and atmosphere and structure of the books."

Several familiar characters appear in The House of Silk, in addition to Holmes and Watson. Avid readers will recognize Mrs. Hudson, Sherlock's brother Mycroft, the unimaginative Inspector Lestrade and a brief cameo by Holmes' archenemy Prof. James Moriarty.

"I couldn't resist having him there," Horowitz said, even though Moriarty only appears in a handful of the original stories. "I thought about having him as the main villain, but decided against it. So I gave him a cameo, and what I tend to do with the minor, or lesser characters was to be a little surprising with all of them."

In The House of Silk, Lestrade is surprisingly loyal to Holmes, and we see a different side of Moriarty as well.

Horowitz said the challenge was to remain true to the feel of the original Sherlock Holmes.

"Sherlock Holmes means a great deal to an awful lot of people and has a very special place in their heart, and I didn't want to offend anyone," he said. "It was quite a challenge to write something fresh, that was new and exciting and, at the same time, play it absolutely true to the original."

This book remains closer to the original feel than, say, the recent movie Sherlock Holmes.

"There's no Sherlock Holmes jumping off a stampeding horse onto the back of a carriage à la Robert Downey Jr.," he said, although he does include an exciting horse carriage chase.

Horowitz wanted his Holmes to be the "pure Sherlock," the sedentary, cerebral character. "It's a book for modern audiences, and it's also a book for purists."

Horowitz, whose Alex Rider series has sold millions of copies worldwide, also created and wrote episodes of the popular TV series Foyle's War. He is not a complete stranger to detective stories. He has written for the English TV series Midsomer Murders and Agatha Christie's Poirot.

Horowitz said Christie's popular Belgian detective is completely different from Holmes. "Doyle does not write whodunits. I don't think there is a single Sherlock Holmes story where the revelation at the end – who did it or why –knocks you out. It's not his style. There's no Sherlock Holmes stories that have suspects, there's no red herrings. It's a completely different beast."

Horowitz said he does not intend to write another Holmes book. "I think it's silly to repeat myself."

However, he said that writing in the time period has whetted his appetite to write a thriller set in the world of Sherlock Holmes without Sherlock Holmes appearing in it.

"I'm quite looking forward to that."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Book is a multi-tiered portable museum

Mordechai Ben-Dat
Editor

The Hidden and the Revealed: The Queen Esther Mosaics of Lilian Broca (Gefen Books) is a magisterial work. It provides the reader with a profoundly inspiring visual, intellectual and even emotional experience of learning and discovery.

Broca is a renowned Vancouver-based artist who spent some seven years fashioning an exhibit of 10 large mosaic panels depicting the famous biblical story of Esther and the rescue of her people, the Jews of Persia, some 2,000 years ago from the annihilation planned for them by the wicked Haman.

Broca's Esther panels have received wide critical acclaim, winning the prestigious Lorenzo de' Medici medal in Florence for them.

The book is a veritable multi-tiered portable museum showcasing and explaining the panels to the reader tenderly turning its pages.

On one level, of course, the foundation, are the panels themselves. The mosaics are stunningly beautiful. Deliberately evocative by the super-skilled Broca of the mosaic treasures of the Byzantine period, they are richly detailed and lavishly coloured. The resplendent, tiled scenes communicate movement, emotion, passion and light. They are, simply, a treat to behold.

On the next level, the editors provide a revealing essay by the artist poignantly explaining how and why she created the work. Aptly titled Bringing Esther to Light, Broca answers so many of the questions many of us have always hoped to ask an artist about the circumstances that lead to the creation of a specific work we are viewing at that moment when visiting an art gallery or museum. The essay is a full-bodied discussion of art technique and personal motivation.

Queen Esther Seeking Permission to Speak*, a diptych, portrays the first part of Esther's secret plan.

Broca is generous in the information she provides in general about her work and especially in particular relation to all the preparatory work involved in creating the Esther panels.

At the next level of the seminar, the editors provide a highly informative, crisply written essay by art historian Sheila Campbell about the centuries-old depiction of the story of Esther down through the ages by so many of the world's most beloved artists. Campbell forthrightly compares Broca's interpretation of Esther to other famous renderings of the biblical heroine.

Rabbi Yosef Wosk, of Vancouver, provides the next level of exploration and inquiry. He has written a chapter entitled Fragment of an Estr Scroll that, in his words, is "a combination of essay, poem and narrative conversation" in which he imagines Esther's inner thoughts and speaks in her voice. It is a startlingly fresh, unorthodox contribution that includes eight pages of annotations. He deliberately spells Esther's name in English according to the four-letter spelling in Hebrew to "lend an air of authenticity" to her name.

And as he explains to the reader, Rabbi Wosk endeavours to reach behind the mask that was Queen Esther's existence in the palace of the Persian king until she revealed her true identity.

Adding a further tier of modern commentary to the Esther story is a preface by the artist Judy Chicago, who places the character of Esther in a feminist historical context.

Finally, the editors have chosen to add the actual Scroll of Esther in elegant Hebrew and English facing pages. The English translation they have chosen is the 1985 version by the Jewish Publication Society of America.

The large-format book is itself a true work of visual and textual art, thoughtfully edited by Gareth Sirotnik and superbly designed by Linda Coe.

The Hidden and the Revealed is a treasure, an outstanding compilation of the six contributions that the book features; first and foremost, of course, is the soaring mosaic work by Broca. Whether one loses oneself in the deep colour gravity of the mosaics or the focused, insightful, daring, thought-provoking essays that accompany them, The Hidden and the Revealed will offer its readers the unceasing thrill of new findings and reflections each time it is opened.

The story of Esther is permanent. Henceforth, Broca's splendid imagined art can be the story's permanent accompaniment.

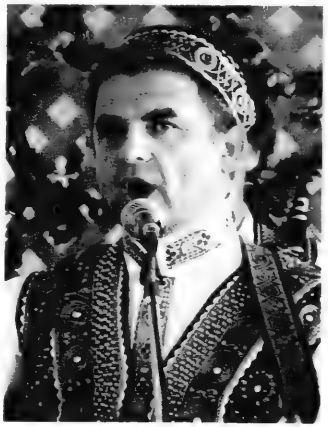
Muzikansky pursues his love of music

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Perhaps it was inevitable that Isaac Muzikansky would be a musician. With such a name, what else could he be? Though by profession he was an electronics engineer, since retiring two years ago, he has had time to pursue his love of music.

In October, Muzikansky launched his first CD, the culmination of years of singing and playing guitar in various groups and settings. Titled Isaac Muzikansky – My Parents' Favourite Yiddish Songs, the collection evolved from Muzikansky's childhood in what he calls "the spiritually frozen lands of the former Soviet Union."

Life for the Muzikansky family was extremely difficult. Muzikansky's parents had been separated during World War II when his father was drafted into the Russian army. Through sheer luck and the help of the Red Cross, they were eventually reunited.



Isaac Muzikansky

"In spite of all the difficulties in their lives, my parents' spirits were never broken, and they never gave up their dreams of keeping the Yiddishkeit alive in our family. A big part of this was the Yiddish music and the songs they sang together almost every evening after dinner," said Muzikansky at the launch of his CD.

The Muzikansky family kept their Jewish traditions alive in spite of fear of persecution. Once Isaac and his wife, Mara, arrived in Canada as immigrants, they cherished the freedom to openly embrace their Judaism and to pass it on to their own children.

The family has made an effort to give back to the Jewish community, which welcomed them warmly when they arrived in Ottawa in 1980, knowing no one. The family has volunteered in various ways, with Isaac sharing his musical talent and love of Yiddish by giving concerts to schools, seniors groups and various community events. His repertoire includes songs in Yiddish, Hebrew, Ladino, Russian and English.

Muzikansky has spent a week at the annual KlezKanada Jewish/Yiddish music festival, enjoying the company of musicians who spoke and played Yiddish music. "In my opinion, Yiddish doesn't have a future," he said. "I understand 100 per cent, but I cannot speak, and my children only understand a few words."

He hopes that through music, the language will be passed down and shared by future generations.

Following a recent concert in Montreal, Muzikansky is preparing for a pre-Chanukah concert in Toronto. He'll be appearing at the Winter Garden Court at Baycrest, 3560 Bathurst St., on Dec. 19, at 1:30 p.m. For information, contact bcohen@baycrest.org. To find out more about Muzikansky or to order his CD, visit www.isaacmuzikansky.com.

Salsa Tel Aviv – a screwball comedy from Israel

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The screwball comedy, a staple of 1930s and 1940s Hollywood, has finally reached the shores of Israel.

Yohanan Weller's Salsa Tel Aviv is scheduled to be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival's Chai Tea & A Movie series on Sunday, Dec. 11, at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Cinemas at 5 p.m. after tea is served at 4 p.m.

Though this feature film is frothy and light-hearted, it delves into a serious issue: the plight of illegal foreign workers in Israel.

The foreigners in this case are Mexicans. Vicky (Angelica Vale) is a salsa dancer and instructor, as is her boyfriend, Beto (whose real name is not listed in the credits).

Vicky arrives in Israel dressed as a nun, believing she may be denied entry if she admits to being a dancer, a profession that seems synonymous with prostitution in some circles. On the plane, she meets Yoni (Angel Bonani), a shy, reserved Israeli professor who helps her clear customs at Ben-Gurion Airport.

Unbeknownst to Yoni, Vicky is not only a dancer, but the mother of a five-year-old boy she left behind in Mexico. Soon enough, Vicky's dual identities become the source of confusion, hilarity, disappointment and annoyance.

The film's title is a reference to a jazzy Tel Aviv club where clients dance the night away or learn the basics of salsa from Beto, Vicky's philandering boyfriend and father of her son.

Through circumstances beyond her control, Vicky is locked out of her flat and finds herself begging for accommodation at Yoni's apartment.

The slapstick humour kicks in as Yoni's rich, temperamental and overbearing fiancé, Dafna (Hilla Vidor), pays an unexpected visit and Yoni scrambles to hide Vicky, wearing only a white towel, from Dafna's prying eyes.

Yoni is smitten by Vicky, Dafna's polar opposite in terms of personality. But the lies that Vicky habitually spouts threaten her continued residence in Tel Aviv, as well as her budding love affair with Yoni.

Not surprisingly, Salsa Tel Aviv, which unfolds in Spanish and Hebrew, features something of a stereotypical Jewish mother whose equanimity is battered by the suspicion that Yoni may not marry Dafna, a prize catch.

Infused with a bubbly Latin spirit, the film moves along at a steady clip and elicits plausible performances from its multinational cast.

A sanitized view of Saudi Arabia

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Saudi Arabia, the cradle of Islam, is a nation struggling to balance tradition with progress.

As skyscrapers sprout in Riyadh, Bedouin tribes roam the trackless sands of the vast Arabian Peninsula.

Although women are admitted to the King Abdullah University for Science and Technology in Jeddah, they are forbidden to drive cars.

Islam officially respects Judaism and Christianity, yet Saudi Arabian school texts demonize Jews and Christians.

The Saudi monarchy cultivates ties with the United States and depends on it for its security, but 15 Saudi Arabian Muslim extremists joined the infamous plot to bring down the World Trade Center in Manhattan.

If nothing else, then, Saudi Arabia is a country of startling contradictions. But none of these inconvenient truths surface in Greg MacGillivray's Arabia, a new DVD released on Dec. 6 by Entertainment One Films Canada Inc.

Essentially a pretty 46-minute travelogue shorn of controversial material, Arabia concentrates on Saudi Arabia's past as a centre of Nabataean and Islamic civilization and on its bleak but alluring desert landscapes.

The closest it comes to grappling with unpleasant realities is when one of its narrators, Hamzah Jamjoon, an American-educated Saudi filmmaker, suggests that extremism has been a problem and that the full emancipation of women has yet to be completed.

If you leave these issues aside, Arabia is impressive in terms of its cinematography and narrative sweep.

The camera pans on exquisite coral reefs and brightly coloured tropical fish in the Red Sea, rugged mountains in the interior, developing cityscapes, ancient shipwrecks, the Nabataean ruin of Madain Saleh, camel trains passing sand dunes, oil platforms, Arabian horses and the pilgrimage in Mecca.

It is all eye candy and esthetically appealing.

The chief narrator, the British actor Helen Mirren, tells us that Saudi Arabia's first golden age occurred during the Nabataean period, when the aromatic resin, frankincense, was its main export.

With the collapse of the Nabataean kingdom, Arabia sank into obscurity. But the rise of Islam ushered in an epoch of scientific discovery that had a bearing on the Renaissance in Europe.

Invading armies and declining trade produced another interregnum of stagnation. By the early 20th century, Arabia was still a patchwork of quarrelling tribes. But Ibn Saud, the leader of the House of Saud, stepped in and united them, and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia was born. Further change came with the discovery of oil and Saudi Arabia's alliance with the United States.

Arabia, presented by the Royal Geographical Society, Oxford University and the King Faisal Center for Research and Islamic Studies, offers a sanitized picture of an important Arab country, but really little else.

Sarah's Key out on DVD

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Gilles Paquet-Brenner's poignant and moving French film Sarah's Key, which played at local theatres this summer, is now available on DVD.

The story follows the under-reported story of the roundup of 13,000 Jews in Paris by French police for the Nazis in mid-July 1942. It stars Kristin Scott-Thomas as Julia, a Paris-based American journalist, writing an investigative piece on the subject for the tragic event's anniversary.

Kristin Scott-Thomas as Julia in Sarah's Key

In the course of her investigation, she stumbles upon a family secret that links her with Sarah, a young girl who was one of the deportees almost 70 years earlier.

The film alternates between Julia's investigation in the present and Sarah's heartwarming story in 1942.

Like the book, Sarah's story is more emotionally gripping than Julia's, which tends to slow the film's pace down at times. The horrific scene in the Velodrome, where the Jews were made to wait for days on end before their deportation, is very well done.

Other than a subtle change at the end, the movie mostly remains loyal to Tatiana de Rosnay's bestselling book and is well worth watching. It's unfortunate that the DVD seems to lack any additional features. A short documentary on the roundup would have been a nice addition.

Former champion boxer killed in car crash

Harvey Rosen
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The item in the sports section of the Nov. 19 Winnipeg Free Press was just a filler. But when I read beyond the inconspicuous headline "Boxer dies in crash" and learned it was former Winnipegger David Dusang, who had moved to Toronto, it was like a shot to the midsection followed rapidly by a sharp teeth-rattling uppercut to the jaw. The former fighter had gone down for the count after being blindsided by a speeding semi-trailer trying to make time, while robbing a 48-year-old man of his.

It was back in the spring of 1980 amateur boxer Dave Dusang was a real up-and-comer.

Dave's Jewish mother was the late Elaine Masarsky and father Ken Dusang is a Jewish convert who, incidentally, had a few pro matches himself, but for the most part had been in the managerial end of the sport.

As an amateur, David made his mark winning a variety of titles and boasted a record of 30-7-1. The former Talmud Torah student had been the Manitoba boxing champion at various weight levels and also claimed the Saskatchewan championship which he held in 1974-75; the Rochester Golden Gloves title in 1977-78; the Hibbing, Minnesota Golden Gloves title in 1977-78; and in 1979 the Minnesota Golden Gloves.

His Jewish upbringing was important to Elaine and Ken and he had his bar mitzvah at the Bnay Abraham Synagogue in June of 1976.

Besides a Jewish environment, young David was also introduced early to the "The Manly Art" when dad Ken set up a gym in the basement. Jeff at 10 and his brother Dave, 8, would work out together and they even put on a boxing exhibition.

Dave had his first pro match in February 1981 in Edmonton, not long after his 18th birthday.

The Alberta debut was swift and decisive when Dusang was dropped to the canvas in the first round at the hands of welterweight Laurie Mann, who would later become the Canadian champion.

Other than his out-of-town debut/disaster, I believe I witnessed all of Dusang's other bouts. He also took on the likes of aspiring pugilists and trial horses named Kareem Ali, Tom Tarantino, Dennis Brisson, Kenny Payton, "Sugar" Marsh.

Fighting as "the Jewish Bomber," Dusang compiled an 11-2 pro record with six knockouts. Dusang had talent; fast hands and foot speed were his calling cards, but unlike his opponents he was not raised on the mean streets of Chicago or New York, where desperation and profanities abound with every take down in the game of life.

In 1983, Dusang had just beaten Milwaukee's Tom Tarantino for the vacant USA Boxing Mid-American welterweight crown and was scheduled to fight Mann in a rematch on Dec. 5. "The winner of that fight was to get a shot at Davey Hilton for the Canadian title," Scott Taylor reported in Fightnews Canada.

Mann, however, brought the Jewish Bomber down, Star of David and all, at 2:36 of the opening round.

Perhaps it was then that the seeds of retirement were sewn. He closed out his career with a unanimous decision over Larry Mayes in Winnipeg early in 1984.

Luckily, the kid was on the family plan and it was they that were in charge of the one-time aspiring Canadian champion's career. So it was back to the drawing board for Dusang. He earned degrees at the Universities of Winnipeg and Manitoba, travelled to Toronto where he raised his family and became a major executive in sales and marketing.

He served as vice-president of sales and marketing for SkyDome from January 1993 to December 2005, and negotiated the 2004 SkyDome naming rights deal, which was the largest naming rights transaction in Canada at that time.

Above all, Dusang was a real mensch.

As his father told Taylor, "We brought him up right. David was proud to be Jewish and he even wore that pride on his boxing trunks. It's just so sad and so terrible. On Nov. 17, 2010, we were all in Israel for his son's bar mitzvah and now, one year to the day later, he's gone. But I wanted everyone to know, I deeply appreciated all the support we received.

"He was a good boxer as a young man back in the day, but he was really a better adult. He had a wonderful career in business and was a great husband and father. David was a fine, fine man."

Dusang is survived by his father Ken, brother Jeff, sister Laurie, wife Janna Pollock, son Joshua Ryan, daughter Rachel Samantha, relatives and numerous friends and colleagues.

BEIT HALOCHEM BIKERS: Tami and Yossi Zimner, seen here wearing Canadian colours, were part of a group of 60 North American cyclists, 52 of them from Canada, who joined 55 disabled Israeli veterans on a five-day adventure through southern and northern Israel. Sponsored by Beit Halochem Canada, the group raised more than $350,000 for cycling rehabilitative programs at Beit Halochem Centres in Israel. The bikers started in Ashkelon and cycled to the Dead Sea. From there, they turned north to Rosh Hanikra. The North American cyclists were impressed by the courage and determination of the disabled Israelis – those without use of their legs used hand bikes and those with visual or hand injuries rode on tandem bikes with more able-bodied partners. Beit Halochem's rehabilitative centres in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Nahariya, Jerusalem and Be'er Sheva have enabled them to rebuild their lives.

Revolutionary Guards should be targeted: CIJA

"The existing prohibitions on exporting goods used in the refining of oil and liquefaction of natural gas continue unchanged," Foreign Affairs and International Trade Canada announced.

The new measures came after the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) reported on the militarization of Iran's nuclear program. Even before the IAEA assessment, Canada had complied with a UN-imposed sanctions regime after Iran refused to suspend its uranium enrichment activities. "These targeted measure are designed to hamper attempts by Iran to develop nuclear, chemical, biological and missile programs, as well as to persuade it to agree to constructive discussions," Foreign Affairs stated.

Fogel said the Revolutionary Guards should specifically be included as a designated terrorist organization because "they control so much of the financial institutions within the country and these holdings finance terrorism and transfers to Hamas and Hezbollah."

"The IRGC is a pillar of the Iranian regime, playing a central role in state repression and nuclear proliferation. Iran funds, facilitates, directs and carries out terrorist attacks worldwide via the IRGC, notably the 1994 bombing of Jewish and Israeli targets in Argentina," Fogel said.

John Thompson, executive director of the Mackenzie Institute, a foreign policy and security think-tank, said it would be difficult to target the Revolutionary Guards and avoid affecting ordinary Iranians. "No one has any desire to punish the ordinary people of Iran," he said. But the Revolutionary Guards run the bonyads, corrupt and inefficient charitable entities that control much of the Iranian economy, including exports. "It is kind of hard to separate the ordinary Iranian from the regime," he said. "It [the regime] is trying to control every avenue of their lives."

"One of the reasons Iranians hate the regime so much is that it runs their lives and the economy... The average Iranian businessperson is already impaired by the regime."

In Parliament, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, a longtime proponent of sanctions on Iran, asked whether the Revolutionary Guards would be listed as a designated terrorist organization. "The Iranian Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps has emerged as the epicentre of the nuclear weaponization program, of international terrorism from Argentina to Afghanistan and massive domestic repression," he said.

Shimon Fogel

In response, MP Bob Dechert, parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, stated: "Our latest expansion of sanctions against Iran prohibit almost all financial transactions with the Iranian government. They add individuals and entities to the list of designated persons and expand the list of prohibited goods. We are taking aggressive action to cover the known leadership of the Iranian Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps and block virtually all transactions with Iran, including those with the central bank."

Fogel said, "Sanctions targeting the IRGC as a whole would completely isolate it financially, curtail its ability to contribute to these core areas of concern and undermine the Iranian regime's ability to continue along its current trajectory. Listing the IRGC as a terrorist entity would accomplish this, and would importantly ensure that even if Iran were convinced to abandon its nuclear-weapons program, the IRGC would remain off limits to Canadians until its support for and direction of international terrorism comes to an end.

"We commend the key steps the government of Canada has taken to address the IRGC's role in Iran's nuclear-weapons program. Listing the IRGC as a terrorist entity in Canada would have wider-ranging implications and would hopefully contribute to inducing positive change in Iranian policy on a number of fronts."

Fogel said CIJA would also like to see Ottawa use its influence with governments that trade with Iran, such as China and India, to convince them to sever their business relationships. Canada should offer these governments alternatives, such as the supply of fossil fuels, to strengthen its case, he suggested.

According to government of Canada data, Canadian exports to Iran in 2010 totalled $120 million while imports reached only $38 million.

Winnipeg Jewish teen assaulted, burned

Compiled by CJN staff

A 15 year-old Jewish Winnipeg girl has come forward alleging she was assaulted at her school because of her religion.

The story came to light last Saturday, in a report in the Winnipeg Free Press, which said the incident occurred on Nov. 18 in a Winnipeg high school between the girl and a male student peer with suspected neo-Nazi ties.

The girl reported the attack to a school guidance counsellor three days later.

According to the report, the girl's attacker, who is reportedly also 15, allegedly first accosted her with anti-semitic remarks in the school hallway before taking out a lighter and singeing her hair.

Under the terms of the Youth Criminal Justice Act, the victim and her attacker cannot be named. Winnipeg police arrested the boy, who was scheduled to be formally charged this past Monday with assault with a weapon.

Administration staff at Oak Park High School, where the attack allegedly took place, told the Free Press that the male student was immediately suspended from the school and also that he was withdrawn from the school by his legal guardian.

In a CBC News report, Winnipeg Police Const. Robert Carver said the city was also considering laying other charges.

"A girl being confronted by individuals and having her hair lit would be horrific," Carver told the CBC. "I think when you add that there were racist overtones in the confrontation, it's got to be a very significant incident. Certainly the Department of Justice has to review any further charges if they were looking at elements related to hate crime charges under the Criminal Code."

Shelley Faintuch, associate director of local partner services for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said in a statement that CIJA was "pleased" the school had suspended the boy and said her organization would be speaking with school staff to help educate their student body on how to prevent these kinds of attacks.

> 'This is a shocking act of violence that must not be tolerated'

"This is a shocking act of violence that must not be tolerated. The allegation that the attack may have been motivated by antisemitism makes it of special concern to the Jewish community, but in actual fact, an attack like this affects all communities. We know Winnipeg to be a multicultural and diverse city where acts of violence such as this are rare," Faintuch said.

Alan Yusim, midwest regional director for B'nai Brith Canada, told the Free Press that the incident "tears at the fabric of the community."

"I think there should be zero tolerance for any hate-motivated activity in our schools," Yusim said. "It's unfortunate these things happen, but they're out there, and they must be dealt with effectively because everybody's a victim when that sort of an incident occurs."

Fashion designer influenced by world travel

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Despite having no previous design experience, Laura Siegel, 23, decided to pursue fashion as a career because she knew she had to follow her intuition.

Before starting her formal training at Parsons the New School for Design in New York, she took a year off to travel the world and gather ideas and inspiration. During that time, Siegel developed her uniquely global esthetic.

"Time travelling and the people I have met along the way really drive everything the brand is in terms of esthetic, customers and the way the clothes function," Siegel said.

"I would approach artisans on the side of the road, practising their craft in the open – whether it be a knitter, leathersmith or silversmith.

"Often, they would offer to teach me a bit about what they do over the following days. It was these encounters that gave me a strong appreciation for crafts and a desire to somehow be able to work to sustain traditional crafts and build long-lasting relationships with the artisans themselves."

While studying fashion in New York, Siegel tried to keep every element of her design process sustainable and natural.

Since she sourced accessory supplies in Cambodia and Vietnam, her apartment soon filled with strands of colourful wooden beads that hung next to dried flowers and shells. She even took a craft class to create rings specific to engravings she had sketched on her trip.

Having won a number of prestigious scholarships while at school – including a Gap Inc. design award – Siegel was clearly a talent on the rise at a very young age. She has even interned with Canadian designer Arthur Mendonca, New York's Luca Luca, Israeli-American Yigal Azrouel, and Melbourne's Megan Park.

After graduation, Siegel took a few months off and studied French and African art at New York's Fashion Institute of Technology. She said she always knew travel and culture would influence her work.

She was then sponsored to present her thesis collection from Parsons at Vancouver Fashion Week, where she won the Rising Star Award for her eco-chic collection of plush knit separates and soft jersey dresses.

Following her receipt of the award, Siegel received funding for a four-month research trip to Asia, where she worked with local artisans in India, Bali and Hong Kong.

She made connections with woodblock printers, hand-embroiderers and shabori dyers – all of whom produced materials for her spring 2012 collection.

Siegel has since gained recognition as a designer in Vogue Italia and Flare magazine. She is now at the forefront of the fashion industry, creating pieces for "women with a sense of social awareness."

Her latest collection, which was recently featured at Toronto's LG Fashion Week, reflects her beliefs in sustainable fashion. Made of all-natural dyes and materials, including silk, cotton, bamboo and Japanese gima, each garment has a unique character. Edges are intended to fray over time and natural dyes will fade and transform with continual wear.

"Spring '12 was heavily influenced by my time spent in Bali. The colours, the fabric treatments, the energy of the clothes are a reflection of what I loved most about the environment and time spent with other travellers. It's very soft, airy, raw, textural, versatile and deconstructed."

Siegel, likely to join the ranks of successful Jewish fashion designers such as Calvin Klein, Kenneth Cole, Ralph Lauren and Michael Kors, just to name a few, said every garment in her collection is handmade.

"Prints are all developed by hand – the dye work, the knitting, the embroidery, which together combine to create layers of texture. By crafting each aspect by hand and using natural dyes and techniques, the clothes have a rich history to them."

Fashion designer Laura Siegel takes a bow after one of her fashion shows.

Siegel said comfort and versatility are important design elements in her collection. She describes her ideal customer as a woman "who doesn't arrange her wardrobe based on where she's going. Whether she's at work or out with friends, these designs are adaptable to every aspect of her lifestyle."

LG Fashion Week was a "great platform to launch on," Siegel said.

"Canada is a huge support to its own talent. As an emerging designer, it was a privilege to be part of the event."

Siegel added that "holding a strong point of view and coming from an authentic place have been very important" in her career thus far. She advises aspiring designers to "always remember why you are doing what you do, and why you love it. Also, think big, beyond the realm of your knowledge and always continue to learn more."

As for the future, Siegel said she hopes to continue expanding the network of artisans she collaborates with and to bring awareness of cultures and crafts through her designs.

"I am looking forward to the day I can begin branching out and doing home design, working more in-depth with accessories and collaborating further with other industries."

You're giving what?

"So what are we getting the kids for Chanukah?" I ask Meir, as I sit at the kitchen table.

Meir washes a stubborn pan. "What did you have in mind?" he asks.

I eat a cookie. "Well, they love animals," I start, as Meir almost breaks a plate.

See, we have two dogs and two cats now (Sarah and Sneezy are deeply involved with their significant others, who practically live at our house these days. Not to mention the birds, the bunnies and the fish). "No," I say quickly, "not another pet, but maybe we should donate to some animal shelter in the kids' names."

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

Meir looks at me suspiciously, but finally says, "I think that's a great idea! After all, our kids have high values, that's how I raised them. They'd appreciate that gift."

I eat another cookie humbly and with grace. "Just imagine the reaction when they tell all our friends and neighbours about this gift. Think how politically correct it will look! All of those shallow parents who buy their kids stupid computer games, BlackBerries and designer toys, would feel so ashamed."

Meir looks at me more closely. "That's beside the point, Nina," he says.

"Of course!" I say swiftly. "I'm not doing it just for our friends and neighbours to know about, I'm doing it for our extended family in Israel to know about, too!"

I feel so heroic – stoic, if you will – that I can't wait till Chanukah, and we purchase the donation vouchers and hand them to the kids the next day.

Next thing we know, we're sitting in the corner of our bedroom, on the floor by the wall. The door is locked, yet we're still afraid. The kids (after a dangerous chase on the stairs!) are kicking and banging on our door, while swearing and badmouthing us.

The next day, we go to the mall.

The kids had a gathering with their friends, and handed us a "dirty list" for future presents. (I suspect some parents came to the meeting as well. Not sure. I was too afraid to go into the basement.)

The list: Never buy a diet book for anybody. Anybody. Never write an inscription on a book – how will they exchange it? Never buy towels with a name woven in – how will they reuse it as a present? (And how many towels does someone need? Especially if they stay in hotels now and then.) Never give candles to a pyromaniac, chocolates to a diabetic, alcohol to an alcoholic, a cheque with a mistake to anyone, flowers to an allergic person, a gift certificate to stores out of the country, a gift certificate with a very modest amount to a very expensive store, a deodorant, a mouthwash, a baby brother, a donation voucher.

I think we're good, at least until next Chanukah. By the way, the kids bought us two snarly hamsters for the holiday. After all, apparently we love animals, don't we?

Newspapers are not for breakfast

What is the media? In its simplest form, a bunch of people who believe they know what issues we should be concerned with and present it to us in various forms.

Here is what some of the headlines those people chose for us to read a few Fridays ago in the Toronto Star. Most of us read it at breakfast: TTC slashes services on 62 routes; CBC chief defends secrets; Aboriginals agony must lead to action; Canadian incomes dropping, report finds; Another mobster shot dead in Montreal; Judges plagiarism sends case to top court; Portrait of a "very sad" teenager; 600 disabled dogs to be put up for adoption; Queen's Park offering crumbs to Ontario's poor; Sri Lanka counts civilian deaths to counter claims of massacres; Iran claims 12 arrested were helping Israel; Activist fights Europe's last dictatorship; Saleh's messy exit no solace to Yemenis.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

So it's 7 a.m. You're eating toast with blackberry jam. Dyspepsia builds as you are bombarded by negative news created by downbeat word smithies and headlines that encourage a sense of "man, are we in trouble." Your response, after digesting the tragedy of 600 disabled dogs, is one of fear and despair.

You continue reading the local news in the GTA section. The morning smile that bejewelled your face earlier has somersaulted. You're now rubbing your forehead with Chinese Tiger Balm ointment. The headlines read: Victim begged assailant to kill her; Ombud blasts children's services; Family fights school board; Second consultant suggests closing libraries; Discipline cops who lie in court, lawyer urges.

You quickly realize why seniors frequently stop reading newspapers. The sun has barely risen, and editors, writers and publishers have shared with us intimidate details about the beating of a community member and a journey taking our libraries the way of the typewriter. We now know, by 7:25 a.m., that cops lie in court, and children's services – services meant to protect vulnerable kids – are under attack.

Life is closing in. Your media is telling you everything is mostly bad; our society is morally penniless; we live in a dangerous city, province and world despite the facts violent crime is generally down.

Respite? The news section is sitting on the chair next to you, creased and comprehended. Excited you pick up the entertainment section, hoping to proverbially flip open a Mary Poppinesk umbrella and fly through the literary air with good news. While you wipe grapefruit juice out of your eye, you read: There's no way to duplicate Monroe mystique; Actress still has growing up to do; Errol Morris tells us what we already know; Red is no marriage made in heaven; Elite Squad shows a Brazil rife with corruption.

You're now sliding off your chair – sagging to the floor – hoping the Business Section and Life sections will inflate your crushed spirit. And you read: Top court won't let U.S. steel appeal; RIM PlayBook's flawed but a deal; Smothered boyfriend needs space from you; Co-sleeping advocates say ads go too far…

…and you slink out the house weary about the state of our world, slip into your car and turn on the news. The newscaster belts out with calm concern, "Today, winds will blow you into the river, and bank rates will bankrupt your savings. The city's 50th murder happened outside your doorstep, and Lindsey Lohan has broken parole."

And she smiles and concludes, "Have a nice day."

Media, be more positive. You're hurting us.

Israel closes unsafe Mughrabi Bridge

Hamas accuses Jewish state of declaring war on Muslim holy sites

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Hamas spokesperson said Monday that the closure of Jerusalem's Mughrabi Bridge, which leads from the Western Wall Plaza to the Temple Mount, is an attack against Muslim holy sites, AFP reported.

"This is a serious step that shows the Zionist scheme of aggression against the Al Aqsa Mosque," Fawzi Barhum told AFP. "This is a violent act that amounts to a declaration of religious war on the Muslim holy places in Jerusalem."

The Jerusalem Municipality ordered the closure of the wooden bridge due to fears it may collapse or catch fire, posing a security threat. There are 15 gates leading into the Al-Aqsa mosque compound, 10 of which are in use.

The Mughrabi Gate is the only access point for non-Muslims to enter the site, meaning its closure will prevent both Jews and tourists from visiting until a replacement structure is built.

The municipality said only a small number of security officials will be able to use the bridge, and only under urgent circumstances.

The wooden bridge leading to the Temple Mount and Al-Aqsa was scheduled to be demolished and replaced with a sturdier structure, but Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu instructed the Jerusalem municipality two weeks ago to postpone the demolition.

Israeli space module to fly to the moon

Israeli space experts are taking part in an international moon-probe competition for the Google Lunar X Prize. President Shimon Peres, left, was at a ribbon-cutting ceremony last Thursday for the Space IL group at the Israel Aerospace Industries campus near Tel Aviv. With Peres is Rona Ramon, wife of the late Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon. The aim of the competition is to land a robotic spacecraft on the moon. The winning team also must operate the spacecraft, which will carry an Israeli pennant, across the lunar surface and relay back video. First prize in the contest is a $30-million grant, which has stirred dreams in Israel of mounting a manned moon mission.

Museum Criticized

WINNIPEG — Ukrainian Canadians repeated questions about why the Canadian Museum for Human Rights will have a section devoted to the Holocaust during the institution's first public meeting last week in Winnipeg. Ukrainian groups have objected to the Holocaust getting its own exhibit while other genocides, such as the Holodomor famine caused by Josef Stalin in 1930s Ukraine, will be lumped together in other exhibits. Officials of the $310-million museum, the brainchild of Canwest Global founder Israel Asper and the first national museum to be built outside Ottawa, said consultations about content are ongoing and evolving. They also said it will open in 2014, not 2013 as originally announced.

Archives Renamed

OTTAWA — The City of Ottawa's new archives building will be named for former lieutenant-governor James Bartleman after there were no objections to the idea in consultation hearings, the Ottawa Citizen reported. Mayor Jim Watson had sought to name the building after 1950s-era mayor Charlotte Whitton, the first female leader of a major Canadian city. He was forced to backtrack after Jewish groups said she was an antisemite, noting her objection to allowing a ship of Jewish children fleeing the Nazis into Canada.

WORLD

Beastie Boys In Hall

CLEVELAND — The Beastie Boys will be inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. The pioneering hip-hop group made up of Mike D (Michael Diamond), MCA (Adam Yauch) and Ad-Rock (Adam Horowitz) will join a Hall of Fame class of 2012 that includes the Red Hot Chili Peppers and Guns N' Roses. The Beastie Boys, creators of hits such as Fight for Your Right (To Party), No Sleep 'Til Brooklyn and Sabotage, have released 12 albums that have sold more than 40 million copies. The ceremony will be held in April at the hall in Cleveland.

More Ghetto Survivors To Get Pensions

NEW YORK — After talks with the Claims Conference, Germany has agreed to loosen the criteria for payment to certain survivors of ghettos.

Under the new rules, which go into effect Jan. 1, any Jew who spent at least 12 months in a ghetto, in hiding or living under a false identity will be eligible for a monthly pension ranging from $350 to approximately $400. Until now, the minimum time requirement was 18 months. The change will add some 8,000 survivors to the pensions, which come from the Article 2 Fund and the Central and Eastern European Fund.

Germany also agreed to provide special pension payments to those who spent three to 12 months in a ghetto and are older than 74. The change is aimed at survivors of the Budapest ghetto, which operated from November 1944 to January 1945, and is expected to affect about 4,500 survivors next year and another 3,500 survivors once they hit age 75. The payments will amount to about $325 per month for survivors in the United States and $270 per month for those living in eastern Europe.

In all, the Claims Conference estimates that the changes will result in an additional $650 million in payments to survivors. Earlier this month, Germany announced additional one-time payments from its Ghetto Fund for "non-forced" labourers.

MP Recants

LONDON — A British lawmaker apologized for suggesting that a Jewish ambassador to Israel is biased because of his religion. Labour MP Paul Flynn was accused of antisemitism earlier this month after he claimed that Britain's ambassador to Israel, Matthew Gould, "was serving the interests of the Israeli government." On Dec. 7, Flynn referred to his comments as "clumsily expressed remarks" and withdrew them in an interview with the Jewish Chronicle. Flynn has been an MP since 1987 and represents the Welsh district of Newport West.

For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.
Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.
If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.
It's amazing how a little love and caring can make such a big difference.

Jewish, Christian groups pan anti-bullying bill

Coalition claims legislation contains hidden sex-ed agenda

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Representatives of Jewish and Christian groups gathered at Queen's Park last week to denounce anti-bullying legislation that they said contains a hidden sex-education agenda that goes beyond its protective aims.

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan of Chabad @ Flamingo and a member of the Council of Orthodox Rabbis, Charles McVety of Christian Canada College and Jack Fonseca of the Canadian Life Coalition of Canada, a Catholic pro-life advocacy organization, all chastised Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty for the bill.

They spoke out against the legislation – Bill 13 An Act to amend the Education Act With Respect to Bullying and Other Matters – which they characterized "as a vehicle to indoctrinate children into embracing a new sexual revolution."

Among other things, the bill's wording calls for each public school board to support the establishment of so-called "gay-straight alliance" clubs, where both heterosexual and homosexual students can interact in a safe environment.

The Jewish day school system will not be affected by the legislation, according to Steven Shulman, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's campaign director and counsel, who spoke on behalf of federation's Centre for Jewish Education.

Shulman noted that many of the Jewish day schools have already implemented anti-bullying policies and procedures.

"We're proud of the fact that a number of Jewish day schools have been proactive and did not wait for legislation on this subject," he said.

The proposed bill also obliges school boards to provide help to students who request "activities or organizations that promote the awareness and understanding of, and respect for, people of all sexual orientations and gender identities."

"To force, especially Christian, classrooms or schools to have homosexual clubs would of course be an affront to their family values," McVety told a joint news conference. "And what does this have to do with bullying? Nothing."

Rabbi Kaplan shared his worries about the legislation in an e-mail to The CJN.

A hero in Ramat Hasharon

From the editor's desk...

In a few days, we celebrate the holiday of Chanukah. We will begin the mirthful eight-day dedication whose chief requirement is lighting the candles of the menorah. And we will literally sing the praises of the heroes of ancient times who inspired the holiday: the Maccabees.

Those of us who have more years behind us than ahead of us know that indeed, every age and every generation brings forth heroes. Every now and then, "ordinary" men and women act heroically for the sake of a cause that's for a higher, wider, common good.

In the spirit of this holiday of heroes, I wish to bring readers' attention to an individual who was considered a "legend" by his peers in Israel, although outside of the Jewish state, he was known only in private circles.

Syd Cohen was a family doctor in Ramat Hasharon, Israel, a community just north of Tel Aviv. He retired from practice in 2006 at the age of 85.

Over the past two decades, anyone passing Syd on the streets of Ramat Hasharon during his regular early evening walks would have probably commented upon Syd's stately and elegant bearing. They would not likely have imagined the handsome doctor of his youth nor the details of his exploits as an aircraft fighter pilot.

Syd settled in Israel from South Africa in 1965 at the age of 44. But his first encounter with the Jewish state had been many years earlier while on short leave from duties as a fighter pilot in the South African Air Force.

Syd had enlisted in the air force when he was 19 years old. Merely two years later, at the heady age of 22, he was flying mission after mission – 135 in all – in the skies above the desert of North Africa, taking part in the life-and-death fight to prevent the German army from advancing into Egypt and further east into British Mandatory Palestine. He participated in the key battles at El Alemein in October 1943 that turned the tide of the war in North Africa against the Germans.

After the war, Syd returned to South Africa to study medicine. He was well along in his third year of medical school when he left to help the Jews of Mandatory Palestine establish their state.

He wrote about his decision to join the fight in a letter to his family.

"Ever since my three visits to Palestine during the war, I followed events there with some interest. I felt a strong tie with the people there particularly those in the settlements. [Syd, it must be remembered, was 22 when he first visited the Yishuv in Palestine.]

"As the time for the ending of the British Mandate drew near and the possibility of a peaceful settlement seemed more remote, I found myself scheming and devising plans to get to Palestine at any cost, to 'do my stuff.'

"When, on the 14th of May, the Jewish State of Israel was proclaimed and the surrounding Arab states made their hostile moves, there was no doubt left in my mind of the steps I had to take."

Syd arrived in Israel in June 1948. He joined with a number of other volunteers from overseas, known as Machal, to form the first fighter squadron of the nascent Israel Air Force.

In October four months later, after the commander of the squadron, Moddie Alon, died when his plane crashed, Syd was asked to become commander of the squadron, a position he accepted and undertook with the typical humility, self-deprecation and excellence of character that were his lifelong trademark.

Once the young state's future was secured, Syd returned to South Africa to complete his medical studies.

Many years later, from the garden of his home in Ramat HaSharon, Syd wrote, "That peace has eluded Israel is as much a cause of puzzlement as it is of sadness. In the early years, we had always assumed that once the guns of war stopped, the dialogue of diplomacy would begin. How wrong we were. So many young men and women have died fighting the wars that we had hoped to end forever.

"My tour in 4 Squadron of the SAAF in World War II brought me to Mandatory Palestine. Visiting Palestine brought me to Machal and to 101 Squadron of the IAF. I am proud to have played a role at that singular moment in time to help bring a Jewish state into existence.

Syd Cohen

"Some people have said I was heroic. But I was no more heroic than the next fellow who fought in the war. I tried to stay calm when the flak was flying. I tried to hold on to my nerves when there were more enemy planes around me than I could quickly count. There is no excitement in war, only the deeply driven instinct to live to the next day. The large events of war are but the accumulation of individual battles for survival. I was one of the lucky ones who made it all the way through."

Syd Cohen, fighter pilot, doctor, father, husband, friend, mentor, modern Maccabee, hero, died two weeks ago on Dec. 2 at his home in Ramat Hasharon.

His memory will always be for blessing. –MBD

Rabbi optimistic about Reform Judaism in Israel

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

In the early days of Reform Judaism in Israel, a typical congregation was made up predominantly of olim and led by a rabbi who'd also made aliyah.

"Israelis would say, 'This is something you brought from North America. It doesn't fit us.'" Rabbi Benjie Gruber told The CJN in an interview last week.

Rabbi Benjie Gruber

The American-born rabbi, who made aliyah at age five, recently spent 11 days in Ottawa, Calgary, Edmonton and the Toronto area at the invitation of ARZA Canada. He spoke of his work in the Arava region and Eilat at congregations and with students and community leaders here.

In an interview at the Toronto offices of ARZA Canada and Camp George last week, Rabbi Gruber said that today, 80 per cent of Israel's Reform rabbis are ordained in Israel, as he was two years ago. He also has a master's degree in Jewish philosophy from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

ARZA Canada, the Canadian arm of Reform Zionism, funds many of the Reform movement's educational initiatives in Israel.

Rabbi Gruber is decidedly, and unexpectedly, optimistic about the future of the Reform movement (also known as Progressive Judaism) in Israel. "This growing sense that [the haredi] are taking over, pushing us aside, is not the sense that I get," he said, noting that 75 per cent of Israelis define themselves as secular or traditional.

"We're not going to become the majority, but we're going to affect the majority who define themselves as secular."

To explain his optimism, he likes to let people know that, 25 years ago, the first Israeli Reform preschool opened in Jerusalem, and that, next year, one of its original students will enter rabbinical school at Hebrew Union College in Jerusalem.

"It proves that Reform education works," he said, adding that there are now 50 Reform preschools in Israel. As well, he said, there are "probably over 100" Reform rabbis, 50 of whom are working in Israel's 36 Reform congregations.

His own niche is somewhat more unusual. In August 2010, the 36-year-old rabbi – who sports an earring but rarely a kippah – moved with his wife and family to the Reform movement's Kibbutz Yahel, 45 minutes from Eilat.

Most of his work involves outreach on nearby kibbutzim. Aside from milking cows, he also officiates at bar and bat mitzvahs, teaches at a local high school, engages kibbutzniks in text study, and performs wedding ceremonies, which – contrary to what some people think – is legal in Israel. He clarifies, though, that the marriages cannot be registered in Israel, and the couples also travel to Cyprus for a civil ceremony that is recognized at home.

But he sees the fact that people are seeking out his services for weddings as a sign that "something new is happening." At one time, he said, most Israelis saw only two alternatives: a wedding ceremony held outside of Israel or an Orthodox Jewish ceremony under the auspices of the Israeli rabbinate.

In the past year, Rabbi Gruber has officiated at about a dozen weddings, and the Reform movement is doing hundreds, maybe thousands, a year, he said.

Rabbi Gruber – an eighth-generation rabbi whose father was ordained Conservative and his grandfather Reform – said that the Reform movement is "helping Israel become more of a democratic country and strengthening secular Israelis' identity."

Most of the students at the movement's schools, which run from preschool through high school, are secular Israelis who don't want either a secular or an Orthodox education for their children, he said. "It's about connecting better to what it means to be Jewish."

His own education was Orthodox, because his parents preferred that to a secular Israeli education when they made aliyah from Chicago to Be'er Sheva in 1980. The future rabbi was raised modern Orthodox – "mainstream Bnai Akiva," as he put it. He discovered Reform Judaism during a two-year stint teaching in Portland, Ore.

One of five siblings, he has two brothers who are also rabbis – one secular humanist and one Chabad.

Rabbi Gruber said that sometimes people say he's the "Chabad Reform rabbi," because of his outreach work. "We're bringing the message that there's another way to be Jewish," he said.

In Jerusalem, partly because of the highly public controversy over Women of the Wall, Progressive Judaism is better known than in the south of Israel. "I am the only Reform rabbi in the Arava," he said. "We're not here to say we're the only way to be Jewish. We're another way to be Jewish."

Richman's Bakery closes after almost 50 years

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Richman's Kosher Bakery closed last week after almost 50 years at its present location, a victim of rising costs and increased competition.

"You've caught me on a very retrospective day," owner Jonah Libman said Dec. 9, two days after he shut his store at Bathurst Street and York Downs Drive, north of Wilson Avenue, for the last time.

He told an all-too familiar story about the problems of the modern baking business – costs go up, big-box competitors move in, loyalties shift and, possibly, the community loses faith that an old-fashioned family business can keep up with changing times.

"I'm the first one to go," Libman said, adding that he believes he won't be the last, as pressures mount. "I am the beginning of the end… the small shops cannot survive."

Libman said his baked goods were as high quality as ever. "My product could compete with anybody on the street," he said. "We had a wonderful Dutch baker, we would make wedding cakes – people couldn't believe [they] came from Richmans… had I been on Avenue Road, I could charge twice as much."

Yet in the community's mind, the bakery couldn't shake what he describes as its "aura of rye bread and cheese Danish."

Libman, who earned a degree in molecular genetics, once worked for the federal government in Ottawa, but he couldn't get away from baking. "My zaide was a baker… it's in the blood."

Otherwise, he said, he would never have adapted to the miserable hours and "slave labour" of "this crazy business."

He was the third owner of Richman's, which opened in its present location on Bathurst in 1964 to join a community migrating northward. He bought the store in 1990 from cousins of the original owner. He longed to renovate the aging space, but he said his landlord was reluctant to share the cost of leasehold improvements.

Soaring wheat prices – due to large companies taking over smaller players, plus the imperilled status of the Canadian Wheat Board – have also been a constant worry. "I'm paying 60 per cent more now for flour [compared to 1990]."

Yet when he raised prices last May to reflect increases in the cost of flour, eggs and sugar, "people were screaming at me. I had this old man yelling at me."

Daniel Grodzinski of Grodzinski Bakery said that Richman's demise is "just another nail in the coffin… How many small high-street shops are around at all anymore? There are no small hardware stores anymore."

Community loyalty only goes so far, with cheap, factory-made bread shoving fresh, local products aside.

"When I took over this business 21 years ago, we used to do between 60 and 200 dozen dinner rolls on a Saturday night for Sunday simchahs," Libman said.

Today, most caterers use partially baked products that are made in factories by corporations such as Canada Bread. These so-called "parbaked" goods are mostly baked at the factory, then quickly frozen. After shipping, they need a short time in the oven to emerge hot, crisp and fresh, at half the price Richman's would need to charge.

As well, at the retail level, consumers can easily find kosher bread and baked goods in supermarkets, including some trucked in over great distances by producers that make them more cheaply than bakers here are able to.

"Why would you pay $12.95 a pound for my cookies when they're bringing in kosher cookies from Montreal for half that?" Libman asked.

Montreal labour costs are cheap, he said. "I'm paying $16.50 an hour… [Montreal Kosher brand is] paying $8 to $10 an hour."

But Libman preferred to be a mensch rather than undercut the competition: "I liked to treat my employees like they were part of my family."

"I'm very, very sorry to see [Richman's] go," Grodzinski said. "As much as it's difficult… because of rising ingredient costs, there's also a dearth of skilled labour coming into the market. Younger people do not become [bread] bakers. Baking is hard work – it's a very hard business, physically."

Although his father and uncle ran Grodzinski bakery together in London, and his first cousin still operates that business, members of the next generation aren't interested. "From what I can see standing here now, none of my children are going into it."

For Libman, who also recently lost his father – a loyal supporter who would show up at 5 a.m. to make sure Libman was at work – it's another sign of the end of an era. At least, he said, "I will leave with my head held high. I treated everybody with respect, and I took care of my staff."

Ordinary heroes for our own time

The candles of Chanukah, we tell our children, are the annual, visible reminders of the miracle that happened in the rededicated Temple in Jerusalem at this time so very many years ago. Miracles, therefore, can happen, our children learn.

But it falls to every parent to remind them that miracles don't just happen. Moreover, as our sages teach, we mustn't rely on them happening in any event. But if we are to see a miracle, our sages add, we must grasp deep in our souls that miracles are the mystery-laden result of a partnership, so to speak, between human beings and the Divine.

God brings forth the miracle. But man, through resolve and courage, makes it happen. It is that resolve and courage that we see and understand as heroism.

For example, the waters of the Red Sea did not part until a single, and undoubtedly very worried, human being – Nachshon ben Aminadav – stepped into the flowing waters.

Similarly, the miracle of the oil in the temple did not happen until the Maccabees decided to fight back.

Thus, it is no exaggeration to state that the building of a better world, relies upon individuals to have the courage and the resolve to act, to join hands, so to speak, with God. It requires individuals to be heroic.

Not all of us, however, can be Maccabee heroes. But then, not all heroism requires that we be Maccabees. There are as many stripes of heroism as there are needs for a hero.

A great many people in our society know this to be true.

Ask a single mother, for example, raising her children alone while managing home, job, children's school, personal needs and the household payments.

Ask a nurse in a palliative care ward abating both the last suffering of her patient and the painful sorrow of the patient's family.

Ask a new immigrant holding down two or more jobs while struggling with the new ways of a new land, often only with rudimentary knowledge of the language.

Or ask a young teenager, feeling alone and frightened in school, trying to stand up to the tormenting of a bully. For they too, are heroes, in their struggles, in their need. And the examples are unlimited.

As the Maccabees taught us, there is no way to make the world a better place for us all other than to find the will, the strength of character, the determination and the courage to act.

To be sure, the glow from the lights on the menorah will remind us of the courage of our ancestors. But it should also remind us of the courage far less noticed in our own day, namely, of the "ordinary" men and women doing the "extraordinary" that is the minimum of their lot in the building of a better life and a better world.

International arbitration of the Israeli-Egyptian border dispute over the town of Taba in the Sinai began in Geneva and was hailed as proof of the workability of the 1979 peace treaty. Both sides agreed to abide by the arbitrator's ruling, which wasn't expected until 1988.

A holiday message from the premier

On behalf of the government of Ontario, I am delighted to extend warm greetings to readers and staff as you mark Chanukah, the Festival of Lights. In Ontario, we derive our strength and vitality from the cultural and spiritual diversity that defines our great province. The rich heritage and traditions of the Jewish faith do much to give our province its character and heart. Chanukah is a celebration of the triumph of light over darkness, of liberty over slavery – and an affirmation of the inherent dignity of every human being. As you gather with family and friends on this joyous occasion, may the glow of the menorah fill your heart with hope and pride. Please accept my sincere best wishes for a very happy Chanukah.

Premier of Ontario

'The walls have ears'

One winter, my family and I vacationed in the state of Vermont for a few days. We stayed at a motel on the first floor. Since it was Chanukah, we brought along a menorah. After a day of sightseeing, we came back to the motel and I opened the curtains to light the menorah by the window, as I do every year, to proclaim the miracle of the holiday to others (pirsumei nisa). My wife, however, told me not to do so, as we hadn't asked permission and someone outside might tell the front desk who would then tell us to put it out, being a fire hazard. Reluctantly, I listened to my wife, closed the curtains, and lit the menorah on the table. The next morning, I was in the lobby of the motel when a man came over to me and wished me a happy Chanukah. (He could see by my yarmulke that I was Jewish). He then began shaking my hand and thanked me for what I had done for him. I had no idea what he was talking about, so I asked him to explain. He told me that the previous evening when he was in his room, he suddenly heard the words to the Chanukah blessings being chanted in Hebrew. He had completely forgotten that it was Chanukah! The man went out, bought a candle and lit it in his room! He was thanking me for reminding him that it was Chanukah! I learned an important lesson that day. Proclaiming the miracle does not necessarily have to come about through others seeing the miracle. If God wants, He can cause it to come about through others hearing of the miracle! That Chanukah, I understood the expression "the walls have ears" in "a new light."

Philanthropist built bridges between Jews, Arabs

The article on the recent conference, Jews and Arabs in Israel: The Challenge of Living Together, correctly reported that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto hosted the event, the first of its kind in Toronto ("Time to broaden dialogue on Israeli Arabs: UJA" Dec. 8). The conference was generously sponsored by Don Green and the Green family, in memory of the late Irwin Green. Irwin Green was a visionary and pioneering philanthropist who initiated and funded many projects that continue to benefit Jewish and Arab Israelis, especially in the Nazareth area. His projects included an early child development centre, two educational institutes, a soccer stadium, six tennis courts, a summer camp and a girls' vocational school. He became a revered figure in Nazareth, admired for his generosity and commitment to bettering conditions for Israeli Arabs and Jews alike. At the age of 90, Green identified the integration of Israeli Arabs as a pressing issue, and he devoted the last nine years of his life to doing something about it. He died two years ago at the age of 99, three months short of his 100th birthday. It was, therefore, fitting to name the conference after him. Green's example, building bridges between Jewish and Arab communities in Israel, should inspire us to continue the mission of strengthening Israel in this way.

U.S. officials' remarks about Israel spark furor

Adam Kredo
JTA

WASHINGTON — The Obama administration is reaping a whirlwind of criticism in the wake of pointed remarks about Israel by several U.S. officials over three days.

The U.S. ambassador to Belgium, Howard Gutman, caused an uproar when he suggested on Dec. 1 that hostility among European Arabs and Muslims toward Jews was rooted in anger over the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and should be distinguished from traditional forms of anti-semitism. Jewish groups condemned his remarks, which drew calls for his dismissal from Republican presidential front-runners Newt Gingrich and Mitt Romney.

The following day, Defence Secretary Leon Panetta stirred controversy when he told an audience at the Saban Center for Middle East Policy's Forum, an annual Washington conclave for American and Israeli policymakers, that Israel needs to "get to the damn table" to negotiate with the Palestinians and "mend fences" with its neighbours. The Anti-Defamation League expressed "surprise and dismay" at a speech that it said "disproportionately put the onus on Israel to overcome its isolation."

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton made waves a day later at the Saban Forum when she reportedly expressed some concerns about the state of Israeli democracy.

The confluence of controversies has added up to a headache for the Obama administration's Jewish supporters and given fodder to its critics.

"This is the worst weekend we've had in a while," said a Jewish Democratic activist, who spoke on condition of anonymity, referring to the outcry over the remarks.

Each set of remarks share a common theme, said the ADL's national director, Abraham Foxman.

They're "putting all of the onus on Israel, and that's with Panetta, with Hillary and with the ambassador," he said. "It's something that we've had a problem with this administration."

In his wide-ranging speech on U.S.-Israel relations, Panetta said that Israel needed to take steps to alleviate its isolation.

"For example, Israel can reach out and mend fences with those who share an interest in regional stability – countries like Turkey and Egypt, as well as Jordan," Panetta said. "This is an important time to be able to develop and restore those key relationships in this crucial area. This is not impossible. If gestures are rebuked, the world will see those rebukes for what they are. That is exactly why Israel should pursue them."

After the speech, the Saban Center's Kenneth Pollack asked Panetta what steps Israel should take to advance peace. Panetta replied, "Just get to the damn table. Just get to the table. The problem right now is we can't get them to the damn table to at least sit down and begin to discuss their differences – you know, we all know what the pieces are here for a potential agreement."

Gingrich issued a statement condemning Panetta's remarks.

"[U.S. President] Barack Obama must tell the American people today whether he condemns or condones the deeply wrong statements by his secretary of defence and ambassador to Belgium," Gingrich said.

The Zionist Organization of America and the Emergency Committee for Israel – both consistent critics of the Obama administration – also blasted Panetta's remarks. The ADL, however, was the main centrist Jewish group to take public umbrage.

"The defence secretary emphasized the shared U.S. and Israeli interest in deepened strategic co-operation and in countering the Iranian threat," the ADL said in its statement. "But he undermined the sense of assurance that this could have projected by using a prestigious public platform to focus disproportionate responsibility on Israel for the campaign of hostility against her."

The American Jewish Committee seemed less concerned. In a commentary on the group's website, Ed Rettig, the director of its Jerusalem office, wrote that the headlines suggesting Panetta had scolded Israel were not reflective of the content of his speech.

"Contrary to the impression created by some reports, secretary Panetta did not single out Israel for lack of progress in the peace process," Rettig wrote, also noting that Panetta said that both Israel and Turkey need to repair relations.

Clinton's remarks the next day at the Saban Forum were considered off the record and her session was closed to the media. According to news reports based on sources that attended, her speech went over familiar ground, such as the need to restart peace negotiations and the Iranian threat.

But in a question-and-answer session afterward, Clinton reportedly expressed concerns about some aspects of domestic Israeli politics. She was said to have criticized proposed Knesset legislation aimed at curbing foreign funding of Israeli NGOs and gender-segregated bus lines serving haredi Orthodox areas, among other domestic developments.

Israel's finance minister, Yuval Steinitz, was quoted in the Israeli media calling Clinton's remarks "totally exaggerated.

"Israel is a living, breathing liberal democracy," Steinitz said.

If reported accurately, Foxman said, Clinton's comments were "out of line."

"This is a secretary of state who certainly doesn't go out to the Arab Muslim world and criticize them for inequalities," the ADL leader said. "Sure, Israel is not perfect. Human rights could use improvement, but my God, in comparison, I think it's inappropriate, it's excessive."

Clinton has spoken about abuses of women's rights in the Islamic world. In an April address at the U.S.-Islamic World Forum in Washington, she cited progress on addressing abuses of women's rights in some Muslim countries and condemned those "who are actually working to undermine this progress and export a virulently anti-woman ideology to other Muslim communities."

The National Jewish Democratic Council (NJDC) defended Panetta and Clinton.

"What Hillary Clinton is saying is what American Jewish leaders of all stripes have said," said David A. Harris, the NJDC's president and CEO. "It's a pressing concern in our community."

Harris also said that Panetta gave "a powerhouse speech," one that encouraged "Israel to take bold steps" and that mainly focused on "how America is helping to secure Israel."

Foxman, however, described the administration's attitude toward Israel as "bifurcated." He said that while the Obama administration has brought the U.S.-Israeli military alliance to new-found heights, it also has "done more politically to distance itself" from Israel.

"They're trying to balance" between support for Israel and criticism of it, Foxman said, "and it's not working."

Jewish groups were more united in their disapproval of Gutman's remarks, which he delivered at an event hosted by the European Jewish Union in Brussels.

Gutman noted "the problem within Europe of tension, hatred and sometimes even violence between some members of Muslim communities or Arab immigrant groups and Jews." He argued that the problem is "largely born of and reflecting the tension between Israel, the Palestinian territories and neighbouring Arab states in the Middle East over the continuing Israeli-Palestinian problem."

Advancing peace between Israel and its neighbours was the key to addressing this issue, he said.

Gutman's framing of the issue rubbed many in the Jewish community the wrong way.

"Unfortunately, this administration's policies of 'daylight' and pressure toward our ally Israel encourage the dangerously misguided tendency to make excuses for antisemitic hatred and bigotry," Matthew Brooks, the Republican Jewish Coalition's executive director, said in a statement.

His comments also prompted a rebuke from the NJDC's Harris, although he declined to say whether Gutman should resign.

"Ambassador Gutman's comments were wrong and unfortunate, and the White House was right to issue their immediate, tough statement," said Harris, referring to a statement sent to Jewish leaders and others.

In the statement, the White House said that "we condemn antisemitism in all its forms, and that there is never any justification for prejudice against the Jewish people or Israel."

However, at a recent briefing, State Department spokesperson Mark Toner said that Gutman, a prominent Democratic fundraiser, will not be asked to leave his post. Toner said that Gutman had the administration's "full confidence." He also said that the views expressed by Gutman were the envoy's and not the administration's.

Gutman has said that his remarks were "misinterpreted" and that he condemns all forms of antisemitism.

Barbara Goldberg Goldman, who was co-chair of the Obama campaign's Jewish Community Leadership team in 2008 alongside Gutman and others, said she has "the utmost confidence that his intention was never to disparage Israel or her policies towards the peace process."

"Knowing Ambassador Gutman and knowing his stanch pro-Israel stance," Goldman added, "I would hope he'd be given an opportunity to address the criticism."

Keep your fundamentalist hands off the IDF!

Upon making aliyah more than 30 years ago, there were many uniquely Israeli phenomena I had to get used to. One of them occurred Saturday afternoons during the summer. Strolling in any town or city, you'd hear a popular radio show bellowing from every second home. Appropriately named Shirim veSha'arim (Songs and Goals), it broadcast soccer games from stadiums around the country. Almost everyone's favorite announcer was Zoher Bahalul, an Israeli Arab with wonderfully descriptive Hebrew. He was the Foster Hewitt of Israeli soccer.

Saturday afternoon soccer is a thing of the past, another victim of a worrying trend toward Jewish fundamentalism that's sweeping through this country.

There are many examples of these developments within Israeli society, but having spent almost 25 years in the Israel Defence Forces, I'm finding it particularly troubling to learn of some of the changes occurring within this most integrative of Israeli institutions.

The last decade or so has seen a surge in the number of middle- and upper-echelon officers coming from religious backgrounds. These men, who have mostly grown up in the national religious public school system, are now leading combat brigades and battalions and have replaced the kibbutzniks as the IDF's fighting backbone. They are highly motivated, intelligent and very Zionistic. A true blessing. But their preponderance is beginning to affect the military.

During the last few years, an ongoing conflict has been seething between the IDF's Education Corps and the Military Rabbinate. According to the army's website, the former is tasked with teaching soldiers

Yair Lootsteen

in Jerusalem

"values the IDF and Israeli society wish the youth to emulate; the tradition and history of the Jewish nation, battle history of the IDF, military unit history," while the latter's military rabbis "are responsible for providing all religious needs for soldiers serving in their units."

Things came to head during Operation Cast Lead two years ago, when military rabbis accompanying the troops entering Gaza provided them with moral and spiritual support before they went into battle. That would seem appropriate, but some of this encouragement came in the form of communal prayers, where entire units were required to participate, and the distribution of questionable Military Rabbinate documents in which soldiers were told, for instance, that "[there is] a biblical ban on surrendering a single millimeter of [the Land of Israel] to gentiles," and that "when you show mercy to a cruel enemy, you are being cruel to pure and honest soldiers. This is terribly immoral."

Since then, a debate has continued within and outside the IDF about the Military Rabbinate's role and who should be instilling soldiers with values, Jewish or otherwise. It's clear to me the rabbinate should go back to its core responsibility of providing IDF units with religious services, much like the Military Advocate General's Corps, in which I served, provides the IDF with legal services.

As for values, leave them to the Education Corps. It runs courses and workshops exposing military personnel to divergent opinions on many of the complex issues faced by soldiers and Israelis in general. These programs broaden knowledge without towing particular political or religious ideologies, something that can no longer be said about the rabbinate's course of action.

The prevalence of Orthodox officers and the Military Rabbinate's growing influence is affecting other aspects of the military milieu, particularly in gender-related issues.

In 1995, Alice Miller, a young woman bent on becoming an air force pilot, successfully challenged the IDF in the courts, forcing it to allow women to compete for places in pilot training programs. Ever since, military tasks, including some combat positions, have increasingly opened for women. In June of this year, Orna Barbivai became the first woman to be promoted to major general, as head of the IDF's human resources branch.

But recently, ominous winds of change have emerged. Orthodox soldiers, supported by their rabbis, are disobeying orders to attend army events at which women sing. Female soldiers who danced separately at military Simchat Torah festivities were forced to move into a fenced-off enclosure so men could not see them. And most alarmingly, a special committee's report on how to better integrate women into the military has inexplicably been shelved.

I can live without Saturday afternoon soccer, but the IDF is too important – to security, but no less essentially as the great equalizer in Israeli society.

Rabbis: keep your fundamentalist hands off Tzahal!

Israel sits tight amid regional chaos

Israel has always had to cope with the consequences of being located in a dangerous neighbourhood, but in the past year, the instability has reached unprecedented levels. The harsh dictatorships in Libya, Yemen and Egypt have been replaced, the Syrian police-state is on the verge of collapse, and the rest of the region – from North Africa to Iran – is boiling.

Under the circumstances, all predictions should be taken with more than a grain of salt. We may see the return of mafia-like dictatorships, under different management, or some cases, such as Libya and Syria, where the artificial state structures may collapse in civil war between tribes and other power centres. A similar fate could await Iraq after the departure of the American forces that have kept the various groups – Kurds, Sunnis, Shiites and others – in a somewhat united national framework.

In general, Islamist forces are gaining power, as demonstrated by the parliamentary elections in Egypt and Tunisia. The myths of the "Arab Spring," with hopes for liberal democracy and tolerance for differing views and religions, have been replaced by the realities of a cold "Islamic Winter."

The failure of western governments and powerful organizations claiming to promote human rights to invest in these societies is reflected in the meagre results. Human Rights Watch formed an alliance with the Gadhafi family that terrorized Libya, and collected money from wealthy Saudis in order to attack Israel. As a result, the few democracy activists in these countries remain isolated and have no impact. In this environment, there is little that outsiders can do to influence events. The revolutions are strictly internal Arab issues, and Israel, while not loved, is largely ignored and irrelevant.

Therefore, the best policy for Jerusalem is to keep a low profile and wait for the processes to play themselves out – which is exactly the approach being taken by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

In terms of Israeli security, there is both good and bad news. On the positive side, the national armies and major terror groups are growing weaker as a result of the disintegration. In Egypt, the military has lost most of its power, and in Syria, factions of Bashar Assad's rusting army and air force are fighting each other. It will take years for new rulers to restore a serious fighting force capable of attacking Israel directly, if they choose to repeat the mistakes of their predecessors. In Lebanon, Hezbollah's strategic shield, provided by the Syrian army, is disintegrating, and Iran can only plug some of the holes. As a result, the Israeli military should be able to deter Hezbollah from attacking.

Gerald Steinberg

in Jerusalem

But the bad news is that the potential for increased terror attacks has grown. After the 1979 peace treaty, the Egyptian regime was careful to avoid military conflict with Israel, and for the most part, kept Hamas from using Sinai to plan and implement terror attacks against Israel.

Similarly, in the north, Syria kept the border along the Golan Heights quiet, instead encouraging the proxy war via Hezbollah. But as these regimes crumble, the potential for cross-border or missile attacks launched by terror groups will increase. As a result, Israeli security forces must redouble anti-terror capabilities, and be prepared to strike missile launchers before they are used.

Finally, these events have put the peace efforts with the Palestinians in perspective – this conflict is only one source of instability, and not the major factor. Even Israelis in the "peace camp" realize that an agreement, if it becomes feasible, would not ensure stability along Israel's borders while the region continues to boil over.

As a result of these factors, the "new Middle East" that is emerging will be very different from the old one that Israel has faced for the past 63 years. Many options are open – some with opportunities, and others that will pose difficult challenges – and Israeli leaders will need to demonstrate a high degree of flexibility and intelligence in responding appropriately.

A cornucopia of books ...

Chanukah is around the corner, and if you're thinking of giving someone a useful gift to brighten up the Festival of Lights, buy a book. The following books, published recently, will appeal to a wide range of tastes. Let's begin with the Middle East, a strategic region whose tensions invariably affect countries near and far.

The Origins of Israel, 1882-1948: A Documentary History (University of Wisconsin Press), edited by Eran Kaplan and Derek J. Penslar, contains 62 diverse documents reflecting the ferment and anxiety that permeated the Zionist movement prior to Israel's establishment. Focusing on social, cultural and economic issues rather than Zionist ideology and diplomacy, this informative volume presents essays from such major figures as Vladimir Jabotinsky, Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, Chaim Weizmann, Chaim Arlosoroff and Arthur Ruppin.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In Ben-Gurion: A Political Life (Schocken), Shimon Peres, Israel's current president, recalls the high points of the first prime minister's career in conversation with David Landau, an Israeli journalist who currently writes for the Economist. Peres, Ben-Gurion's protégé, has tremendous regard for his mentor, whom he describes as "the founding father of Israel" and a "modern-day prophet."

The eminent scientist Albert Einstein had a complex and sometimes stormy relationship with Zionism, yet he affiliated himself with it and became a spokesperson for a Jewish homeland in Palestine. In Einstein Before Israel (Princeton University Press), Ze'ev Rosenkranz deftly traces his involvement with Zionism.

Yehezkel Dror, in Israeli Statecraft: National Security Challenges and Responses (Routledge), examines Israel's diplomacy since its inception as a state. The author, an Israeli political analyst, uses his skills to study issues past and present, including the challenge posed by Iran's desire to acquire a nuclear arsenal.

Simon Sebag Montefiore's magnum opus, Jerusalem: The Biography (Alfred A. Knopf), may be the last word on the topic. Deeply researched and profoundly comprehensive, this is a definitive work.

Tel Aviv, The First Century: Visions, Designs, Actualities (Indiana University Press), edited by Maoz Azaryahu and S. Ilan Troen, looks at this vibrant, cosmopolitan city in terms of its municipal development and its place in Israel's literary imagination. The essays are stimulating and original.

Sara Roy, in Hamas and Civil Society in Gaza: Engaging the Islamist Social Sector (Princeton University Press), soberly argues that Hamas, far from being only a terrorist organization devoted to violence, hews to a moderate approach in community development and civic restoration.

Hizbullah's Identity Construction (Amsterdam University Press by Joseph Alagha, is a rather dry analysis of how this political and social movement – Hamas' counterpart in Lebanon – has evolved.

Written after Osama bin Laden's death last May and based in part on interviews with jihadis, The Rise and Fall of Al-Qaeda (Oxford University Press), by Fawaz A. Gerges, is a sober account of an organization that still inspires dread and fear. But according to Gerges, Al Qaeda has degenerated into a marginal entity.

In light of last winter's revolution and the continuing turmoil and uncertainty in Egypt, Robert L. Tignor's Egypt: A Short History is most timely. Tignor's narrative is cogent, taking a reader from the beginning of human settlement in the Nile Valley to the present day. In an afterword, he predicts that the Muslim Brotherhood will win many seats, maybe even a majority, in fair and free elections.

Daniel Yergin's The Quest: Energy, Security, and the Remaking of the Modern World (Penguin) is both current and historical, a sweeping account about the battle for control of oil and the role that renewable sources of energy – solar, wind and biofuels – may play in the future.

The pre-eminent historian and biographer of Adolf Hitler, Ian Kershaw, expertly explains in The End: The Defiance and Destruction of Hitler's Germany, 1944-1945 (Penguin) how this demonic regime was able to survive despite a succession of battlefield defeats. He ascribes the regime's longevity and durability to, among other factors, its ferocious terror apparatus, which was partly controlled by SS chieftain Heinrich Himmler.

In Heinrich Himmler (Oxford University Press), Peter Longerich has produced an exhaustive and intriguing biography of a sinister and idiosyncratic manipulator who moulded the SS in his own image.

Caroline Moorhead's A Train in Winter (Random House) is the remarkable story of the only Auschwitz-bound train whose 230 female passengers, aged 15 to 68, belonged to the resistance in France. This is a tale of courage and endurance.

Maus is a comic book classic about the Holocaust. In Meta Maus (Pantheon), Art Spiegelman, the author, explains the creative process that led to its publication.

Gertrude Stein, Ernest Hemingway's Jewish muse in 1920s Paris, embarked on one of the strangest of projects when she agreed to translate the speeches of Nazi collaborator Marshal Henri Philippe Petain into English. Barbara Will, in Unlikely Collaboration (Columbia University Press), delves into this troubling intellectual exercise.

The late Jan Karski, a courier for Poland's government-in-exile during World War II and one of the first eyewitnesses to inform the Allies about the Holocaust in Poland, wrote an account of his mission, Story of a Secret State, which was originally published in the United States in 1944. This moving, heartfelt book has been reissued by Penguin Classics. Read and weep.

Toronto cultural heritage lawyer Bonnie Czegledi, in Crimes Against Art (Carswell), writes authoritatively about the phenomenon of art theft in the past century. Her chapter on the Holocaust era, though brief, is incisive.

The Scattered Tribe (Guilford), by Ben Frank, is a seasoned journalist's observations of far-flung Jewish communities in Russia, Asia, the Middle East and Cuba. Last Folio: Textures of Jewish Life in Slovakia (Indiana University Press), by Yuri Dojc and Katya Krausova, is visually stunning and verbally bold.

Cultural Revolution in Berlin: Jews in the Age of Enlightenment (Oxford University Press), by Shmuel Feiner and Natalie Naimark-Goldberg, recounts the process of secularization in the 18th century. Forced Baptism (University of California Press), by Marina Caffiero, chronicles 16th- to 19th-century efforts by the Vatican to convert Jews in Rome. Arthur Daniel Hart's The Jew in Canada, first published in 1926, has been reissued by Now & Then Books, which has also published Shmuel Mayer Shapiro's The Rise of the Toronto Jewish Community, written in the 1940s but not published in his lifetime. Harold Troper's The Defining Decade (University of Toronto Press) argues, quite convincingly, that the 1960s were a catalyst for change in Canada's Jewish community.

In general: Lost in Shangri-La (HarperCollins), by Mitchell Zuckoff, is an incredible World War II story of survival. Leningrad (Penguin), by Anna Reid, is about the Nazi siege of this Russian city. Nial Ferguson's Civilization: The West and the Rest (Penguin) is a bracing account of how western nations rose to dominance. Empires in World History (Princeton University Press), by Jane Burbank and Frederick Cooper, charts the rise and fall of major empires. In Pakistan: Terrorism Ground Zero (University of Chicago Press), Rohan Gunaratna and Khuram Iqbal examine terrorist groups operating out of Pakistan.

Former chief rabbi lauds Rothschilds

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, speaking at a tribute dinner for Kurt and Edith Rothschild Sunday night, said he doesn't know of another public figure who is admired by all sectors of the community – "from the right to the left, from more religious to less religious, from Orthodox to non-Orthodox" – as Kurt Rothschild is.

Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau

The Toronto philanthropist and his wife, Edith, were honoured for their recent move to Israel. Some 800 people attended the event, held at Toronto's Sheraton Centre and sponsored by Mizrachi Canada and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Rabbi Lau, the chief rabbi of Tel Aviv and former Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel, travelled to Toronto just for the dinner and stayed only one day. He said that a "real" educator, referring to Rothschild, teaches through his behaviour rather than his words.

Alluding to Rothschild's advanced age (the Rothschilds met more than 60 years ago, when both were 29), Rabbi Lau called him "a pillar of fire, speaking, now, about aliyah."

Dinner chair Julia Koschitzky noted that at age 30, Rothschild was already president of Mizrachi in Montreal. An engineer by profession Rothschild has made community work his full-time avocation since 1987, when he sold his national contracting business.

In a video made for the evening, Edith Rothschild – a cookbook author, former president of Emunah, and advocate of a holistic lifestyle – said that Kurt would not be able to do what he does "if he was eating meat a few times a week like other men. No way."

Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of the federation, echoed Rabbi Lau's comments in the video, telling Rothschild he was one of the few people who "can keep those bridges" between different parts of the Jewish community. "It seems with every generation, the bridges get more stressed and strained."

Money raised at the dinner will support communal projects, including Jewish schools in Russia, and scholarships for high school graduates wanting to pursue a year or two of study in Israel. A great-grandfather 38 times over, Rothschild stressed the need for Jewish education.

As well, he said, "in a very divisive world, mutual understanding between all factions, and within Orthodoxy itself, is a goal we should strive for and pursue."

Both Rothschilds grew up in modern Orthodox homes in Germany. Edith credited the Ezra youth movement, which both of them belonged to, for instilling a love of and yearning for Israel.

"Both of us are of the Holocaust generation, but not of the Holocaust," she said.

To demonstrate her belief in living a "useful" life, she showed attendees the pearls that had been removed from her necklace to adjust its length. "Each of these is just as precious as each one on my strand. They will never lose their intrinsic value, but they're useless even though they are precious, because they're rolling around in their little box... They're not connected to the whole."

Mount Sinai panel examines domestic violence

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Violence against women is a serious health-care issue, said a family physician and a member of Mount Sinai Hospital's violence against women awareness committee.

Dr. Anne Biringer was speaking at Mount Sinai on Dec. 6, the 20th annual National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence Against Women. The day marks the anniversary of the Montreal Massacre of Dec. 6, 1989, at L'École Polytechnique in Montreal, where 14 young engineering students were shot and killed.

Also speaking was Mike Layton, Toronto councillor for Ward 19, who is active on the White Ribbon Campaign to end male violence against women. He's the son of the late NDP leader Jack Layton, who was part of a handful of men who decided in 1991 that they had a responsibility to urge men to speak out against violence against women.

Speaking about intimate partner violence, Biringer said that all women are at risk, but all women are not at equal risk.

"The women may present themselves at any part of the hospital – to the emergency room, the dentist, a social worker – with any number of ailments including broken bones, abdominal pain, palpitations or psychological issues.

Mike Layton signing the pledge to stop violence against women, alongside Christine Bradshaw, social worker and co-chair of the Violence Against Women Awareness Committee, Mount Sinai Hospital.

"Health-care providers need to identify the issue, be aware of 'recurrent' accidents and provide medical care and support in a confidential environment. We must let women know they are not alone, and they are not to blame."

Biringer said that if a woman says that she has been abused, "we have to believe her, ask her if she is safe, and provide her with resources. If children are in danger, we need to call [children's] aid."

Layton said that he is saddened that "we still need to be here, that there is still such hurt, hate, and despair.

"I am also saddened that as men, we haven't broken the bonds of violence against women. Many men have worked hard, but violence and inequality persevere. It makes me upset and angry."

For many, he said, violence is passed down to the next generation, and "that needs to stop. Violence against women causes as much death in women of reproductive age, as cancer."

The men who started the White Ribbon Campaign understood that in order to stop male violence, they had to confront the males, he said.

"We need to educate men that violence against women cannot be tolerated. Jack decided on the white ribbon, because it is a visible symbol, [which] can lead to dialogue and awareness," Layton said.

The campaign, which started out in his bedroom in his father's house, he said, tries to conquer violence in both directions. "We must do all we can to stop violence, and remove women from violence. We must continue to show that love is better than anger."

Christine Bradshaw, a social worker, and co-chair of the hospital's violence against women committee, said the committee started in 1977 in response to the death of a woman who was murdered by her husband. "If it had been properly assessed, [perhaps] her death could have been prevented."

The original goals of the committee persist today, she said, "to [let people know] that violence against women is a serious issue."

TAU president visits counterparts, students

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Tel Aviv University president Joseph Klafter was in Toronto and Montreal late last month to entice more Canadian students to enrol in his school, as well as to attract more donors and seek partnerships with Canadian universities.

Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, which raises awareness and funds for Israel's largest university, arranged for Klafter to meet with Canadian university presidents, including University of Toronto president David Naylor, Ryerson University president Sheldon Levy, and McGill University president Heather Munroe-Blum, to explore partnership and exchange opportunities.

"We are going quite strongly in the direction of becoming more international and global," Klafter said in an interview in the lobby of Toronto's King Edward Hotel.

One of Klafter's strategies is to develop more programs in English to attract more international students.

Among the 30,000 TAU students, there are between 80 and 100 Canadian students and about 1,000 non-Israeli students enrolled in TAU's overseas studies program.

"Our plan is to double the number in a couple years. This academic year, we opened about a dozen master's programs in English, ranging from Jewish studies to business, to conflict resolution to dealing with trauma, and the number is going to grow."

He said in the next academic year, TAU plans to launch two undergraduate degrees in English, one in liberal arts and another in electrical engineering.

Klafter added that attracting foreign students can benefit both the university and the Jewish state.

"It helps the university economically… and from a Zionistic point of view, I think it shows [students that] Israel is not just a conflict country… I think we are producing goodwill ambassadors of Israel for the future," he said.

"It's quite moving to see Indian students, students from Africa, New Zealand knowing some words in Hebrew, talking with such enthusiasm about Israel, and if they were to have remained at home watching television, their perception of Israel would be very different."

Since Klafter, a former chemistry professor, became president two years ago, he has worked tirelessly to promote the school's interdisciplinary approach, which, he added, has been widely embraced by his faculty.

"In my own background, I was raised as a physicist and mathematician, and then I did my PhD in chemistry… so I really encourage interdisciplinary interactions between faculties and departments."

Joseph Klafter

Klafter spoke about TAU's school for neurosciences, which is in its first year.

"Besides being a kind of centre for researchers to interact with each other, this is a school that educates students from the undergraduate level to the master's and PhD level… with an emphasis on brain research."

In line with the school's interdisciplinary approach, seven of TAU's nine faculties are participating in the school of neurosciences.

Klafter said he hoped his time in Toronto and Montreal would strengthen ties with the Canadian friends organizations, as well as with the academic community.

"I think we can have very fruitful collaborations between the universities in Canada and Tel Aviv University."

While in Toronto, Klafter also met with Ontario Health Minister Deb Matthews, and Training, Colleges and Universities minister Glen Murray to promote TAU's multi-disciplinary programs.

Because TAU has one of the most respected film schools in the world, Klafter also set aside some time to meet with Piers Handling, the Toronto International Film Festival's director and CEO.

All people 'deserve respect, dignity, security'

He wrote that as "Torah Jews," Chabad believes that all people are created in God's image and as such deserve respect, dignity and security.

While lauding the spirit of the anti-bullying legislation, Rabbi Kaplan said he had "serious concerns" about the sex-education component that he said "encroaches on the religious freedoms guaranteed to all Canadians" under the Charter of Human Rights.

"[The bill] further calls for children to be indoctrinated to reject the faith of their parents and the family values they have been taught," he wrote.

"Let me be clear: we strongly support the need to protect our children from bullies. What we cannot, in good conscience, support is a law that calls on those of faith to abandon beliefs considered sacred all in the name of political correctness."

He added: "There are those who will disingenuously and cynically attempt to cast our defence of biblically ordained moral codes, teachings and doctrines as a phobia or form of bigotry. Such deliberate distortion is deceitful, libelous and simply wrong."

Rabbi Kaplan noted that while Jewish school boards might not be affected by the legislation, any Hebrew school or synagogue that rents space in a public school would be at risk of falling under "the direct censorship of the McGuinty Liberals and/or their appointees."

According to the Ministry of Education, the province does not inspect private elementary schools and they're not obliged to use the provincial curriculum, while private secondary schools that grant credits are only subject to inspection for their standard of instruction.

Ministry spokesperson Gary Wheeler clarified that the bill would not force Jewish schools and synagogues that rent space from a public school board to "to abandon their own standards."

Bill 13 would only require such organizations to follow standards "that are consistent with" the Provincial Code of Conduct for schools, Wheeler said.

The code's purpose, among other things, is to ensure that all members of a school community are treated with respect and dignity. It also aims to maintain an environment in which conflict and difference are addressed with respect and civility, and to promote the safety of people in schools.

If Bill 13 passes, the code will be amended to include the line "to prevent bullying in schools," Wheeler told The CJN.

Meanwhile, Shulman said the federation doesn't require Jewish day schools that it funds to offer courses or activities for students on the topic of sexual orientation. Instead, he said, the federation leaves it up to schools to determine their own policies on the issue.

In a statement, the coalition said that it supports anti-bullying legislation in theory, but the aspect of the bill regarding sex education has nothing to do with bullying. It said the law would require schools to accept curriculum that "undermines" Jewish, Catholic and Muslim "morality on sexuality and marriage."

Howard English, senior vice-president of the Greater Toronto region and university affairs for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said his organization "supports" all efforts to protect students from bullying, but, "in implementing measures to ensure the safety of students, we urge the government to take into consideration the diverse religious views of Ontarians."

Fonseca claimed the bill was drafted without consultation of parents groups and was heavily influenced by "radical" lesbian and gay activist organizations.

Ontario Education Minister Laurel Broten dismissed the concerns, telling CTV News on Dec. 6 that opposition to the legislation was "homophobic."

"There's absolutely nothing radical about working hard as a community to make sure that every single student in our schools can be safe and accepted and succeed," Broten said.

Paul Shaviv

Shaviv leaving CHAT in June

Paul Shaviv, director of education of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, will leave the school in June after 14 years of service. He will become head of school at Ramaz, a well-known modern Orthodox day school in Manhattan, which runs from kindergarten to Grade 12.

In a Dec. 8 e-mail to his staff, Shaviv said that leading TanenbaumCHAT since 1998 has been "a truly wonderful experience."

School president Cecile Zaifman wrote in her letter to school staff, families and friends that Shaviv oversaw the establishment of TanenbaumCHAT's temporary second campus in Richmond Hill and played a significant role in opening its permanent campus in Vaughan.

She noted that he is leaving to spend more time with his wife, Michelle, who lives in the United States. Shaviv's first wife, Judy, died in 2008.

Kids for Kindness brings 'sunshine' to seniors

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Chabad Lubavitch of Markham has placed a greater focus on its chesed programming for children as young as five to take an active role in helping others.

The shul's youth director, Rabbi Meir Gitlin, who works with his wife, Esther, said that "getting the kids involved is very important."

He said parents had expressed a desire for more chesed activities to complement their young children's educational and social programming.

The shul's youth leaders Mattie Plotkin and Kiki (short for Rivka) Halperin, both 20, launched the first Kids for Kindness (K4K) event last month, when more than 50 five-to-12-year-olds baked challahs and delivered them to Richmond Hill Leisureworld, a seniors home, where they also sang Shabbat songs for the residents.

Each child started a conversation with a resident, said Plotkin, who like Halperin is a graduate of a teachers seminary in Israel. "It was incredible to see these kids with such confidence... We're going to try to spread sunshine all over."

The K4K programs, which will run monthly, will be held at different seniors homes, and each will have a theme. The next one will be Chanukah-related.

"All our programs are not just for us to have fun, but to have an aspect of tikkun olam," said Plotkin, whose father is the shul's rabbi.

"It's important to give back to society," Halperin said.

Allison Solomon, chair of the shul's sisterhood, said she thinks one of the biggest challenges parents face is teaching their young children to give back to the community. Most of the food banks, she noted, require volunteers to be at least 16 years old.

She said she wanted her children – three sons, 5, 7 and 9 – to "experience the joy of giving back."

Solomon said she believes they "really get it" after participating in the program.

"I think everybody found it to be extremely meaningful.

'Stars' come out for Ve'ahavta gala

Humanitarians honoured for leadership

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Hundreds of people recently gathered at Starry Nights: Ve'ahavta's Tikun Olam Awards Ceremony to celebrate deserving humanitarians for their leadership and bravery.

The ninth annual event, held on Dec. 4 at the Telus Centre for Performance and Learning in Toronto, raised $600,000 for Ve'ahavta's local community poverty relief projects.

Founded in 1996 by Avrum Rosensweig, Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, assists people in need in North and South America, Africa, Asia and Israel through volunteerism, education and acts of kindness. The organization is inspired by the Torah's commandment "Ve'ahavta l'rayecha kamocha" ("Love your neighbour as you love yourself") and by the Jewish values of justice and repairing the world.

Ve'ahavta has sent millions of dollars in humanitarian aid and has provided thousands of hours of health care and professional training to local practitioners in its international client communities. Its crisis team has responded to earthquakes, floods and tsunamis abroad. The committee is also involved in projects to alleviate poverty in Canada.

This year's ceremony honoured six people in the areas of humanitarianism, medicine, community development, Holocaust remembrance and youth leadership. The evening was hosted by CBC's Jian Ghomeshi and featured a musical performance by Juno Award-winning artist Chantal Kreviazuk.

Awards were presented to Alice Bartole, founder of the House of Hope orphanage in Haiti; Dr. Isador Lieberman, world-renown orthopedic surgeon and founder of the Uganda Spine Surgery Mission and Uganda Torah Mission; Karen Goldenberg, former president and CEO of Jewish Vocational Services Toronto; Nate Leipciger and Pinchas Gutter, dedicated Holocaust educators and active participants in the March of the Living, and Bilaal Rajan, 15, environmental activist and founder of Making Change Now.

"It's important to bring to light regular people who are doing extraordinary things," said Kreviazuk, who is a supporter of War Child Canada and is committed to human rights causes. "This event is an amazing movement of giving and sharing. We have too much and don't need it all. Our values need to be shifted. We must look at achievement from a different angle."

Ghomeshi said he loves the "borderlessness" of Starry Nights. "It's a philosophy of wanting to demonstrate integrity, value and the collective generosity of the community working together. We must lead by example."

Attendees were given kits made up of supplies needed by people who live on the streets and were encouraged to hand them out the next time they see someone who could benefit from the help.

"Starry Nights raises consciousness and funds," said Rosensweig. "We look up into the sky and see stars. Jewish people have been compared to stars. It's the idea of recognizing that we're all part of the cosmos and have the responsibility to repair our world."

Rosensweig said the event is "unique and spirited" and gives a strong sense of Ve'ahavta's pillars. "We live in blessed times, and many of us are very fortunate to have the ability to play an important and big role in tikkun olam. We want people to hear our message – look inside yourself, see what your strengths are and share them. If you will it, it can get done. You can make big changes. Everything starts with one person. Make sure to commit."

He said he is most excited about the impact that the evening will have on the guests. "I look forward to the end, the aftermath. When we do this well, people leave feeling empowered. They feel they can really do something positive and substantial."

Egyptian Islamists' electoral success no surprise

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Many journalists and pundits, including some tasked with covering the Middle East, have expressed surprise that Islamists dominated the first round of elections in Egypt, taking about 63 per cent of the vote (37 per cent for the Freedom and Justice Party of the Muslim Brotherhood and 26 per cent for the al-Nour Party of the "more extreme" Salafists).

Yet they shouldn't have been surprised at all. Reliable polling conducted over the past few years has consistently shown that Egypt is one of the most religiously conservative countries in the Arab and Islamic worlds. Data compiled by the PEW Center and Gallup show a substantial majority of Egyptians wanting to be governed by sharia law. This is not to say that Egyptians are prone to fanaticism, but rather to a traditional fundamentalism.

Why, then, have so many reporters and commentators ignored the empirical evidence? Are they too wedded instead to the promising image of young, Facebook-surfing, English-speaking liberal reformers in Tahrir Square? Did these journalists (and their editors back home in the West) excessively amplify the role of liberals under the assumption that they were highly representative of the broader population? Was this, then, more or less a case of seeing only what one wishes to see?

If journalists paid little or no attention to the polling data, how many at least ventured beyond Tahrir Square, to those districts where many of the Cairo's approximately 13 million residents live in grinding poverty and place their faith in Islam and Islamist politics? A few did.

Demonstrators in Tahrir Square in Cairo

In the run-up to the November elections, the Globe and Mail's Patrick Martin went to one such area just a few miles from the square, where, he reported, residents are so "unspeakably poor" as to "mak[e] even the Gaza Strip look prosperous in comparison."

What of the other cities and towns outside of Cairo? How did the once cosmopolitan and liberal centre of Alexandria (back in the 1920s) become the headquarters, as it is today, of the Salafists? It's noteworthy that president Gamal Abdel Nasser's revolution in the 50s, which saw the eviction of Christians, Armenians, Greeks and Jews, had much to do with this transformation.

What about the large rural areas of Egypt, where so many extremely poor and illiterate residents live? If the Islamists obtain a majority in Cairo, where liberals garnered no more than 15 per cent of the vote, what will be the election results in these other areas, which will account for two-thirds of the lower house in Egypt's parliament?

It is, of course, not just the poor who support the Islamists. The Brotherhood has long had substantial support from educated and middle-class professionals who control the medical, legal and journalist guilds that have bitterly shunned Israel since the signing of the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty in 1979.

Yet even some longtime observers of the Arab world who are only now saying that we shouldn't be surprised by the strong Islamist showing betray a failure to grasp what's really at issue.

For instance, the New York Times' Thomas Friedman wrote (Dec. 7): "Given the way that the military regimes in the Arab world decimated all independent secular political parties over the last 50 years, there is little chance of any Arab country going from Mubarak to Jefferson without going through some Khomeini." In other words, Friedman assumes that if only secularists (or liberals) had been given an opportunity to organize, they would have fared better during the elections. Again, there's no evidence that there's a wider base in Egyptian society to sustain this notion. The idea that, if just offered a chance, everyone would strive to be "just like us" is counterfactual. Indeed, if anything, secularism, where it has existed, is in retreat in the Middle East (Lebanon being a prime example).

No matter what the spokespeople of the "moderate" Muslim Brotherhood tell western journalists about their party's commitment to tolerance and pluralism, including for women and religious minorities, these liberal values do not accurately reflect the Brotherhood – or the views of the majority of Egyptians, for that matter.

Paul Michaels is director of research and media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Religious symbols removed from city hall

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Congregation Beth-El has protested the Town of Mount Royal's decision to remove a menorah and a nativity scene from outside the town hall, while maintaining a Christmas tree.

In a Dec. 6 letter to Mayor Philippe Roy, Rabbi Allan Langner, Beth-El's rabbi emeritus, said the lighting of the menorah during Chanukah was enjoyed by Jews and non-Jews alike for many years.

The six-member council of the town of 19,000 unanimously decided to limit decorations to the tree after a group of Muslim residents reportedly asked town officials if Islamic symbols could be added to the holiday display.

According to the 2001 Canadian census, 12 per cent of TMR residents were Jewish and 5.5 per cent Muslim.

Rabbi Allan Langner

Rabbi Langner, who has served Beth-El since 1959, recalled that it was during the tenure of Mayor Reginald Dawson more than 40 years ago that the menorah was first erected outside the town hall, in co-operation with Beth-El, the only synagogue in TMR.

"Mayor Dawson initiated the ceremony together with the town council of that day, none of whom was Jewish. It was done as a gesture of goodwill toward the Jewish community, and was widely appreciated," Rabbi Langner wrote. The ceremony included the reciting of blessings and singing Chanukah songs.

He recalled that representatives of Christian churches attended the lighting. "Indeed, there were those even who were neither Jewish nor Christian... It was a time for members of the diverse communities of TMR to come together."

Rabbi Langner argues that, although the Chanukah menorah may be viewed as a religious symbol, the holiday is "primarily a celebration of an historic event...

"The menorah symbolizes a beacon of light for those who are committed to freedom and peace, and the hope that they will one day attain it."

The town has given its menorah to Beth-El.

However, Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Côte St. Luc's Congregation Beth Israel-Beth Aaron said TMR is "absolutely correct" in removing religious symbols from the seat of muncipal government.

"Anyone who says the menorah is not a religious symbol is wrong, because its lighting involves the reciting of prayers," said Rabbi Poupko, a member of the local executive of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

"This is just common sense in how to function in a pluralistic society and in sync with countless court rulings around North America."

The nativity is also clearly religious, to Rabbi Poupko's mind, because it depicts the birth of Jesus.

He said trees and lights are not generally perceived as religious symbols by society today, and he personally has no objection to their presence on civic property and, in fact, enjoys the festive lights.

If municipalities or other civic institutions want to mark the Chanukah season in a non-religious way, they could decorate with dreidels or pictures of latkes, he suggested.

A week earlier, Rabbi Poupko spoke out against a directive from the management of the federal Complexe Guy Favreau, which houses Service Canada, banning Christmas decorations of any kind.

That memo was overturned by Human Resources Minister Diane Finley, who confirmed that holiday decorations are permitted inside federal buildings.

Like Rabbi Langer, Rabbi Moishe Krasnanski, director of Chabad of the Town, also objects to the banishment of the menorah.

"I think this is a terrible thing for the Jewish community and every community. The way to respond to the Muslims who want to have their symbol is not to wipe out other peoples'. This is very wrong."

The menorah carries a universal message of light over darkness, or good over evil, he said.

"We have freedom of religion and expression in this country. The country should be upholding religion, not taking it away."

Chabad was not involved with the menorah lighting in TMR, but it does put up menorahs around the Montreal area and Laurentians.

"In fact, there are thousands of menorahs from Chabad around the world – in front of the White House, the Eiffel Tower – and there has been no issue. Nor should there be," Rabbi Krasnanski said.

B'nai Brith Canada-Quebec called upon the TMR council to reverse its decision, saying the removal of the menorah and nativity scene limits the freedom of religious expression.

At the same time, the organization applauded the Canadian government for overruling the directive by Service Canada in Quebec forbidding Christmas decorations.

Integrating Bat Yam's Ethiopian Immigrant Community

United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto playing a key role in olim's new lives

United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto has a proud history of supporting Ethiopian immigration and absorption. The successful integration of Israel's Ethiopian community is of vital importance to the country's economic and social resilience. With your help, UJA continues to ensure that the community stands strong and secure and that its lifelong dream of calling Israel their home, comes to fruition.

Two key challenges facing the Ethiopian people of Bat Yam are education and unemployment, two essential components of any successful community. In Bat Yam, Ethiopian children are increasingly falling behind in school, negatively impacting their ability to successfully integrate into Israeli society.

UJA, working with its Israeli partners including The Jewish Agency for Israel, the Municipality of Bat Yam and private Israeli philanthropists, has spearheaded a number of innovative solutions to ensure that these youngsters do not "fall between the cracks".

The Milim Vemisparim "Words and Numbers" Program, a new preschool intervention program in four Bat Yam kindergartens, is working with 32 Ethiopian-Israeli children aged four to six. This new initiative develops:

- Basic letter and number recognition
- Verbal skills
- Fine motor and social skills
- Parenting skills to engage children in learning during everyday activities

UJA of Greater Toronto is transforming lives in Bat Yam

Samuel, who began kindergarten in Bat Yam later than most children his age, is, according to his mother, already reaping the rewards of this new program. "Sammy is finally catching up, learning the skills he will need to do well in first grade," says Shuma, a 28-year-old mother of three. "Hopefully his little brother and sister will get the same help."

Another initiative that is quickly proving to be a successful solution to the education issue is The Moriah Literacy Program. In partnership with The Moriah Fund, this new program operates in two elementary schools in Bat Yam, working with six classes in each school, totaling approximately 600 children. The program accomplishes many positive outcomes by:

- Closing the literacy gap between Ethiopian-Israeli children and their peers
- Empowering parents to support their children's educational progress
- Providing an additional 10-15 hours of classroom instruction
- Equipping each participating class with its own library

For eight-year-old Lemlem, who made aliyah three years ago with her parents, the Moriah Literacy Program has proven to be extremely valuable. Lemlem's parents are illiterate, and are struggling to learn Hebrew and support themselves and their six children. Lemlem was falling further and further behind in school, but thanks to the program, she's learned to read which has filled her with confidence, self-esteem, and a new outlook on life.

Another challenge faced by the parents of young Ethiopian-Israeli children is being addressed by UJA's Zipori Educational Warm Home.

Six-year-old Sammy, seen here with his parents, is benefitting from UJA's Milim Vemisparim "Words and numbers" Program.

Ethiopian immigrants and vulnerable Israelis are often challenged with where to leave their children after the school day ends at 1pm. The Zipori Educational Warm Home program alleviates this strain by offering a safe and nurturing environment for children who do not have parents at home after school to look after them. The program also enables the most vulnerable children to receive help with their school work, help they cannot receive from their own parents, many of whom are illiterate themselves. The Warm Home program is based in a school so that the children have direct and safe access. The program:

- Operates from 1:00-5:00 pm, five days a week
- Nurtures seventy-five pupils in grades one and two
- Offers professional teachers and counselors to help with homework, Hebrew, Math and English literacy
- Encourages children to enjoy story-hour, computers and enriching games
- Provides a nutritious hot lunch

The Zipori Educational Warm Home provides parents and children with piece of mind.

Thanks to this visionary program, David's mother is now able to go to work to help provide for the family's livelihood without worrying about her six-year-old son who had to walk home alone and was then left unsupervised until five in the evening. Because of the Warm Home Program: "Now, my David is safe and is doing much better in school. He is more relaxed knowing that he has already finished his homework, even if I am unable to help him."

And, when it comes to helping Ethiopian-Israeli adults, many of whom are unemployed, find meaningful work, and providing them with a vital sense of purpose, UJA is helping.

UJA funds vocational training programs for Bat Yam's unemployed, and, of the approximately 100 participants, most have found:

- Permanent employment, resulting in a higher income
- Increased self-esteem
- An enhanced status within the family and the community

Daniel Kidar found work thanks to UJA's vocational training programs.

Daniel Kidar, a 29-year-old Bat Yam resident knows just how vital UJA's vocational training programs are. "I never caught up in school and dropped out when I was 16," says Daniel who made aliyah at the age of nine with his mother and eight siblings. "I had no high school diploma, no qualifications, no hope of making a decent living. But then, with funding from the Toronto-Bat Yam Partnership, I studied to become an electrician. I have already found work in my field and know that one day I will be able to provide for my family."

United Jewish Appeal still at the Forefront of Ethiopian Aliyah

Connecting the People of Bat Yam to the Worldwide Jewish Community

United Jewish Appeal played an active role in Operation Moses in 1984 and Operation Solomon in 1991, and is now at the forefront of the aliyah of the last remnant of the Ethiopian Jewish community.

Through its involvement in the Ethiopian community in Rehovot, UJA developed significant expertise in advancing immigrants through education. It is currently reaching out to immigrants in Bat Yam, using its proven strategic educational model.

UJA's Living Bridge Partnership brings volunteers from Toronto to work in local schools, summer camps, youth centres and soup kitchens. Over the last three years, more than 80 Canadians have volunteered in Bat Yam. In total, more than 2,200 visitors of all ages from Toronto came to Bat Yam. Among other things, this program:

- Strengthens the ties between Israel and the worldwide Jewish community
- Increases self-esteem
- Offers an enhanced status within the family and the community

Lexi Dogon, 21, (above), was one of eight volunteers from Toronto who spent the summer working as counselors at a day-camp for local children in Bat Yam. "It was a wonderful experience," says Lexi. "It was eye-opening and fulfilling to be with these kids each day. I appreciated the hard work, caring and dedication of everyone involved. When people come together to make a positive impact, the world can only improve."

Radio-Canada ombudsman raps Middle East reporting

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Radio-Canada ombudsman has upheld a series of complaints made by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) about the network's Middle East coverage.

Most of the complaints concerned reporting by the French-language public broadcaster's Middle East correspondent, Ginette Lamarche, between June 5 and 7 on the deadly clash at the Syrian border between pro-Palestinian demonstrators and the Israeli army.

Ombudsman Pierre Tourangeau concluded that two reports by Lamarche did not respect the network's standards for impartiality and accuracy.

Most significantly to CIJA, she failed to report that the Israeli army had issued several warnings before opening fire and that the demonstrators were violent and attempting to force their way across the Israeli border.

CIJA's predecessor organization, the Quebec-Israel Committee, objected to Lamarche's reference to the Qalandia checkpoint as a "symbol of [the Palestinians'] daily humiliation," not making clear that the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine is also considered a terrorist organization, that Ahmad Saadate was convicted of ordering the murder of an Israeli government minister, and that some information was from a non-corroborated Syrian source.

CIJA also objected to Lamarche's reference that the Palestinians "tried to claim their right of return." The ombudsman agreed that this "right," while central to the conflict, has not been confirmed by the United Nations Security Council.

Ginette Lamarche cited

"On an issue as controversial as that of Israeli-Palestinian relations, the choice of words, the precision of the information given and the identification of its source takes on particular importance," wrote Tourangeau, who became ombudsman on Nov. 14, replacing Julie Miville-Duchêne, who left in July.

Even though some of Lamarche's reporting was live, which made it more difficult for her to verify the information, the journalist is still obligated to ensure "in a reasonable manner" that it is accurate.

The ombudsman also agreed with CIJA that a June 7 broadcast entitled "Des Juifs du Golan appuient l'attaque d'Israël contre les manifestants pacifiques" ("Golan Jews support Israel's attack on the peaceful demonstrators") didn't meet Radio-Canada's standards.

Specifically, Lamarche paraphrased an Israeli, identified only as Maurice, as saying: "The army maybe shot live bullets on the civilians who were demonstrating peacefully. If that is the case, it is only doing its duty."

An audio recording of her interview with the man showed that her paraphrasing was not faithful to what he actually said, Tourangeau wrote.

The ombudsman also found that "this morally questionable attitude" was presented without sufficient grounds as being representative of the Jews of the Golan.

Finally, the ombudsman concluded that RDI, Radio-Canada's news speciality channel, used erroneous maps March 19 on the program 24 heures en 60 minutes to illustrate the Arab-Israeli conflict. CIJA had termed the maps "propagandist."

The maps were used to show what a guest described as the loss of Palestinian land between 1945 and 2000.

Tourangeau describes the maps as "erroneous, confusing and incomplete, whose source was not identified."

RDI's management admitted that the maps should never have been used, while the ombudsman recommended that a correction be made.

Ottawa teacher gets lifetime achievement award

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA —Irv Osterer has been awarded the Marjorie Loughrey Lifetime Achievement Award in Arts Education by the Ottawa-Carleton District School Board (OCDSB).

No stranger to awards, the teacher at Ottawa's Merivale High School has previously received the Capital Educator's Award from the Ottawa-Carleton Research Institute (OCRI) and the Ottawa-Carleton District School Board's highest honour, the Director's Citation. For his athletic prowess, he has received the Lou Honigman Award for athletic performance and sportsmanship in the Jewish Men's Softball League.

Ottawa-Carleton District School Board director Jennifer Adams presents the award to Irv Osterer.

In his letter to Osterer advising him of the Lifetime Achievement Award, the OCDSB awards committee chair Jim McNabb said, "For 30 years, you have been an inspiring teacher, mentor to other students, arts advocate, and all-round cheer-leader for the arts. As department head, no one could be more supportive to teachers and school events. As a true believer in the arts and art education, you are absolutely deserving of this, our highest award."

Osterer studied at the Ontario College of Art and Design and at Queen's University, and received a master's of educational administration from the University of Ottawa. He combined his two interests by embarking on a career teaching what he loves.

He taught visual art, graphic design and photography for nine years at Ottawa's A.Y. Jackson Secondary School, where he developed curriculum for photography and graphic design. He was also the art co-ordinator and later the arts department head at Confederation High School until it closed in 1999. He has been at Merivale High School ever since.

He's currently a department head with primary responsibilities in fine arts, serving as well as department head for technology and modern languages, and he's also involved with co-operative education.

A pilot program he initiated that allows students from other high schools to take a semester of communication and design at Merivale, the FOCUS program, is now attached to a new Ministry of Education directive, the Specialist High Skills Major.

Although this program involves extra time and responsibility, Osterer is enthusiastic about being involved. "Grant money from the province has allowed me to enhance our studios with new software and equipment, so it has really worked out well and has been worth the effort," he said.

Osterer is in charge of all drama, music and art initiatives at Merivale High and has led the school to success in all those areas.

"We had a very strong year in 2010-11," he said. "Our school won the [OCDSB student-administered] Cappie Award for best musical in Ottawa. Our musicals are a real collaboration of the arts at Merivale. We have a fantastic team, and we really do amazing things with our students."

"I have always believed in the power of the arts to be a motivating and positive force in education. It is just fantastic to see our school board now expounding the virtues of creativity," Osterer said.

"They are wisely starting to examine what we do in the arts and seeing how they can package this approach to learning to make it applicable across a wide swath of the curriculum. I have always believed in encouraging kids to follow their passion and that teachers and schools should be at the forefront of this kind of activity."

Osterer has encouraged many of his students to continue in the arts after leaving high school. He believes in mentoring students, as he was fortunate to have mentors in his own student days. He is proud that one of his four sons, Jordan, is a student in the prestigious master's film program at Columbia University.

Although his many commitments mean a great deal of time away from home and family, Osterer is grateful that his wife, Sheila Stanislawski, has been extremely supportive.

"While my parents, Blanche and Joe, were at one point hoping that I would be a rabbi, they and my wonderful mother-in-law Evelyn in Montreal are also proud of my achievements and are pleased that my years of service have made an impact on the lives of many students, teachers and our school board," he said.

Sharansky slams 'delegitimization' of Israel

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — More and more emissaries from the Jewish Agency are being sent to North American university campuses to counter the "delegitimization" of the State of Israel, said the agency's head, Natan Sharansky, while in Montreal last week.

"Delegitimization is a direct continuation of the anti-semitism of thousands of years, which has always been against Jewish identity, whether it be a religion or nationality. Now it's the connection with Israel.

"The heart of the problem is that they want to destroy us as a people… On the campuses, the aim of our enemies is to disconnect young Jews from our people," he said at an event sponsored by Federation CJA, which saw Sharansky in conversation with Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, who served as his legal counsel while the former dissident was in Soviet prisons from 1977 to 1986.

Those foes are succeeding to an alarming extent, Sharansky said.

"I know many hundreds of cases of young Jews who believe it would be better for their careers or relations to stop being involved in anything to do with Israel. The next step is to stop involvement with anything Jewish, then they disappear from our people. It's a big problem."

He believes "a few hundred Jews [in the world] are lost every day" due to assimiliation and isolating themselves from Israel.

Sharansky, 63, who became Jewish Agency chair in 2009 after a political career, says his aim is to expand the organization's campus activities. This year it has 50 "fellows" at U.S. colleges, up from 15 two years ago. (He said there are one or two in Canada.) They are young Israelis who know how to debate, he said.

The goal is to have a presence at every university with at least 1,000 Jewish students, which is about 100 institutions in the United States.

It's hoped that a core of 10 to 30 Jewish students on each campus will become capable of being effective defenders of Israel through their presence.

Natan Sharansky

Cotler suggested that Jewish students face the dilemma of wanting to be part of the pervasive "human rights culture" on campus, but feel estranged from it because it often attacks Israel for alleged repression and racism.

The Jewish Agency is also organizing more months or year-long study or work programs in Israel for young Diaspora Jews, as well as joint humanitarian projects between Israelis and Jews from abroad in places such as Ethiopia and South America.

Sharansky said Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu invited him to be part of his current government, but he refused, joking, "Nine years in prison and nine years in the Knesset is enough." He said Netanyahu was surprised that he wanted the Jewish Agency job. As Cotler pointed out, the organization no longer plays the same central role in connecting Israel and the Diaspora that it once did.

Sharansky believes the Jewish Agency continues to provide a necessary forum for ongoing dialogue between Israel and Jews abroad and encourages unity. The success of the Soviet Jewry movement of the 1970s and 1980s showed that Jewish solidarity can accomplish great things, Sharansky said.

"When Jews feel mutual responsibility, no dictatorship, no force in this world, can stand against this."

Without Jews in the free world fighting in tandem with their long-lost Soviet brethren, Jewish rights and emigration would never have been secured. And, what's more, Sharansky believes, the Soviet Union would not have fallen.

"We paralyzed the Soviet Union. Once it had to make concessions to Jews, it fell apart. It could no longer control the minds of people."

Commenting on the political upheaval in the Arab world, Sharansky said it's inevitable that when given a choice between corrupt dictatorship and fundamentalist ideology, people will choose the latter.

The United States was wrong to support Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak and Israel to support PLO leader Yasser Arafat as preferable to Islamic radicals, he thinks.

"The longer Mubarak was in power, the stronger the fundamentalist movement grew," he said. And while Mubarak maintained the peace treaty with Israel in exchange for U.S. aid, Cairo was a world capital for the publishing of antisemitic material, he added.

Today, the free world should assist in the building of civil society in Egypt rather than funding its military, he said.

There are millions of Egyptians who want freedom, but they're not organized politically like the Islamists, he said. Western support should be going to pro-democracy student, academic, labour and free-market business groups.

JOSH ON THE GO

The spacious Sheriff's No Frills store on Kipling and Albion is well stocked and arranged. Staff are trained and ready to help with customers' grocery needs as well as willing and able to assist with flowers and pharmacy shopping; a pleasant experience for customers. Amongst these helpful and devoted staff is none other than our very own Joshua Blouin (popularly known as "Josh"). Josh is proud to be part of the Sheriff's No Frills team and is a full time volunteer who takes his job very seriously. A friendly and outgoing gentleman, Josh's job tasks during the day include restocking groceries in all the various aisles including the produce, meat and pharmaceutical areas. He also works diligently collecting and arranging carts in the parking lot to help ensure customer's safety…especially on rainy and snowy days.

Josh fits in well and people enjoy his sense of humor and friendliness. Some of his staff from prior years who bumped into Josh were amazed at the transformation. The Sheriff's No Frills employees have really made Josh feel welcomed and appreciated for his work. So the next time you are in the neighbourhood and see Josh performing one of his duties, don't hesitate to hail him! And as Josh would say "I LOVE MY JOB!"

On his time off, Josh enjoys winding down by going for a swim, bowling, driving to the mall, lunch outings and much much more. He truly is fitting in well. Keep an eye out for further updates!

Rabbis filled the holiday void

Rabbi Yonah S. Berman

"They tried to kill us. We survived. Let's eat."

This adage (turned into a song by Sean Altman) is often considered the common denominator among Jewish festivals. As we celebrate the biblical holidays, we repeat the words "zecher liyetziat mitzrayim, " a remembrance of the Exodus from Egypt, declaring that the holidays symbolize our ongoing relationship with God, who plays an active role in our national and personal lives.

And then we eat. Apples and honey, kreplach, matzah, maror, cheesecake – the list goes on.

With the High Holiday season behind us, we move into a period devoid of Torah-ordained holidays. Yet the gap between Simchat Torah and Passover was filled by the rabbis, who created two additional festivals – Chanukah and Purim – which are now integral parts of the Jewish calendar.

While Chanukah came later in history than Purim, we mark it first, specifically during the darkest days of the darkest month of the year, reminding ourselves and the world that God saved us from the clutches of an enemy seeking to destroy our culture and lifestyle. The Greeks tried to extinguish the eternal light in the Temple, and more importantly, in our spiritual lives. Our response: to bring more light into the world, kindling menorahs for all see and to remember the miracles of some 2,150 years ago.

Chanukah has evolved into a time of partying, gift-giving and oily food-eating, reminding us to thank God for the miracles that took place

"bayamim hahem, bazman hazeh," in those days, at this time.

Purim, the other rabbinically created celebration, marks our salvation from Haman and his minions' evil clutches during Achashverosh's reign over the Persian Empire, some 2,500 years ago. We read the Megillah, give food to the poor and to our friends, and hold a special feast, hopefully eating lots of hamantashen along the way. Again we use food and gifts as a vehicle of recognizing and remembering God's hand in our history, delivering us from the darkness of oppression to light of freedom.

What I find particularly meaningful about Chanukah and Purim is that the rabbis established numerous practices that bring family and community together during these festivals. On Chanukah, we light candles as a household, but in locations where outsiders can see them. And on Purim, we read the Megillah as a community and share meals and charity with others, ensuring that everyone has the means to enjoy the holiday and appreciate its meaning.

As we light our menorahs and eat the many Chanukah treats, let us recognize the opportunities afforded to us to improve ourselves and our communities by sharing the light and warmth of Jewish tradition.

Chanukah Samayach and bon appétit!

Rabbi Berman is associate rabbi of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal.

New Year's suggestions

As a new year dawns, I diffidently offer these suggestions. You will be a successful person in 2012 if you:

1. Will find the resources – regardless of your age and position – to keep mind alive, vital, active and curious, eager to pursue worthy and exciting goals.

2. Will be able to get along in mutual understanding and regard with your spouse and your children. A child psychologist wrote, "It probably takes more endurance, more patience, more intelligence, more healthy emotion to raise a decent, happy human being than to be an atomic scientist, a statesman or a psychiatrist."

3. Will find a measure of meaning in your work and the satisfactions that come from the knowledge that you are earning your bread honestly and without deceit. Our society is built on a division of labour; every kind of work is important to the whole. The teacher, the banker, the inventor, the engineer, the designer, the weaver, the electrician – each is vital to the entire process, and if one fails in their task, then all of us are the poorer.

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

4. Can be guided by our own standards and values, rather than those of our neighbours. Longfellow reminded us, "Not in the clamour of the crowded street/Not in the shouts and plaudits of the throng/But in ourselves are triumph and defeat."

5. Have won a few good friends whom you admire and who add a measure of zest and comradeship to your life and activities. It is essential to pick your friends, but not to pieces.

6. Can accept the good and bad in life with equanimity; not made arrogant by the former or embittered by the latter.

7. Don't overestimate your importance in the scheme of things. How quickly "indispensable" persons are forgotten.

8. Can forget yourself long enough and your problems to reach out in genuine concern and consideration for others. Hell is apartness; Heaven is togetherness. The more we forget ourselves in loving concern for others, the better off we are – the stronger, the more truly contented.

9. Can be a builder, rather than a destroyer. Everything that is the product of a creative mind and skilled labour is at the mercy and whim of destructive forces. Microbes, fire, earthquake, cyclone, stupidity, hatred and violence all take their toll. And yet, in the perspective of time, the creative forces win out. Not because they work faster – creation is slow, destruction is fast - but because construction has a purpose while destruction has none. Creation involves foresight, thoughtfulness, method, co-operation. Creation is going someplace. Destruction is meaningless, purposeless, random. It goes nowhere.

10. Can feel that you are reaching for your full potential and experiencing new ripening of mind and spirit. What we term maturity cannot be hurried, but must be tasted, savoured and digested.

In the coming year each of us will be given a fresh supply of time. This is the only time we will have. Once gone it is irretrievably lost. Although time flies, we can try to serve as a navigator through our years. More important than counting time is making time count.

Differing perspectives on conflict

My View

Lawrence Hart

During my frequent meanderings through our local bookstore, I am drawn always to a rather chunky magazine with a distinctive logo and blue-grey cover, called Foreign Affairs. Published by the Council on Foreign Relations, the journal's mission is "to improve the understanding of U.S. foreign policy and international affairs through the free exchange of ideas."

The current, November-December, issue caught my attention more than usual, because of its front cover reference to two lead articles running under the banner of "Israel under Siege." What's apparent when reading these commentaries is that even a magazine as reputable as Foreign Affairs is not as robustly objective and free of bias as one might expect. Nonetheless, it's not often that articles with diametrically opposing viewpoints are presented in juxtaposition, to provide readers with at least a hint of balance on a topic as explosive as the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

In the first of the two essays, the director general of Israel's Ministry of Strategic Affairs, Yosef Kuperwasser, and a longtime policy adviser in the Israeli Prime Minister's Office, Shalom Lipner, provide a piercing and erudite appraisal of Palestinian rejectionism as the singular reason for the failure in peace negotiations. They expose, without equivocation, Palestinian intransigence to recognize the legitimacy of Israel as a Jewish state or at the least to accept Judaism as the core of nationhood rather than as a religion.

They also explain the semantic deceptions when Palestinian interlocutors express their approval, in principle, for a "two-state solution" but refuse to accept the clarifier of "two states for two peoples" – the inference of course is that, in time, whether by demographics or force of arms, Israel and what might become "Palestine" would disintegrate into two states dominated by one people, with Jews in the minority, or worse.

The second essay, titled "Israel's bunker mentality," is written by Ronald Krebs, an associate professor of political science at the University of Minnesota. It's Krebs' opinion that the occupation has been the predominant influence in Israeli politics since 1967, "transforming a country once brimming with optimism into an increasingly cynical, despondent, and illiberal place." And while his opening premises set the stage for a mostly negative analysis of Israeli policies in general, his thesis becomes even more strident when he weaves in a scathing rebuke of Israel's ultrareligious (haredi) communities, criticizing them for political opportunism, parochialism, and "the threat [they] pose to Israel's future prosperity."

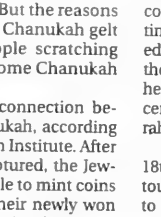
More than just its tone, there is much to question in Krebs' piece, and, depending on their perspectives, there are those who might reasonably take issue with some of what Kuperwasser and Lipner have written as well. But given the array of complex issues that frames Israel's political discourse, both domestically and in relation to peace negotiations with the Palestinians, dissonance, at every level is an expectation rather than an exception.

These articles, appearing side by side, provide a contrast and a spectrum that reflect this complexity and dissonance. They highlight perceptions that, whether valid or not, steer debate in one direction or another, sometimes productively, sometimes disingenuously.

Gelt, gifts and chocolate

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz



It's one of the most popular traditions of one of the most well-known holidays of the year. But the reasons behind the giving of Chanukah gelt can leave most people scratching their heads. Today, some Chanukah gelt explanations.

There is a direct connection between gelt and Chanukah, according to the Jewish Outreach Institute. After the Temple was recaptured, the Jewish population was able to mint coins as an expression of their newly won independence. Centuries later, the State of Israel revived a similar tradition. "In a brilliantly conceived move to link the modern world with the ancient history of our people, the first Chanukah coin portrayed exactly the same menorah that had appeared on the last Maccabean coins of Antigonus Matityahu, 1,998 years earlier." [http://bit.ly/cgelt12]

You can view drawings of antique coins on the American Israel Numismatic Association website [http://bit.ly/cgelt11] and the lovely, modern variations minted by the State of Israel. [http://bit.ly/cgelt13]

Tina Wasserman explains that linguistically, Chanukah is "related to chinuch, which means education. Perhaps for this reason, some Jewish communities chose Chanukah as the time to celebrate the freedom to be educated Jewishly. Maimonides made the education/gelt connection when he described Chanukah gelt as 'an incentive for you [children] to study Torah properly.'" [http://bit.ly/cgelt14]

Eliezer Siegel adds that rabbis in 18th-century eastern Europe would tour remote villages during Chanukah to strengthen the townsfolk's Jewish education. Reluctantly, they would accept tokens of appreciation for lost time. Eventually, these gifts or gelt became almost obligatory to rabbis, other pillars of the community, and then in the 19th century, to children. Siegel adds, "Needless to say, an immense gulf separates the customs described here from the shopping frenzy that is associated with the North American Chanukah." [http://bit.ly/cgelt15]

Nowadays, most gelt exchanged at Chanukah isn't made of gold or silver but of chocolate. Many fond memories are wrapped up in mesh bags of foil-covered coins. [http://bit.ly/cgelt16]

How about a batch of Chanukah Gelt Cookies? Be careful because these treats have real gelt inside. [http://bit.ly/cgelt17] Not decadent enough? Then whip up a Chanukah Gelt Double Fudge Chocolate Layer Cake. [http://bit.ly/cgelt18]

Speaking of decadence, in Reframing Chanukah Gelt, Rabbi Goldie Milgram suggests that you gather up the tzedakah boxes bursting with coins in your home. On a holiday night, invite friends over and let each suggest worthy charities for all that gelt. [http://bit.ly/cgelt19]

On a similar note, Got Gelt? A Conversation About Giving in This Season of Receiving is a classroom-based exercise that asks students to view themselves as philanthropists and to articulate how they make decisions about where to give tzedakah. [http://bit.ly/cgelt20]

Far be it from me to proclaim that any holiday food could be considered sacrilegious, but I did do a double-take when I came across one particular gelt coin recipe. Instead of chocolate and sugar, it calls for cheddar cheese and Worcestershire sauce. If you feel like developing a new tradition with Chanukkah Cheese Gelt Coins, be my guest. [http://bit.ly/cgelt21]

I'm sticking with chocolate.

Female Jewish firefighter lives her dream

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Like many kids, Adina Kaufman wanted to be a firefighter when she was a youngster.

"My grandfather used to tell me that he remembered me talking about it when I was really little," Kaufman tells The CJN. "For whatever reason, it spoke to me."

But instead of acting on her desire, "I waited to outgrow it, because you [didn't] see a lot of female firefighters. There weren't a lot of role models."

The Ottawa-born Kaufman chose an academic path, first earning a bachelor of arts degree, then one in engineering from the University of Waterloo. She realized firefighting was still on her brain when some of her projects related to it, including one in which she studied fire-retardant gear for firefighters.

"I liked the academic side of things," she recalls, "but I kept being drawn to the world of firefighting. I started to look into it more, and realized that it was an option for women. I decided I wasn't going to outgrow it and it was time to work toward it."

But at 5-foot-3, she also knew she had her work cut out when it came to the rigorous training the job requires. "I knew the physical test was going to be the big challenge," she says.

After applying to Toronto Fire Services, she trained by filling a backpack with 40 kilograms of rocks taken from her parents' garden and running up and down the stairs of her high-rise apartment building. To strengthen her arms and shoulders, she slung a rope over her balcony and hoisted 20 kilograms of rocks hand over hand.

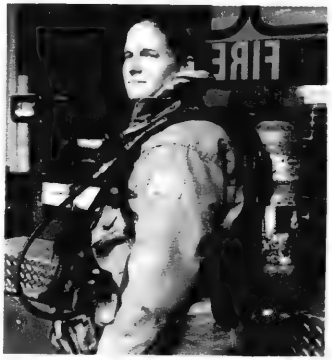
Despite spraining an ankle a week before, she passed the test, which involved hauling 40 kilograms of fire hose up and down stairs and carrying a 90-kilogram dummy. She was the only woman in her graduating class.

Now, 37, Kaufman joined TFS in 2002. A Firefighter First Class, she's attached to Station 343 near St. Clair and Oakwood avenues. Kaufman estimated that of Toronto's 3,000 firefighters, around 100 are women. How many are Jewish women is not the sort of information TFS has.

She concedes hers has not been a conventional route.

"My parents [Gail and Ilia] are used to my not always following a traditional path, so they're pretty supportive," Kaufman says. "But they were a bit skeptical. My dad was born in easterrr Russia and grew up in Poland. He lived the immigrant experience, so for him, it was confusing."

A year ago, Kaufman was chosen by Reader's Digest magazine as one of Canada's top 15 firefighters. Her extensive volunteer record doubtless played a part in the honour.



Adina Kaufman

She mentors young women in job-skills training through the charitable organization Youth in Motion and spends summers at Camp Bucko (which stands for Burn Camp for Kids in Ontario), where young burn victims enjoy a camp experience.

"It gives them a week in which they just get to be kids and not have to worry about people looking at their scars or asking questions about their injuries." She's trained local firefighters and emergency response teams in Cambodia and Nicaragua through Global Medic and has taken part in medical and educational missions to Guyana through Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

"Anytime you make a personal connection with someone and you help them to realize their potential, it's really rewarding," she says.

Asked about any frightening moments on the job, Kaufman points out that on a typical shift, "you can see multiple fires or zero fires. A great percentage of what we do is actually medical first response."

One of the biggest fires she fought was on her first day on the job.

"I came to work on the night shift and that night, we had a big fire at a semi-detached house. The other crew members were still struggling to remember my name. But they looked out for me. In your first fire, you're trying to remember whether you even put your equipment on right."

On that night, a porch collapsed.

"But I don't remember feeling scared. I just remember thinking, 'Get out of the way.'"

Kaufman says she's been "lucky in that I haven't had any really scary moments. I've had exciting moments, I would say. When it comes down to it, when you go into a fire, your training kicks in. We have a job to do. So you're feeling more of a drive than a fear."

The moments that stay with her "are sad moments when you see [victim] families and what they go through."

New IsraAID delegations to Kenya, South Sudan and Haiti

Compiled by CJN Staff

IsraAID, the Israeli non-profit humanitarian agency, this week was to send three new delegations to bolster its work on projects in Kenya, South Sudan and Haiti.

The first team travelled to Turkana in Northwest Kenya on Monday to help with the international famine relief effort. They will distribute emergency food to local hospitals and communities, as well as treated mosquito nets to help stop the spread of malaria.

IsraAID had previously worked in Kenya in the Dadaab refugee camp in August.

Hundreds of thousands of East Africans have already perished in what the United Nations has dubbed one of the world's worst food crises this year. Nearly 12 million more people are at risk of starvation.

"Tens of thousands of refugees from the entire Horn of Africa are fleeing their homes and flocking to UN-administrated refugee camps throughout Kenya," a Dec. 12 statement by IsraAID noted.

The group's second delegation was to leave late Monday or Tuesday for South Sudan, where it will "support, rehabilitate and protect young girls who have been the subject of, or are at-risk of rape, violence and sexual abuse," the organization said.

IsraAID originally sent a team to Juba in July to distribute emergency aid to hundreds of refugees displaced by decades of civil war.

The third delegation is being sent to Haiti to assist IsraAID workers currently on the ground, in an effort to rebuild the country and increase economic capacity in the wake of the 7.0 magnitude earthquake that devastated the country in January 2010, killing nearly 300,000 and leaving millions homeless.

IsraAID's team will continue the organization's work in Haiti helping local communities rebuild their social and economic infrastructure.

According to the organization, IsraAID has so far "reached" more than 20,000 Haitians with programs on sexual education, health and hygiene awareness, language courses, computer classes, leadership training for youth, arts and sports. Additionally, more than 9,000 people have been treated by IsraAID's clinic and outreach centre.

The Israeli group was one of the first relief organizations to arrive in Haiti after the earthquake, and its initial efforts focused on emergency relief and medical aid.

IsraAID is funded in part by numerous Jewish organizations worldwide including many Canadian partners, among them UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Federation CJA of Montreal, The Jewish Federation of Edmonton, The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, and United Israel Appeal Federations of Canada.

The group has also partnered with the Canadian Jewish humanitarian organization, Ve'ahavta, on various projects.

Relief workers from IsraAID, the Israeli humanitarian non-profit organization, were among those first on the scene in Haiti in January 2010 after the 7.0 magnitude earthquake that devastated the country. Here, IsraAID doctors and volunteers are seen setting up their relief centre in a soccer field in Port-Au-Prince.

HELPNG THE HOMELESS: As part of their Mitzvah Corps program, students from Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns Education Centre on Neptune Drive made more than 60 sandwiches and veggie snack kits to be distributed by Ve'ahavta's outreach van. Pictured, from left, are Jaclyn Orlan, Rachel Minuk, Lily Sherman, Adam Levitan, Shira Barth, Rachela Smith, Samantha Fisher, Tamar Barth, Bob Allen and Max Sherman.

QUIET STATEMENT: Both campuses of Leo Baeck Day School recently took part in the Vow of Silence, during which students were silent to show solidarity with children around the world who are denied basic human rights and don't "have a voice." Teachers modified their lessons to follow the theme of the day. At the end, all students took part in an assembly to break the silence and to use their voices to affect change. Pictured are Grade 8 students displaying the letters that each grade decorated – back row from left, Hannah Feldboom, Shaye Spector, and Jonathan Mostovoy; middle row from left, Talia Falconer and Zachary Schenker, and front row from left, Samantha Steiner, Hayley Schwartzberg, Paige Saltsman, Brittney Shoychet-McCully, Gillain Shoychet, David Greiver and Andie Levine

KEEN READERS: Students in grades 2, 3 and 4 at the Toronto Heschel School raised more than $1,500 by reading for the MS Read-a-thon. Funds raised will help multiple sclerosis research and provide education and aid to those with the disease, their families and caregivers. Pictured, front row from left, are Max Leibovich, Hannah Grosman, Dalia Leibovich. Annie Wolfond, Maya Grosman and Max Nathanson; and back row from left, Dalit Nathanson, Lily Abrahams, Jamie Wise and Steven Seltsas.

DANCE PALS: Robbins Hebrew Academy recently hosted its annual dance-a-thon. In celebration of the school's 50th birthday, the theme for the event was "Birthday Bash." Students at the Beth Tikvah campus took part in the fun-filled day. Magen Boys Entertainment was on hand with music, dancers, prizes and treats. RHA invited a group of students from Yorkwoods Public School to participate. Prior to the dance-a-thon, students from each school exchanged pen-pal letters. Pictured, from left, are Visha Patel, Carly Swirsky, Taylor Balsky and Kaliyah Pryce

CLOTHING DRIVE: Grade 9 students at Ulpanat Orot learn first-hand about being kind to those less fortunate with school social worker Diane Harvey. After collecting close to 100 bags of warm clothing and organizing a clothing drive for United Chessed with the help of their teacher, Sharon Fixler, the remaining bags, pictured, will be donated to the Out of the Cold initiative. Pictured, back row from left, are Elana Joseph, Revia Pellman, Maytal Cuperfain, Tamar Safran and Diane Harvey, and front row from left, Dana Frischman, Evie Bernstein, Daniella Einhorn, Tali Wiesenthal, Hilla Sheinberg and Alexandra Lipson.

Chabad at York holds 'Canorah' event

Dustin Pollack
Special to The CJN

Students at York University gathered last week for the second annual "Canorah" event sponsored by Chabad at York.

The event calls on students to build a chanukiyah out of cans of food in order to raise awareness about Chanukah while collecting food for students who struggle to put food on the table for themselves.

The 480 cans collected to build the chanukiyah were donated to the York Federation of Students' food bank and will also help launch a kosher food pantry that Jewish students at York can access.

'A great way to raise awareness and to demonstrate how important it is to donate food and make a difference'

"We actually have students unfortunately that come to us, and they need food," said Vidal Bekerman, director of Chabad at York. "So we thought what a great idea to launch a kosher food bank for students."

Although Chanukah doesn't begin until Dec. 20, Chabad at York chose to hold the event before students begin writing exams and before winter break.

"It's a great opportunity for everyone to come together and celebrate Chanukah," said Joel Pearl, program director for Hillel at York. "It's probably the most relatable Jewish holiday. Whether you have a broad base of Jewish knowledge or you don't, you always know about Chanukah."

Pearl's words seemed to echo throughout the afternoon. While some students helped construct the chanukiyah, others took the opportunity to enjoy another activity associated with the holiday – playing dreidel with silver Chanukah gelt on the floor of Central Square.

According to Rena Friedman, president of Chabad at York, the event was a great way to combine tradition with an act of kindness.

"It's a unique way to do an act of chesed and to combine the theme of Chanukah, which is to bring light to the world," she said. "It is also a great way to raise awareness and to demonstrate how important it is to donate food and make a difference."

Upon the completion of the chanukiyah, Bekerman spoke about the importance of on-campus events such as Canorah. His short speech was followed by a candlelighting ceremony in which various students and school representatives, including from Hillel, B'nai Brith, Hasbara and the York Federation of Students lit the nine candles of the chanukiyah.

Bekerman said this isn't the only type of event Chabad at York holds to promote acts of kindness among students.

"We do an event called 'Loafs of Love' where we get together on a Thursday night and bake challah," he said. "We have a group of students that come and we bake 100 to 150 challahs, and then we distribute them to six old-age homes on Friday afternoon for Shabbat.

"We're always looking for more ideas. With the Canorah event, this year is our second, next year will be our third and we hope it continues to get bigger and better."

Perlmutter, Herbert ז"ל

Born on March 12,1922, passed away suddenly and peacefully on December 1, 2011. Herbert is survived by his wife Bernice, three sons, Alan, Edward and Ronald, their wives, Cathy, Robin, Caroline, nine granddaughters, Heather, Lisa, Jenny, Sara, Mindy, Dara, Kayla, Elianna and Naomi. Herbert served in an overseas RCAF posting during WW2. In July, 1948 he married the love of his life, Bernice, and moved to London, ON in 1949, to found and build a successful chartered accounting practice from which he retired in 1981. During his life he served on many public and University boards, but was most proud of being President of Or Shalom Synagogue during its inception and building. He also served with many local and national Jewish organizations. Herbert was greatly devoted to his family. He looked forward to extended family dinners, and he gained much pride from all other occasions and successes of his growing family over the years. He enjoyed a profound love, knowledge and appreciation of fine classical music and art – the sounds of the Metropolitan Opera were omnipresent in the household on weekends. Funeral Services were held at Or Shalom Synagogue at 534 Huron St in London, ON Sunday, December 4th, 2011. Arrangements have been entrusted to LOGAN FUNERAL HOME (371 Dundas St., London, Ontario, 519-433-6181). Those wishing to make a donation in his memory may do so to UJA London, JNF or CNIB. Online condolences can be expressed at www.loganfh.ca.

Vienna school seeks Jewish students

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

It almost sounds too good to be true: get a free university education – in Vienna.

All you have to do to qualify for a full scholarship at the Lauder Business School (LBS) is sign up for its Jewish Learning Program and be halachically Jewish, said Michael Kigel, a former Torontonian who now heads the Jewish program at the European school.

Founded in 2003 by Ronald S. Lauder – businessman, philanthropist and heir to the Estée Lauder fortune – LBS is a university of applied sciences in Vienna.

A secular school that's open to all, it has bachelor's and master's degree programs in business administration and leadership, which are offered in English.

What makes it unique, Kigel said, is the school's Jewish Learning Program (JLP), which is maintained by the Jewish Heritage Fund and private donors who want to connect European Jewish youth to their culture and traditions.

The program offers "a free university education for anybody who is halachically Jewish," said Kigel, who has served as dean of the program for fours years since he moved from Toronto, where he produced two Jewish television shows on CTS Cable Channel 9.

After working in television for 11 years, Kigel decided to go back to his academic roots. With a PhD in philosophy from the University of Toronto, Kigel has taught part time at schools including York University, Queen's University and Waterloo University.

"Of course, anyone can apply to the school – any nationality, race, creed – it doesn't matter," he said.

Although a majority of the students are Jewish and enrolled in the JLP, Kigel said that has no bearing on the business studies curriculum.

Non-Jewish students are also welcome to enrol in Jewish studies classes as well.

The affordable tuition is a major selling point. At about $1,000 per year, a university education at the LBS costs a fraction of the tuition at most North American universities.

"But if someone is halachically Jewish and has an interest in exploring their Judaism... they qualify automatically for a full scholarship, which covers their room and board."

However, there are requirements, he warned.

"They have to come to the Jewish studies classes for three hours out of the week in addition to their business curriculum."

Students must also take a Hebrew class, and do community work on campus for 12 hours per semester.

Because the school's religious infrastructure is based on the Chabad philosophy, campus life caters to observant Jews.

There are no classes on Shabbat or Jewish holidays, campus dining is kosher, and there is a synagogue on the school grounds.

Michael Kigel

Kigel said students can also enjoy social programs on Shabbat and yamim tovim, as well as heritage trips to European cities including Venice, Prague and Auschwitz.

"Because Chabad is the infrastructure, there is a Chabad agenda that goes into it. But there's no heavy-duty brainwashing. We have an open approach and a warm approach to Judaism and we don't beat anyone over the head with Judaism," Kigel said, adding that very few of the students are religious.

There are about 240 students enrolled at the school, with about half living in residence on campus.

"I've been to a number of universities and worked at a number of them – at big ones like Queen's, York and so on. They're just so huge, nobody knows your name," he said.

"It's silly to say that it is an extended family – people throw that saying around cheaply. But it is the closest thing to a family. If you took away the pejorative sense, it's almost like a frat house. A huge Jewish frat house – without the ugly negative things about it."

LBS is currently accepting applications for the 2012-13 academic year. For more information, visit www.lbs.ac.at.

IB WORLD SCHOOL

LAUREN SIGEL,
of The Toronto French School, signs on to be the Principal of The New LEO BAECK Day School South Campus!

The Leo Baeck Day School is thrilled to announce the hiring of Lauren Sigel to the position of South Campus Principal effective July 1st, 2012. We look forward to her becoming a part of The Leo Baeck Day School community.

Ms Sigel comes to us from the Toronto French School where she has worked for fourteen years. As the only authorized Jewish International Baccalaureate World School in Canada, we are thrilled that Lauren was a key administrator in the transition of TFS becoming an IB World School. Lauren plans on bringing the same dedication, innovation and passion that she did to TFS and we are excited by the wealth of experience she brings to our community. We look forward to a new chapter in our school's history in our New home at 501Arlington Avenue under Lauren's guidance and leadership.

Deliciously rich brunch easy to put together

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

Brunch is a lovely time to entertain. The late morning hours automatically create a casual mood, a boon to the possibly holiday-weary hostess. Much of the food can even be made ahead, biding its time in the oven being rewarmed.

I've come up with a deliciously rich brunch that's easy to put together. It's guaranteed to please all ages, from the sophisticated gastronome to the picky four-year-old nephew. Be sure to have plenty of fruit juices on hand as well as specialty coffees and hot chocolate.

I like to end with huge platters of fresh fruit and mini bite sized sufganiyot to round out the celebration brunch.

SHIITAKE MUSHROOM OMELETTE WITH ASIAGO

1/4 cup unsalted butter
2 shallots, minced
3/4 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
pinch dried thyme
2 cups sliced trimmed shiitake mushrooms
8 eggs
1/3 cup milk
1 cup shredded Asiago cheese (or mozzarella)

In large non-stick skillet, melt half of butter over medium high heat. Add shallots, half of salt, half of pepper and the thyme; cook, stirring, for 2 minutes or until softened. Add mushrooms; cook, stirring, for 3 minutes. Remove from pan; reserve.

Meanwhile, in large bowl, whisk together eggs, milk and remaining salt and pepper. Melt remaining butter in pan. Add egg mixture all at once. Using a heat-safe spatula, stir slowly for about 20 seconds, as though making scrambled eggs. Cook for 4 minutes, using spatula to push cooked egg to centre and allowing uncooked egg to flow underneath. Sprinkle the mushrooms and cheese over half of omelette. Fold omelette in half to enclose filling. Cook for one more minute. Slide omelette out of pan by tilting pan onto warmed serving plate. Serve immediately. Makes 6 servings.

LEMON CREAM STUFFED FRENCH TOAST

Filling:
3/4 cup cream cheese, softened
3 tbsp. granulated sugar
1 tbsp. finely grated lemon rind
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1/2 cup fine ricotta cheese (or pressed cottage cheese)
French Toast:
6 slices challah, cut 1 1/2 in. thick
6 eggs
1/2 cup milk
1/4 tsp. cinnamon
pinch salt
1/4 cup unsalted butter

Using hand-held or stand mixer with paddle attachment, beat together cream cheese, sugar, lemon rind and juice, and ricotta until smooth.

Lay slices of bread on work surface. Working at top crust of bread and, using a small paring knife, cut back and forth without cutting through to sides of bread to create a pocket. Repeat with all bread slices. Spoon 3 heaping tbsp. of filling into each pocket. Make sure not to overstuff. Set aside.

In bowl, whisk together eggs, milk, cinnamon and salt. One at a time, dip each bread slice into egg mixture, for at least 30 seconds. (Slices can be placed in glass dish, covered with any remaining egg mixture and plastic wrap, and refrigerated for up to one day.)

Melt half of butter in large non-stick skillet over medium heat. Add 2 to 3 bread slices. Cook, without flipping, for 2 minutes. Flip bread over; cook for 2 to 3 minutes or until golden on underside. (French Toast can be kept warm in a preheated 375° oven until all French Toast is made.) Repeat with remaining bread slices.

Serve plain, with maple syrup or with blueberry sauce (recipe follows). Makes 6 servings.

Blueberry Sauce:
2 cups blueberries, fresh or frozen
2 tbsp. granulated sugar
2 tsp. finely grated lemon rind
2 tbsp. lemon juice
4 tsp. cornstarch
3/4 cup water

In a small measuring cup, mix cornstarch well with 1/4 cup water.

In saucepan, combine blueberries, sugar, lemon rind and juice, cornstarch mixture and remaining 1/2 cup water. Bring to a boil; boil, stirring, until blueberries have broken down and sauce has thickened, 3 minutes. Transfer to bowl, cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate until cooled or for up to 5 days.

GREEN SALAD WITH CITRUS AND POMEGRANATE BALSAMIC VINAIGRETTE

5 cups torn leaf lettuce
5 cups torn frisée lettuce
2 pink grapefruits, segmented, juice reserved
Vinaigrette:
3 tbsp. pomegranate balsamic vinegar (or half balsamic vinegar and half pomegranate juice)
2 tbsp. reserved grapefruit juice
1 tsp. honey
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil

In salad bowl, gently toss together green and frisée lettuces and grapefruit segments.

In small measuring cup, whisk together vinegar, juice, honey, salt and pepper. In thin steady stream, gradually whisk in oil until emulsified. Pour half of dressing over salad. Makes 6 servings.

Anonymous kidney donor is anything but

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

We live in a what's-in-it-for-me-kind-of-world, but hearing a story about a woman who donated her kidney to a stranger would leave even the most jaded cynic feeling inspired.

Earlier this year, 59-year-old Sarah Konsker parted with one of her kidneys to save the life of an anonymous Torontonian who suffered from kidney failure.

At least he started out as an anonymous recipient. Apparently, it isn't easy keeping a secret in Thornhill's tight-knit Jewish community.

The story began seven years ago, when Aaron Cohen, now 25, was a 17-year-old kid.

After visiting his doctor for a check-up and providing blood and urine samples, Cohen was diagnosed with membranous nephropathy, a disorder that prevents the kidneys from properly filtering wastes and fluids.

As his condition progressed, Cohen would retain so much water that parts of his body would swell.

"When I would wake up, my face would be all distorted because of water that would gravitate to my face while I was sleeping. And after a full day of walking around, all the water would go down to my legs and my feet would be swollen," Cohen recalled.

In addition to the immediate discomfort, his doctor predicted that his kidneys would fail within 20 to 25 years.

Despite taking medication to prevent the disease from progressing, his kidneys deteriorated much faster than anticipated, and by the time he was 21, his kidneys were only functioning at 25 per cent capacity.

Then, during a vacation to Israel, he caught a bug that helped wipe out what was left of his kidney function.

"Just like that, I went from 25 per cent to zero," said Cohen, who shared his story last week at an event organized by Chabad of Markham synagogue to honour both Cohen and his donor.

After a two-week hospital stay, his doctors put him on dialysis, a "hellish" process that filters waste and fluid in a person's body through a machine.

Cohen, who was placed on a seven-year waiting list for a new kidney, had to put his life on hold.

Enter Konsker, a mother of five and a long-time member of Chabad of Markham who learned about the need for kidney donors through an event her daughter co-organized in April 2010.

Konsker said when she and her husband came forward as potential donors, they never anticipated that either of them would come up as a match.

"I was so excited when I got the call... I felt my heart palpitating. I felt this rush of heat through me... I was so excited and overwhelmed with emotion. I felt like I had just won a jackpot."

She said she was never nervous about her own health.

"I was surprised at myself that I was never afraid. I think I just had such emunah [faith] that this was the right thing and it was going to work."

After getting her family's blessing, Konsker went ahead with the surgery.

At some point during the screening phase, she learned that Cohen was the recipient. She knew him, as he was a good friend of her son-in-law.

But Konsker was adamant that she remain anonymous, because she realized that she would "see him from time to time, and I didn't want him in any way, shape or form to feel indebted to me or my family."

In addition to the personal connection, Konsker realized that throughout the six-month process of tests and check-ups, at any point she could have been disqualified for health reasons, and she didn't want to get Cohen's hopes up if it wasn't going to work out.

Last year, when Cohen learned that a match had been found for him, he had mixed feelings.

"When I found out the news, it was during my mother's shivah. My mother passed away, and I found out three days later," Cohen said.

"I had mixed feelings because... I was going through hell with that, but I also knew that this was one thing she wanted to see."

Meanwhile, Konsker was doing her best to keep her identity hidden from Cohen. With the help of John Anhang, founder of Renewal Toronto – an organization started in New York that works within the Jewish community to handle the logistics of arranging kidney transplants – she arranged for her and Cohen to be assigned to recovery rooms on different floors of the hospital.

But, Konsker said, people plan and God laughs.

Following the surgery, while her daughter Shira, her son Rafi and her husband Michael were visiting her, they stepped out into the hallway to have a conversation.

Shira noticed a man in a wheel chair rolling toward them. It was Cohen.

Konsker said her son and husband were so engrossed in conversation that they didn't notice him coming, nor did they notice Shira's subtle hints that he was approaching.

Cohen said he came down to Konsker's floor because he wanted to watch a basketball game in the patient lounge nearby.

"As I'm wheeling down the hallway, I saw them in the distance... I already had suspicions, but when I saw all of them, I knew what was up right away," Cohen recalled.

Konsker said her son tried to distract him by casually asking about his recovery and helping him into the patient lounge before making a quick exit.

"It was extremely awkward, because I knew that the donor wanted to keep it private," Cohen said.

But today, six months after the surgery, it's all a distant memory. Both Konsker and Cohen have recovered well.

Konsker, who was "up and about, running around" far sooner than expected, said, "The only regret I have is that I can't do this again."

And Cohen said he's back to his old self. "It's seems like those five years were just like a nightmare, like it wasn't real. I feel 100 per cent.

"There is nothing that I can ever say or do that will ever convey my gratitude to her. Even though she doesn't want me to be, I will always be indebted to her and her family. I really look at her as a second mother. My mother gave me life; and she gave me a second chance at life."

There are currently seven other people in Toronto's Jewish community that are in need of a kidney. For information on how to help, visit www.renewal.org, or call 416-638-7633.

Rotarians take part in joint health project

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR — The Rotary Club of Windsor recently received a grant from Rotary International that will supplement its own fundraising and enable it to enhance its humanitarian projects in Ghana in collaboration with a number of organizations in Israel.

The Rotary Foundation Global Grant for the Telehealth Project is a three-country, three-Rotary Club initiative supported by District 6400, the Rotary International regional group for southeast Michigan and southwestern Ontario.

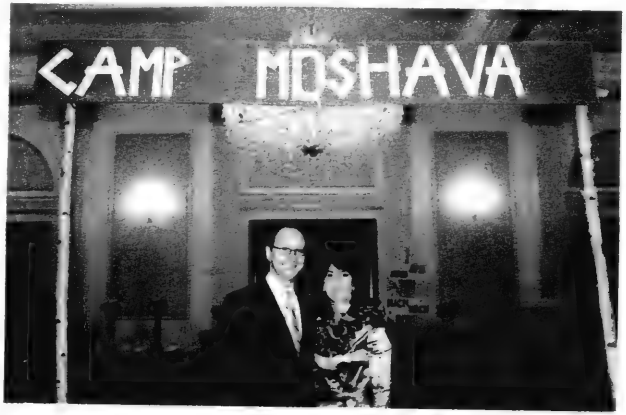
Partners include Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem, as well as the Rotary Club of Jerusalem, the Jirapa Health Alliance and Rotary Club of Accra Ring Road Central in Ghana, and the Rotary Club of Windsor.

The project will build on Herzog Hospital's successful course to train Ethiopian immigrants to become nurses' aides. Using part of the 400-hour curriculum that Herzog staff developed, Herzog nurses will provide medical hands-on training via videoconference to enhance patient care through professional development in a severely impoverished area in the upper west region of Ghana.

"This project will broaden the knowledge base of medical practitioners and allied health professionals and provide interaction between health care providers with counterparts in advanced and developed countries in a rural, resource-poor area where one doctor serves a population of 80,000," said Dr. Godfrey Bacheyie, a Windsor Rotary leader, local physician and project leader.

Herzog Hospital is Israel's foremost centre for geriatric, respiratory, mental health and psychotrauma care, treatment and research. With 330 beds, it's the third-largest hospital in Jerusalem.

Rotary International is a volunteer organization of business, professional and community leaders who provide humanitarian service. There are some 1.2 million Rotary Club members belonging to 33,000 Rotary Clubs in more than 200 countries and geographical areas.



CAMP REUNION

Camp Moshava Ennismore recently marked 50 years of summer fun as some 500 people, including alumni, parents, staff and donors, gathered at On the Park Events and Conference Centre to fete honorees who each represented a decade of Camp Moshava. The event raised more than $2 million to improve the camp's infrastructure. Representing the 1980s were Ami and Aviva Drazin.

Mindfulness meditation

I have been hosting a new TV series, and each week is like a training ground, or as I like to call it, a bliss boot camp.

Ever since I had a wonderful naturopath, Derek Lee, on the program, I have been following his Mediterranean diet, and after our de-cluttering show, I went home and cleared out my closet with a passion I normally reserve for roasted-marshmallow ice cream.

So as I began our show preparations on meditation, I felt I was in unfamiliar territory. Oh, I've dabbled a bit in relaxation and even listening to some meditation CDs, but actually learning what it's all about and how to do it is something I've never really had the time for. And that was the rich learning I got from this episode. Which is, you have to make time for the healing and calm that comes from mindfulness meditation.

Life Coach Corner

Psychotherapist, Adler-trained coach and mindfulness meditation instructor Barbara Symmons says: "Mindfulness, the paying of direct attention, is the most crucial aspect of meditation practice. Mindfulness makes a vehicle for change, healing and stress reduction. Mindfulness may also transform a person's approach to life and move individuals toward greater levels of health and well-being."

The guru of meditation, Jon Kabat-Zinn, the bestselling author of Wherever You Go, There you Are, is also the author of Full Catastrophe Living: Using the Wisdom of Your Body and Mind to Face Stress, Pain and Illness. His book is a groundbreaking study that describes how to use mindfulness meditation to free yourself from stress, fear and anxiety. His suggestions include trying to be mindful and aware for one minute in every hour, taking calming breaths all day long, and making sure you have a healthy diet, enough sleep, relaxation, exercise and time for humour and for intimacy.

Ed and David Shapiro have a wonderful book called Meditation: The Four Step Course to Calmness and Clarity, along with four CDs. My problem with CD One is that it's so relaxing, I fall asleep after the first 10 minutes, so I've never heard the end of it! But the book is full of wonderful suggestions on how to release inner tension, clear your mind and ultimately find inner peace through loving kindness, compassion and forgiveness.

As they put it, "Meditation is about being still. The aim is simply to pay attention, to be fully present. We often call it 'silent space,' because that is exactly what it is – the entering into a silent space. It is a natural state of being that enables you to see clearly the nature of reality, to see things for what they are. It connects you to an inner quietness. It is what is there when you stop trying, when you let go of the story and the dramas, when you connect with who you are inside."

People often report feeling relieved and more peaceful after meditating. It is definitely a rich resource and a wonderful place to turn to when life is a little too hectic. (I wouldn't know anything about that!) Buy a meditation tape or read a book on meditation and give yourself the treat of creating a quiet corner for a few moments a day for inner peace and a little bliss.

אינני יודע אם יוצא לכם לקרוא את התגובות און ליין שכותבים אנשים למאמרים או ידיעות בעיתונים ישראליים. בחיסיון של עילום שם ותוך שימוש בשמות בדויים עשרות אנשים מקללים, שופכים דליים של ביוב, ומשמיעים דברים גזעניים. עד כאן אפשר לומר: זה מחיר הדמוקרטיה וחופש הביטוי, אם כי זה לא נכון לדברי גזענות. אותי מחרידה ומקוממת התופעה שבה מנצלים אנשים רעי כוונות כאלה את האנונימיות שלהם כדי להוציא את דיבתם רעה של אנשים אחרים. הם כותבים דברים שקריים שכל העולם, כולל בני משפחה וילדים יכולים לקרוא און ליין. לו הם היו כותבים דברים כאלה בעיתון או אומרים אותם ברדיו- הם היו פתוחים לסיכון של תביעת הוצאת דיבה מצד האנשים שנפגעו. כעת עומדת לפני הכנסת הצעת חוק להגביר את העונשים הכספיים על חוק לשון הרע, כולל סעיף שמחייב מפעילי אינטרנט לזהות אנשים שכתבו בעילום שם בלוגים שמוציאים את דיבתם של אנשים אחרים.

מגוחך בעיני שחוגים ליברליים בישראל מרימים קול ובוחרים לעצמם לצעוק בנושא זה ובכך מחלישים את אמינותם בנושאים אחרים. אבל שישאר בינינו.

סרטים שכדאי

דצמבר הוא עונתם החמה של סרטי האוסקר הבא- כל האולפנים העולם משתדלים להציג את מיטבם. אז הינה סקירה קצרה ראשונה של מה שכדאי לכם לראות:

THE DESCENDANTSהוא סרטו של ג'ורג' קלוני שמגלם עורך דין מצליח שאשתו היפיפיה שוכבת במחלקה לטיפול נמרץ על ערש מותה לאחר פגיעת מוח, ועד הוא מנסה להתקרב לבנותיו ולשקם את חייהם, הוא מגלה שלאשתו היה רומן ממושך ורציני עם גבר אחר ושהיא התכוונה בעצם לעזוב אותו. הסרט, שמבוסס על ספר רב מכר ומצליח, בהחלט מרתק ושומר על מתח, אבל לטעם שלי ג'ורג' קלוני משחק כמו מי שממלא הוראות של ספר בישול, אבל כמו מי שהתפקיד הזה לא ממש מתאים לו או מדבר אליו. שמונה בסולם קורן.

"השבוע שלי עם מרלין" מבוסס על יומן אוטנטי של צעיר אנגלי שעבד על הסט של סרט בריטי שהשתתפו בו סר לורנס אוליבייה ומארלין מונרו האגדית בשנת 1955. הסרט מציג את מארלין מונרו כאישה מקסימה,שבירה וחסרת בטחון עצמי, שמנוצלת על ידי הזאבים של הוליווד. מישל ויליאם מגלמת את דמותה של מרלין מונרו בצורה מושלמת ומדהימה, ואין לי ספק שהיא תזכה באוסקר, אם תצליח לגבור על מריל סטריפ האגדית, שמגלמת את מרגרט ת'אצ'ר בסרט בריטי נוסף. עליו נדבר בטור הבא.

בטור קודם כתבתי שמונטבידאו היא בירת פראגווי. קורא נאמן תיקן אותי שבניגוד לדעתי, העיר הזו היא בירתה של אורוגוואי. תודה תודה. זה הכל בגלל שבדיוק בתקופה שלימדו את זה בבית ספר הייתי חולה. יש לי פתק מרופא, אבל שישאר בינינו.

Jews urged to be tested for genetic diseases

Husband honoured with 'hero' award

Elisa Birnbaum
Special to The CJN

Like any couple tying the knot, Caroline and Randy Gold had a long to-do list before walking down the aisle. Aside from the typical items, it included one that is particular to Ashkenazi Jews: genetic testing.

With one in five a carrier of Jewish genetic diseases, the couple decided to asking their doctors for comprehensive screenings. Randy got tested for two diseases, Caroline for eight. What the doctors missed would soon prove life-changing.

They had a healthy boy, Nathaniel, in 2006, and then a second child, Eden, two years later. But shortly after their beautiful daughter's arrival, something didn't seem quite right. She wasn't meeting her milestones, wasn't rolling over, couldn't sit up and her eyes were crossed. Their pediatrician reassured them, but parents have a sense about these things.

A few months later, the Golds met with a neurologist who did an MRI and called them later that night with the results. "We knew when the phone rang at 9:30, it wasn't good," recalls Caroline, repeating the specialist's words as though spoken yesterday, "I don't know what it is," he said, "but it's really bad and you guys need to be prepared for the worst."

A geneticist conducted further tests but found nothing. He then suggested they do one more, for a rare Jewish genetic disease. The Golds dismissed it at first, assuring the doctor they'd already been screened. No matter. On Aug. 25, 2009, Eden was formally diagnosed with mucolipidosis Type 4 (ML4), a progressive and debilitating neurological disorder beginning in infancy with various symptoms, such as muscle weakness, intellectual disabilities and retinal degeneration, and resulting in a shortened lifespan.

The news was gut-wrenching. "All our hopes and dreams for our girl flashed in front of our eyes," says Randy. "We spent a month or two trying to figure out what to do with the rest of our lives."

It would prove a seminal moment. For what they would choose to do next would not only affect their world, it would prove transformative on a much grander scale.

While many couples similarly challenged, understandably succumb to feelings of helplessness, the Golds were moved by something else entirely: a sense of duty. "We decided we had a responsibility that allowed us – required us even – to make sure that this didn't happen to another family," states Randy emphatically, his voice rising with emotion.

He and Caroline thought they were "covered" when they elected to be screened. They did the right thing, acted responsibly. Problem was, their doctors didn't know enough about testing. And it's actually a common, way too common, story. If they were knowledgeable – and very few are unfortunately – they'd have known to test for all Jewish genetic diseases, a number that is ever-growing. They would also have advised the Golds to update their tests, even after having their first healthy child. Sound extreme? Consider this: there are currently 19 known Jewish genetic diseases. The year Caroline and Randy married, it was 16. Two years before that, it was even fewer.

Caroline and Randy Gold with their children, Nathaniel and Eden

The Golds realized a desperate need for education existed. So, with funding from the Marcus Foundation in Atlanta and professional support from the Victor Center for Jewish Genetic Diseases in Philadelphia, the Golds founded Jewish Gene Screen, an organization that creates awareness about genetic screening among doctors, rabbis and the community at large, as well as offering screening and counselling year-round.

Randy is also busy on the speaker's circuit, imploring communities and their leaders to take control of their health care. "Jewish genetic diseases is an issue we can absolutely solve, if everyone works together," he says.

Having just completed its pilot year, the organization – currently based in the Golds' hometown of Atlanta – is about to spread its wings across the United States and beyond. And if year one is any indication – screenings increased by more than 400 per cent and test fees were reduced from $5,000 to $500 – the Golds' mission is well on its way.

Their efforts are not going unnoticed. Randy recently became a Jewish Community Hero, a title given by Jewish Federations of North America to honour people who make a difference in their communities. But, even more importantly, the couple is winning over hearts and minds as their public commitment, born of personal pain, is fuelling change as yet unforeseen.

For Caroline, inaction was simply unthinkable. Turning four in January, Eden is now in preschool, has a full-time special-needs therapist and is receiving a host of therapy treatments, including physical, occupation, speech and vision. The road ahead will be challenging.

"If I ever knew that it happened to someone else because they weren't properly educated, I would not be able to live with myself," says Caroline. And besides, "we didn't want Eden's life to be in vain," she adds. "It's actually Eden who's saving lives, and if that's her purpose, there's no more noble a life."

Enforcing support payments

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 30 years

Question. My ex has defaulted on support payments. I registered years ago with the Family Responsibility Office (FRO — Ontario Government Collection Agency for child support) to enforce payment but he has been jerking around the FRO and his children ever since. I'm a single mom and sole provider to my sons for the past 10 years with no financial assistance whatsoever. The FRO agreed to lower his monthly support payments from $700 to $500 on the arrears he owes without even consulting me after all the money I spent on legal fees to negotiate my separation agreement.

Meanwhile, he's built a 3,500 square foot new home with all the bells and whistles. Of course his common-law wife harbors his assets and income, although he's on title. And me? I've been paying rent in basements and live from paycheque to paycheque. Help!

Answer. Raise hell by contacting the FRO and your local MPP. I would tell them that your husband's common-law spouse is sheltering his assets. Then refer them to Section 41 of the Family Responsibility and Support Arrears Enforcement Act which allows the Director or the recipient (you) at any time during a default hearing to request the court to order a person who is financially connected to the payer to disclose financial information about themselves — like how much money they have, where they got it, and how they acquired all their assets and sources of income.

If the court is satisfied that your ex's common-law spouse is financially connected to your ex — either directly or indirectly — then the Judge has the power to add her as a party to the hearing. At that point the Judge can make her financially responsible for the money that your ex owes you, since she's sheltering his income or assets in order to frustrate enforcement of the support arrears.

Very few people know that such a law exists, but it does! If the FRO won't do anything it appears that you or your lawyer can ask the court to go after his common-law spouse because of the way Section 41 is worded. In addition, because your husband is on title, the FRO should register an order for any arrears against title and then move to sell the property if he refuses to pay — unless he's already made some sweetheart deal with the FRO to pay a lower amount and is complying with it. The FRO can also ask a Judge to jail him.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy Chanukah.

Magazine names Levy, 24, entrepreneur of the year

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Entrepreneur: "a person who organizes and manages any enterprise, especially a business, usually with considerable initiative and risk."

That's a dictionary definition, but it seems to have had Alexander Levy specifically in mind.

The 24-year-old University of Toronto researcher was recently named Canada's top entrepreneur by Profit magazine for designing an app to help improve the lives of people with communications disorders.

He did it with no small measure of initiative and risk.

Levy had been on the job in a university lab for less than a month when he decided to look into improving the communications gear lugged around by people who are unable to speak. In two weeks, working on his own, he came up with a prototype that he turned over to the head of the university's Technologies for Aging Gracefully lab.

"It became a large group project" with a team of 15 working on it, Levy said. The product was eventually commercialized and Levy became CEO of MyVoice. The university took a minority shareholder position.

MyVoice offers a downloadable app that allows users to program their iPhones, iPads, Android devices and tablets with reproducible phrases that can be employed in everyday situations. It includes a "location awareness" feature that detects familiar locations and finds relevant words for the situation, such as "a large double-double please."

So far, more than 9,500 people in 30 countries have downloaded the MyVoice app. It is particularly suitable for people with communications disorders arising from stroke, autism, aphasia or ALS.

MyVoice has only been in business for about nine months, but "it's been quite a ride. The growth has been fantastic," Levy said. Originally, he had expected to attract perhaps 5,000 to 6,000 users, but now he's hoping to reach 10,000 by the end of the year.

Since MyVoice is a privately held company, Levy won't reveal revenue or net income figures. The company's revenue is based on subscription fees. Downloads are free for basic service. Users receive 15 simple words and phrases. They also gain the ability to add a limited number of their own custom words, phrases, pictures, books, and places through the MyVoice Web service.

For $29 per month, users get access to additional custom words, phrases, pictures, books, and places. These "plus" users also get unlimited access to all features and services, and can add and maintain as many custom items as they like.

The app is available at MyVoice's website, along with simple tutorials, or at the Apple store.

Levy believes there is huge room to grow the service. MyVoice has only begun to scratch the surface of the potential clientele, while offering a low-cost alternative to existing solutions that are quite expensive.

Before MyVoice, families often plunked down thousands of dollars on heavy and bulky devices that were carried around in a shoulder bag or inconvenient binders with large numbers of flip cards.

"Families in crisis would go ahead and buy it, while the rate of abandonment was high," Levy said. "We say, if you have an iPhone or an Android phone, go ahead and try it."

Referring to Levy's success with MyVoice, Ian Portsmith, editor of Profit magazine, said the young entrepreneur is not only helping clients, but also boosting the Canadian economy.

"He is starting to create jobs in Canada," Portsmith told 680 News. "He now has 10 employees and we suspect that that's going to be much higher in years to come."

Levy said MyVoice still works closely with U of T, and it has ongoing co-operative relationships with Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, Toronto District School Board, Toronto Rehabilitation Institute and the Aphasia Institute.

Teachers are using it as a tool while working with children with special needs, such as autism or cognitive impairments, he said.

MyVoice has no plans at the moment to widen its reach by creating a traveller's phrasebook.

"Our focus is on special needs and people with disabilities," Levy said.

Levy has always been interested in social issues. A graduate of Northern Secondary School, he considered studying computer science and political science in university, but opted for the latter. "I was very active politically at the time and was interested in technology and political issues, like Internet censorship… privacy, copyright and net neutrality."

Besides, he was pretty good at writing code all on his own. Largely self-taught, he is adept at Ruby on Rails, the coding language that forms the backbone for MyVoice. "It's beautiful, like poetry," he said.

His skill in computer coding led him to captain the university team that entered a U.S. Navy competition to create a small robot boat that could be used for firefighting or search and rescue.

Powered by a series of car batteries, the 250-pound boat was assembled in less than 43 days in his parents' basement, at a total cost of $800 – his savings at the time. Tested in the backyard swimming pool, the device finished seventh overall, earning the team $1,000 in prize money, more than it cost to build.

"A military contractor came to us and asked us for our daily consulting rate," Levy recalled. "We didn't have one."

Right now his focus is on MyVoice – improving the product and making it more accessible. There are 3.5 million North Americans with communications disorders and only 10 per cent use a speech aid, he said. These people suffer higher rates of depression and isolation than the general population while only 14 per cent of a sample of 5,300 users of communications aids had jobs.

MyVoice, he said, "can help people participate in society, get jobs and lead more fulfilling lives."

Rail line to Eilat proposed

TEL AVIV — Israel is expected to sign an agreement with China that will see construction of a 170-kilometre train line to Eilat, Transportation Minister Yisrael Katz announced last week.

Not only will Beijing build the double track – one in each direction – from Nahal Zin to Eilat, it will also finance the project, Katz said. The cost is estimated at 6 billion ($1.62 billion) to 10 billion shekels ($2.7 billion).

"In January we will be celebrating the 20th anniversary of diplomatic relations with China. That is our target date for the Chinese transportation minister to visit Israel and sign a memorandum of understanding," Katz said. The project warrants being spared the usual tender process, the minister added.

The government has approved a track to Eilat as part of a 10-year infrastructure plan. But it didn't budget money for the project. A feasibility test conducted in the past found it wouldn't be economical, as neither passenger nor cargo traffic could justify the cost of a line to the Red Sea.

The Transportation Ministry, however, argues the train line would facilitate exports from the east to Europe, bypassing the Suez Canal. The Finance Ministry is appalled by the cost. Treasury officials say Chinese financing isn't needed, but rather state guarantees would be an issue. Nor is there any way to bypass statutory tenders, they said.

Neither Israel nor Hamas seeks escalation in violence

Avi Issacharoff and Amos Harel
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Commentary

Following two intense days on the Gaza Strip border, a semblance of calm was restored last Friday following tit-for-tat attacks between the Israel Defence Forces and Palestinian militants.

In Israel, there is hope that the current round of escalation is close to concluding. During two days, last Thursday and last Friday, the IDF killed five Palestinians in the territories – four in the Gaza Strip and one in the West Bank. One of the dead was a boy.

The round of violence began at noon on Thursday following the assassination of Isam al-Batash, a Palestinian activist who was planning to carry out a terrorist attack into Israel from Egyptian territory. Batash, known for being a member of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades and most recently to the Ayman Jude faction – a splinter group that broke away from Fatah – was killed in an air strike along with aide and family member Ala al-Batash. Following the strike, Palestinians fired a number of rockets into Israel, one of which landed in an open field in the Be'er Sheva area.

During the early hours of Friday morning, the Israel Air Force retaliated to the rocket fire, hitting a Hamas training camp in the neighbourhood of Sheikh Radwan, west of Gaza City. During the strike, a nearby home containing Palestinian civilians was hit. Two were killed: Hajat al-Za'alan, 39, and his son, Ramadan, 12. Seven other members of the family, the mother and six other children, were injured.

The firing of rockets into the Negev continued Friday and, less so, on Saturday, with four more rockets being fired. There were no Israeli casualties in the attacks. The air force also struck another Hamas target, this time causing no casualties.

Meanwhile, the IDF shot and killed Mustafa Tamimi, 28, from the village of Nabi Saleh, north of Ramallah. He suffered a direct hit to the face with a tear gas canister, at short range.

The decision to assassinate Isam al-Batash on Thursday was made after taking into account that there would be an escalation following the attack. However, the conclusion was reached that the attack was necessary in order to disrupt an attack being planned along the border with Egypt.

Batash funded and organized a team, probably a mixture of Bedouins from Egypt, to carry out an attack in northern Eilat.

Two events occurred following his killing: the Shin Bet security service lowered the alert level along the border, with the understanding that Batash's death would have made plans to carry out the attack more difficult. And a number of Palestinian factions responded to the killing by firing Qassam rockets, and in one case, a Katyusha.

There were signs that the rocket fire was dying out as early as Thursday. However, a decision was made in Israel to strike again, this time at Hamas. The logic is known: Hamas is the power in Gaza and therefore it must pay a price in any case in which its authority is violated and rockets are fired, contrary to its policy – albeit, a policy that is not always public – which supports calm.

The Gaza attack caused more damage than was intended because a larger blast than expected occurred – probably because a stockpile of ammunition being held in the location exploded. This led to the two civilian deaths.

Israel's insistence to draw a price from Hamas also led, to a certain extent, to the deterioration of the situation, and allowed other factions, not only Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, to take action. Much of this reaction was due to the fact that civilians were killed and hurt.

In the rocket firing Friday, former members of Islamic Jihad and members of the Popular Resistance Committees took part. In one case, a Katyusha was intercepted over Ashdod by an Iron Dome anti-rocket battery. Two other batteries were deployed near Ashkelon and Be'er Sheva.

Hamas has, for the time being, shown restraint, and also gradually began reasserting control over the factions. The group, which is still benefiting from the fruits of the release of Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit and is planning for elections in the territories, has no interest in a violent clash.

The Hamas leadership in Gaza called on Egypt in the hope that its involvement would stop Israel's response. Last Saturday night calm was being restored, but the real test was on Sunday morning, with pupils going to schools in the communities bordering the Gaza Strip.

Meanwhile, the disengagement of Hamas from Damascus is becoming a strategic decision rather than the original tactical move, and this is expected to have many implications on the group's policies. Only Friday, Hamas announced officially that it was joining the Muslim Brotherhood, in an effort to benefit a little from the success of the group in Egypt and gain broader support in the Palestinian street.

Hamas is aware of the wave of Muslim activism in popular elections around the Middle East, and it is hoping that in the coming elections in the Palestinian Authority, it will be well placed to take advantage of the regional momentum.

Netanyahu eyeing illegals problem

Dan Baron
JTA

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he will visit Africa as part of Israel's efforts to repatriate illegal migrants from Sudan and Eritrea. Netanyahu announced the trip, for which a schedule has yet to be given, during a cabinet discussion last Sunday about the influx to Israel of African migrants who cross the porous border with the Egyptian Sinai.

Netanyahu did not cite specific venues, but Israel has been in contact with South Sudan since the African country was formed this year. Israel has no ties with Sudan, a hostile Muslim nation. In addition to Juba, Netanyahu could have the option of visiting Asmara, the capital of Eritrea, with which Israel has relations.

The Jewish state sees a demographic and economic threat in the tens of thousands of African migrants who have reached its territory in recent years. Netanyahu noted Israel's plan to complete a fence along the Egyptian frontier within a year and said his government would also increase fines on employers who hire the border jumpers. According to Netanyahu's office, there are currently 52,487 illegal migrants who came to Israel seeking work, and their annual arrival rate has surged to 30,000.

Nobel winner Shechtman stresses education

JTA

JERUSALEM — When accepting his Nobel Prize, Israel's Dan Shechtman encouraged entrepreneurship among the young.

Shechtman, of the Technion in Haifa, became the 10th Israeli to win the world's most prestigious prize at Saturday's annual Nobel ceremony in Stockholm.

The Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences said Shechtman's discovery of quasicrystals, long ridiculed by colleagues, "has created a new cross-disciplinary branch of science, drawing from and enriching chemistry, physics and mathematics. This is in itself of the greatest importance."

Dan Shechtman

"It has also given us a reminder of how little we really know and perhaps even taught us some humility," academy professor Sven Lidin said.

Addressing the Nobel banquet, Shechtman said scientists have a duty "to promote education, rational thinking and tolerance.

"We should also encourage our educated youth to become technological entrepreneurs. Those countries that nurture this knowhow will survive future financial and social crises. Let us advance science to create a better world for all," he said.

Interviewed Sunday, Shechtman, 70, made it clear that he worries about education in Israel – specifically that of the haredi sector, which sometimes places more of a premium on religious studies than on core secular subjects.

"You can pray to the heavens, but it doesn't put bread on the table or provide defence for the country," he told Israel Radio.

Shechtman called for state funds to be denied to schools that neglect the core curriculum and for parents who deprive their children of a rounded education to be "punished under law."

Explosion in Iranian steel factory

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

An explosion at a steel-production complex in central Iran killed seven workers including foreigners, the semi-official Fars news agency quoted a senior local official in Yazd province as saying on Monday.

"The explosion at the Ghadir Steel plant led to the deaths of seven people and the serious injuries of 12 others who have been transferred to hospital for treatment," said Yazd's governor Azizulah Seifi.

"It happened on Sunday and caused the death of a number of foreign workers," he said, without elaborating on the number and nationality of the foreigners killed.

Seifi said the cause of the explosion had not been identified and an investigation was under way.

"The plant belongs to the private sector and its directors and officials have been summoned... experts are trying to determine the cause of the incident," Seifi said.

Last month, a mysterious blast rocked Isfahan in western Iran and reportedly damaged a key nuclear facility in the city.

Ha'aretz cited Iranian media as reporting that an explosion was heard near Isfahan, home to a uranium conversion plant operational since 2004.

A key issue in Egypt's elections

Netanyahu's office had asked the Jerusalem municipality to postpone the work due to the sensitivity of the issue and warnings from Egypt and Jordan.

A new bridge is meant to replace the wooden structure built over the Mughrabi Ramp, an earthen embankment that partially collapsed following a storm in 2004. The dismantling of the ramp in 2007 led to protests in the Muslim world and international criticism.

The dispute over the bridge has become a key issue in Egypt's elections. The Muslim Brotherhood's spiritual leader, Sheikh Yusuf Qaradawi, called Dec. 8 on Jordan's King Abdullah to dissuade Israel from replacing the ramp.

Qaradawi claims that Israel wants to replace the bridge to ease access by settlers and its security forces to the Al Aqsa Mosque. Posters were put up at Cairo's Al-Azhar University calling on Muslims to protect the mosque.

The Jordanian minister of Muslim religious trusts also warned Israel of the implications of demolishing the bridge, but officials in Israel told Ha'aretz that Amman reneged on an agreement with Israel over the bridge.

The officials said Jordan changed its position because it was worried the Palestinian Authority would use its new membership in UNESCO to increase its influence in the holy places in Jerusalem. The Jordanians say that Israel had agreed in the peace treaty with Jordan that the Jordanian Muslim religious trust would continue to administer the site.

Sheikh Yusuf Qaradawi

The holy compound is in the old walled city of Jerusalem, an area Israel captured along with the West Bank in the 1967 war and annexed in a step that has not won international recognition. Palestinians want the area to be part of a state they intend to create in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Jews revere the compound as the site of the biblical Temple, destroyed by Roman troops in the first century. For Muslims, who captured Jerusalem from the Christian Byzantines in the seventh century, the Dome of the Rock marks the spot from which Mohammad made his night journey to heaven.

Brotherhood wants to review peace treaty with Israel

Zvi Bar'el
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood said that the country's peace treaty with Israel needs re-evaluation by the country's new parliament, in press remarks by a senior member of the group published last Friday.

"A long time has passed since the Camp David accord was signed, and like the other agreements, it needs to be reviewed, and this is in the hands of the parliament," said Mahmoud Hussein, the group's secretary general.

"The brotherhood believes the treaty is of great importance, but it is not on the top of our list. There are other priorities for the time being," Hussein told the regional Asharq al-Awsat daily. "Generally, Israel does not honour the agreement," he added.

Mahmoud Hussein

He denied a report saying that the Muslim Brotherhood had reached an understanding with the United States and Israel on "the importance of safeguarding the peace treaty with Israel."

Israel expressed concern at the gains of Islamist parties in the first round of Egypt's recent parliamentary elections and urged any future government to uphold the 1979 peace treaty.

Islamists made big gains during the initial round of the first elections since a popular revolt this year forced former president Hosni Mubarak out of power.

The Freedom and Justice Party, the brotherhood's political wing, was in the lead with 36.5 per cent of the vote. It was followed by the hardline Salafist party, Al-Nour, with 24 per cent.

In related developments, Maj.-Gen. Mukhtar al-Mulla, a member of the ruling Supreme Council of the Armed Forces, upset the Muslim Brotherhood while speaking to foreign reporters.

The Brotherhood was angered by Mulla's statement that "the parliament chosen will not represent all segments of the Egyptian people while the constitution itself will determine the law for all Egyptians," and because of this the parliament will not be drafting the constitution by itself.

If the reporters didn't understand what the general had said or his words were taken out of context, this will probably be brought to light later, but one thing is certain: the Egyptian military doesn't intend to give up its supervisory role – even if not direct – in the drafting of the constitution, which will take effect after the elections are concluded, nor its independence from civilian review.

These principles, published by Egypt's deputy prime minister a few weeks ago, have already stirred massive protests in Tahrir Square and in other towns across Egypt, organized by the Muslim Brotherhood, resulting in the death of approximately 35 civilians in the hands of Egyptian security forces.

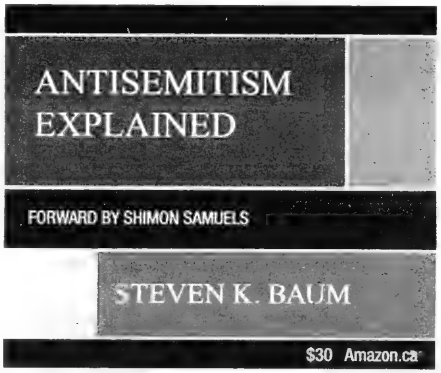
The Military Council is now trying to contain the results of the first election round, in which the Muslim Brotherhood was the big winner, and establish a new body to ensure the new constitution will not be exclusively drafted by the parliament, which will be dominated by the Muslim Brotherhood.

In the second round of voting, some 18 million voters will go to the polls, followed by a third and final round next month. The secular parties are attempting to unite in an attempt to gain a greater portion of representation in parliament.

The Egyptian military is concerned that Egypt's secular forces will not succeed in uniting and getting a significant hold in parliament. It is establishing an advisory council with members from all Egyptian parties and factions that will advise the military council on how to run the nation during the interim period until a new president is elected in June. Among this new council's responsibilities will be the approval of the members of the constitution's drafting committee.

The Egyptian military hopes this move will deny the Brotherhood-dominated parliament from choosing the members itself.

This advisory committee, with members that include prominent protest movement activists, intellectuals, party leaders and other public figures, is naturally suspect by the Brotherhood, which insists only parliament be responsible for drafting the constitution. This will be the next political battlefield in which Egypt's secular and Islamic movements will fight for the identity of the new Egypt. How the Egyptian military will play it out only time will tell.



Israel Briefs

Katsav jailed

Still pleading his innocence, former Israeli president Moshe Katsav began his seven-year prison term for rape. An ashen-faced Katsav entered Maasiyahu Prison Dec. 7 after delivering a prepared statement to reporters and supporters who mobbed the doorway of his home in Kiryat Malachi. "Without any evidence, that State of Israel is putting a person to death," he said. "The day will come when the truth will emerge. I do not know when that will be – whether with or without you, whether with or without me." Such remarks are bound to worry Katsav confidants, who said they fear the 66-year-old could commit suicide or be persecuted behind bars by inmates whose clemency requests he turned down while head of state. But Katsav, who was convicted a year ago of twice raping an aide when he was tourism minister in the 1990s and of molesting female staff in the President's House, appeared to be pinning hopes on his Supreme Court appeal proceedings, which are still under way. Israeli law allows for jail terms to be cut by one-third for good behaviour, but that generally requires the inmate to admit guilt and voice regret for the crime committed.

Jewish birth rates rising

Birth rates among Israel's Jews are on the rise compared with those of Arab citizens, population data reveal. Yediot Achronot published a report showing that over the last decade, the Jewish birth rate in Israel has grown by nearly 20 per cent while the Muslim and Christian rates have fallen by five per cent and 10 percent, respectively. The findings, which the newspaper said came from the Interior Ministry's Population and Immigration Authority, offset widespread concerns that Israel's 80 per cent Jewish majority is threatened by population growth among Arab citizens and Palestinians in the West Bank. According to Yediot, 69 per cent of births in 2001 were Jewish, 28 per cent Muslim and two per cent Christian. By contrast, in 2010 the respective birth figures for the ethnic groups were 76 per cent, 22 per cent and one per cent. Israeli Arabs tend to have large families, but this has changed along with the sector's economic elevation into the middle class.

Deportations promised

Israel's interior minister, Eli Yishai, promised to deport tens of thousands of Africans who have crossed into his country illegally in recent years. "I will safeguard the Jewish majority and the state, and I ensure that the last of the Sudanese, and the Eritreans, and all of the infiltrators, to the last of them, will return to their countries," Yishai, of the Shas party, told Army Radio. "I have pity on the people of Israel." Upheaval in neighbouring Egypt has stirred concern in Israel over a surge in border-jumping by Sudanese and Eritrean migrants, who make their way across the Sinai with the help of smugglers. Some 40,000 of the Africans are now in Israel, most of them allowed to settle and work in major cities, although authorities generally grant them neither refugee status nor formal refugee status. The influx has worried some Israelis about a potential demographic threat, while others have argued that the migrants should be taken in on humanitarian grounds.

Lieberman defends Russian elections

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A recent Russian parliamentary vote may have been flawed but still represented the will of the people, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said on Monday.

At the same time, Lieberman added his support to a proposed bill that would ban Israeli mosques from using loudspeakers to call worshippers to prayer

Lieberman's remark about the Russian vote came on the heels of a comment he made on the subject last week, when he said the elections in Russia were fair

"The outcome of the elections reflects the mood in Russia," said. "Maybe there were some errors in several areas in Russia… but that is not different than what happens in Israel in various Arab and Druze villages."

Lieberman noted that modern Russia has only existed for 20 years, after hundreds of years of Czar and Communist regimes.

"Russia is not a western democracy, and it is impossible to jump four steps at a time," he said. "In 20 years, quite a lot has happened. When you are in Moscow, you can see criticism of [prime minister Vladimir] Putin and [president Dmitry] Medvedev on Russian television. One can also get a permit for a protest in Moscow"

Lieberman said that the errors in Russia's elections did not significantly alter the results. "In Russian villages, the elections did not operate like in Zurich or Basel… but is it much different than what happens in Israel in various villages?" he asked.

"The elections were not perfect, but they were reflective of the situation. There were various problems and that also happens in more advanced countries, lest I remind you of the Florida elections between [George W.] Bush and Al Gore."

Along with Lieberman, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu voiced support for a bill proposed by Yisrael Beiteinu party member, MK Anastassia Michaeli, which would ban mosques from using loudspeaker systems to call people to prayer.

In a cabinet meeting on Sunday, Netanyahu said that there was "no need to be more liberal than Europe."

Referring to the so-called Muezzin Law, Lieberman said on Monday that the bill was a "legitimate" one, adding that "there are similar precedents in the western world."

"I don't want to reinvent the wheel. I've seen the kind of laws that were approved in Switzerland concerning mosques and in France regarding veils," Lieberman said.

The foreign minister was making reference to a 2010 Swiss law that forbids mosques from having minarets, as well as to a French ban on Muslim head-scarves and veils.

"The bill comes from a worldview whereby freedom of religion should not be a factor in undermining quality of life," she said.

Netanyahu made similar comments to the Likud ministers at the Sunday cabinet meeting.

"I have received numerous requests from people who are bothered by the noise from the mosques," he said. "The same problem exists in all European countries, and they know how to deal with it. It's legitimate in Belgium. It's legitimate in France. Why isn't it legitimate here? We don't need to be more liberal than Europe."

Deputy Prime Minister Dan Meridor said there was no need for such a law and that it would only escalate tensions.

Michael Eitan, minister for the improvement of government services, agreed with Meridor, adding that the law was a pretext for those wishing to legislate against Muslims. "If the desire was to combat sound, then a law against sound in all areas should be introduced," said Eitan. "But the MK proposing the bill wants to combat religion. I met with her and she tried selling it to me as an environmental law. I said to her, 'Look me in the eyes. You are not interested in the environment, but in Islam.'"

Avigdor Lieberman

Culture and Sports Minister Limor Livnat agreed with Eitan and Meridor, saying anyone who wishes to serve a complaint over noises coming from mosques can already do so under existing law. "There is an anti-noise law that is supposed to deal with the problem of noise from mosques, if such a problem even exists, but that law is not enforced. There is no need for a new law, rather the proper enforcement of the existing one," said Livnat.

Netanyahu said the matter would be debated over the coming days and that the bill would be brought before the ministerial committee next week.

As a resident of Caesarea, Netanyahu is particularly familiar with the struggles that exist over noises emerging from mosques. For some time now, Caesarea residents have been acting against the use of loudspeaker systems by mosques in the neighbouring village of Jisr al-Zarqa. In the past few years, teams of members from both villages have been set up to find solutions to various issues.

Israel challenges UNRWA

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel questioned the use of the UN aid agency created exclusively for Palestinian refugees.

Addressing the United Nations in Geneva, Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon argued Dec. 8 against the two-tier system whereby Arabs displaced by the fighting in British Mandatory Palestine around the creation of the Jewish state in 1948, and their descendants, are tended to by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA), while other refugees must look collectively to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

Israel has long argued that UNRWA perpetuates the conflict with the Palestinians, who insist on a "right of return" for their refugees to land now in Israel, whereas UNHCR has often worked to resettle its wards.

Danny Ayalon

"While the UNHCR has found durable solutions for tens of millions of refugees, the agency created specifically for the Palestinian context, UNRWA, has found durable solutions for no one," Ayalon said at the conference, according to a transcript circulated by his office.

"This has meant that a peaceful solution to the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians remains further away. This is morally and politically unacceptable."

Israel says Palestinian refugees should resettle in a future Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, or elsewhere. Israelis also have called on the international community to give consideration to the hundreds of thousands of Jews from Arab countries who were dispossessed during the 1948 war and were mostly taken in by Israel.

Egged bus company fined for seat discrimination

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel's largest bus company, Egged, was fined for forcing a woman to sit in the back of a bus.

Egged was fined approximately $1,070 by a small claims court on Dec. 7 for gender discrimination and violating the High Court of Justice's ruling opposing forced segregation of men and women in the public sphere, according to the Israel Hayom website. In the suit, filed in July by the Israel Religious Action Center in Rishon Lezion Magistrate Court, the complainant said a driver employed by Egged made her sit in the back while the bus was travelling to the haredi area of Bnei Brak.

"I explained to the driver that the line was not a segregated line, but the driver dismissed my argument and said that only the rabbis can decide whether a bus is segregated or not. It was humiliating and insulting," the complainant, who is Orthodox, said in court, Israel Hayom reported.

Egged issued a statement arguing that the driver was not representing the company's views.

The bus company has been accused before of discrimination. In October, It was ordered to pay approximately $16,000 in compensation after a driver told a young female student that he "doesn't let blacks ride on the bus."

In 2006, Miriam Shear, an American-Israeli woman, reportedly was beaten by a gang of haredim when she refused to move to the back of the bus while travelling to the Western Wall.

The Dec. 7 ruling came a week after U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said in a closed question-and-answer session that she is concerned about the direction of Israel's democracy, prompting Sephardi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar to accuse Clinton in a radio interview of having "no real knowledge of a Jewish woman's modesty."

"The Jewish people respect women and treat them like queens and princesses," Rabbi Amar said.

Leisure adventures await in Caesarea

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c

Way back in Roman times, chariot racing was a box-office hit in the Mediterranean town of Caesarea. While that particular pastime isn't drawing crowds anymore, it set the tone for millennia later, when Caesarea is still one of Israel's premier leisure spots.

True, you don't have to come all the way to northern Israel to play golf, even if it is on the new Pete Dye-designed 18-hole course opened two years ago. But what other golfing and diving resort also offers a range of land and sea archeological treasures? For that, this upscale town halfway between Tel Aviv and Haifa is a prime destination.

Before diving in or teeing off in the modern part of the city, get acquainted with history at Old Caesarea's Time Tower, a renovated fortress overlooking the ancient Roman aqueduct and restored harbour built by King Herod's labourers in homage to Augustus Caesar more than 2,000 years ago.

Voyage in Time, a 10-minute 3D big-screen movie, takes viewers from the Herodian period through the Roman, Byzantine, Arab and Crusader eras, and finally through the early days of Zionist immigration.

Also in Time Tower is the audience-interactive tech show Stars of Caesarea, where you'll meet 12 prominent historical figures active in Old Caesarea, such as King Herod, Saladin, Baron Edmond Rothschild, Augusta Helena, King Louis IX and St. Paul.

Caesarea's ancient Roman aqueduct and amphitheater, the oldest surviving Roman theater in the eastern Mediterranean region, provide the setting for a world-class Jazz Festival every June. The harbour is dotted with restaurants, cafes, art galleries and nightlife.

Aqueduct (Arches) Beach, one of Israel's most picturesque beaches, is punctuated by the ruins of a raised aqueduct built by Herod and expanded 300 years later to bring running water to Caesarea from a spring at the foot of Mount Carmel.

Now back to the sports part of the program.

There's nothing else in the world rivaling Caesarea's all-seasons Underwater Archeological Park. Leah Schneider of the Caesarea Development Corporation tells ISRAEL21c that amateur and professional divers alike get their feet wet at this $4.6 million project opened in 2004 in cooperation with the University of Haifa.

The park offers four diving complexes, one of them specifically for snorkelers. Underwater, 25 marked exhibits point out basins, breakwaters, loading piers, storage rooms, a promenade and a lighthouse. Wrecked ships and cargos, ancient anchors and an illegal immigrant ship are among artifacts discovered on the seabed.

Many of the discoveries in Caesarea's waters in recent years have been made by an immigrant from the United States, University of Haifa geo-archeologist Dr. Beverly Goodman. By studying ancient undersea fragments collected on her dives, Goodman found evidence of an ancient tsunami that destroyed Herod the Great's first-century harbour. She's using the data to help predict future environmental events and to make recommendations for preserving the fragile coastline as sea levels rise.

The Roman ruins

Prefer to stay on the surface? Caesarea is home to Freegull Sea Sports surfing school. This is where Gal Fridman, Israel's Olympic gold medalist in wind surfing, once took courses. At Beit Yannai Beach on the road toward Netanya, is the surfing school Kite Away.

Every Friday toward sundown during the summer months, the sky over Caesarea's beach is brightened with colorful kites in an unusual modern Israeli ritual to welcome the Sabbath.

A trove of archeological treasures greet the tourist

Founded as a Phoenician port called Stratons Towers, in 90 BCE the town was conquered by Alexander Jannaeus and annexed into the Hasmonean kingdom of the Greek period. Ruins of temples to Greek gods remain as a testament to this era.

Nearly 60 years later, the Roman Emperor Augustus Caesar presented the town as a gift to his puppet king, Herod, who renamed it Caesarea and constructed a harbour, hippodrome (remember the chariot races?), bathhouses, temples and a palace between 22 and 10 BCE. Caesarea became the capital of ancient Palestine, with brisk trade activity at the harbour.

Relaxing on the beachfront

Today, the preserved ruins are incorporated into Caesarea National Park for tourists to explore. Among the treasures is a giant obelisk restored in 2001 in a $150,000 privately funded Antiquities Authority project that took nearly two years.

Pontius Pilate governed Caesarea during the time of Jesus, and here the first pagan, Cornelius, converted to Christianity. During the third century, Caesarea evolved as a center for Christian scholarship.

Between the 10th and 12th centuries Caesarea was ruled alternately by the Christian Crusaders and the Muslim conqueror Saladin. In the 13th century, the Mamluk sultan of Egypt captured and destroyed Caesarea along with all other coastal cities.

The Old City lay in ruins till the middle of the 19th century, when Bosnian Muslims and then German Templars established a small fishing village near the site of the Crusader castle. Visitors can tour the pier built here in the 1850s, where fishermen still cast their lines when the sea is calm. A paved path leads to the Underwater Archeological Park, beach, eateries and an artist's complex.

Among the galleries is Draydel House, displaying hundreds of Chanukah spinning tops, as well as other Judaica items, handcrafted by ceramicist Eran Grebler. What is believed to be the world's largest dreidel, crafted by Grebler, towers over Caesarea's train station.

Outside the harbour area is the Ralli Museum of South American Art, which has works by Salvador Dali and a Caesarea history exhibit. Nearby is the recently discovered sixth-century Palace of the Bird Mosaic.

The cool air of Rosh Pina

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel 21c

One of modern Israel's first towns, Rosh Pina was a flop for farmers but today hosts a thriving and picturesque artists' colony.

When Oreet Segal's ancestors came from Romania to establish the farming town of Rosh Pina in the Upper Galilee, they shlepped along wooden boats. The newcomers figured on earning an income from fishing in the little river described by Segal's great-great-uncle on an earlier pilot trip.

perAlas, as soon as they laid eyes on it, they realized that the stream wasn't a fisherman's paradise. So the families found a creative use for the boats: they put them together to form the roof of the synagogue, whose main craftsman was Segal's great-grandfather, Mordechai Katz.

This is just one of the quaint stories about Rosh Pina (Hebrew for "cornerstone") that Segal, a licensed Israeli tour guide, loves to tell visitors. "You can still see the contour of the boats when you look up at the ceiling, which is painted blue to look like the sky," Segal tells Israel21c.

Though the founding families in 1882 had a rough time making a go of their Zionist enterprise, today the "mother of the Galilee settlements" is a thriving artists' colony and gateway to many nearby cities of interest. Many bed-and-breakfasts and luxury boutique hotels are tucked among its restored stone houses, and at night its restaurants and pubs offer music and world cuisine. In all, about 400 guest rooms and 30 eateries are open for business in Rosh Pina. Many spa hotels and other accommodations are located not far away.

The clear, cool mountain air of Rosh Pina and the vistas it affords across the Golan Heights, Mount Hermon and Hula Valley – central to the Romanian immigrants' decision to put down roots in the area –are still among the aspects that travelers enjoy most.

"There are a lot of places to stay here today, and the weather is beautiful with a high elevation, so it's pleasant in the summer with a great view," says Segal.

About 2,500 people live in Rosh Pina, which can be explored within a few hours.

'A kind of a forgotten backyard'

A vista of the Golan Heights

Segal likes showing tourists the house where her father was born, as well as the synagogue and the mikvah, all authentic structures. "A lot of the original houses are there, just 'yuppified' and glorified," she says, "including the home of the well-loved schoolteacher. When he passed away, they made a fancy memorial to him in the cemetery."

Pop star Madonna even looked into buying one of these houses. She was interested in the town because she'd learned in her kabbalah studies that according to the Jewish mystical tradition, Rosh Pina is the site where the messiah will first appear.

The centrepiece of a tour in Rosh Pina is the building where the village's early patron, Baron Edmund de Rothschild, installed clerks to oversee how his money was being spent. The building now houses a museum featuring an audiovisual presentation about the history of Rosh Pina. Outside, visitors can walk through the Baron's Gardens, reportedly modeled on the grand gardens at Versailles.

Another landmark is the home of Prof. Gideon Mer, who in 1929 established a malaria research laboratory in Rosh Pina. His work gained worldwide recognition for stopping the malaria epidemic among new agricultural settlers in the region and beyond. The preserved house contains an exhibit of historic items from various periods, such as old plows, laboratory equipment and textbooks.

But Rosh Pina wasn't well known until the late 1980s, says Segal, "when it became a haven for artists looking for inexpensive old homes." Many of those homes have been turned into ceramic studios and art galleries.

Tour guide and local resident Akiva Oren likes to use Rosh Pina as a base for trips to nearby and better-known areas including Safed (Tzfat); Tiberias; Korazim National Park on the Sea of Galilee; Tel Hatzor National Park on the ruins of the biblical King Solomon's summer palace; and the Hula Lake, which is a famous spot for bird-watchers.

"I take people for a few hours in Jeeps to see the north, which is really unique," says Oren. "Rosh Pina is a good base for traveling in all four directions."

Segal's relatives were not the first Jews to try establishing a town on the slopes of Mount Canaan, which would later become Rosh Pina. In 1878, 18 religious Jews from Safed walked 90 minutes to this area, hoping to start farming with the help of three natural springs.

"They didn't want to beg for money from European Jews," says Oren. "They wanted to work the land as farmers and make their own living."

But it wasn't smooth sailing, and the adventurers' hungry stomachs eventually forced most of them back to Safed. In 1882, as many idealistic Europeans began emigrating to their ancestral land in what is now called the First Aliyah, 40 families from Romania arrived and walked from the port to the town they named Rosh Pina. It was incorporated in 1953.

Slowly, the Europeans bought up land from Arab property-holders. Oren says most were only too happy to sell their plots since they needed money to bribe the authorities to keep their sons out of the Turkish army.

"My grandmother was five years old when they arrived, and she remembered living in hillside caves at the beginning," says Segal. "The first thing they built was a mikvah and then small homes. They tried to be farmers, but didn't know much about it."

Despite financial assistance from Rothschild, the venture was plagued by difficulties that sent many of the original families packing.

First they tried planting mulberries to grow silkworms. Then they planted flowers to make perfume. Neither idea panned out well, says Segal.

"They suffered a lot from diseases and from hostile neighbours, too. My great-grandfather, who was very tall with red hair and a red beard, rode around guarding the settlement on a big white horse. The Arabs called him Big Mottel."

And so Rosh Pina remained what Segal calls "a kind of a forgotten backyard" until about a century after its founding. "It started getting a rebirth as people bought up houses to make B&Bs and galleries."

It offers something for sports-lovers, too. A new 25-kilometer section of the Israel Bike Trail was just opened to cyclists this fall by the Keren Kayemeth LeIsrael-Jewish National Fund, and there are also trails for horseback riding and hiking.

Figurines illuminate the lives of their owners

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Edmund de Waal, London-based author of The Hare with Amber Eyes: A Hidden Inheritance (Picador), has described this memorable book as "a biography of a collection and the biography of my family."

The collection he refers to is an assortment of some 264 netsuke, tiny elegant figurines carved by Japanese craftsmen in centuries past. The family is the Ephrussis, the famed Jewish grain and banking family, kin to the Rothschilds and once nearly as wealthy.

The book traces the history of the netsuke from about 1870 to 2010, inevitably illuminating the lives and times of their various owners from Charles Ephrussi, who assembled the collection, to their present guardian, de Waal himself. As much as this book is about art and provenance and the transitory nature of material possessions, it's also a compelling family history drawn from an intriguing peripheral position.

The hare with amber eyes and the other netsuke in Charles's collection were kept in a large vitrine, or cabinet, with green velvet shelves and glass doors that locked. De Waal intricately describes the room, with its lavish furniture and Old Master and impressionist paintings, in the magnificent Hotel Ephrussi in central Paris where Charles lived.

A fabulously wealthy banking heir turned prominent art critic and patron, Charles hosted many artistic soirées here, attended by the upper echelons of French society and many esteemed artists and writers. A debonair bachelor who conducted a discreet long-term affair with a married woman, his friends included Manet, Renoir, Whistler and Proust, who used him as a primary model for his character Swann in Remembrance of Things Past.

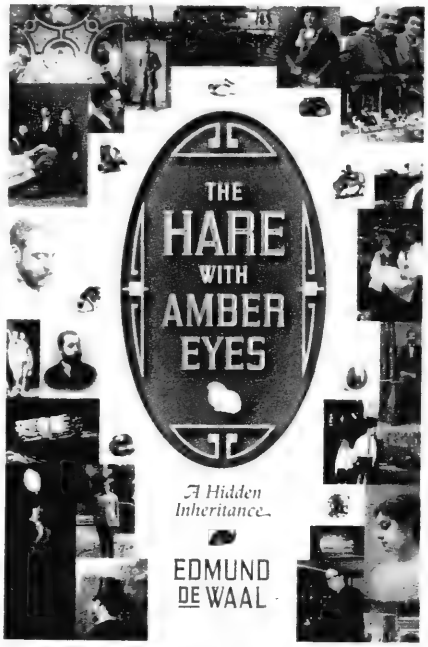
After the Dreyfus Affair erupted in 1894, many French citizens – including Renoir, Degas and the literary Goncourt brothers – openly declared their enmity toward the Jews. The netsuke's Paris period ends on this discordant note: in 1899 Charles gave them to his cousin, Viktor von Ephrussi of Vienna, as a wedding present.

Almost in passing does de Waal relate the details of Charles' remaining years and his death in 1905, after the netsuke have passed from his hands. The narrative focuses on the story's various objects, characters and incidents, it seems, only so long as they are connected to the netsuke.

Viktor and his bride, Emmy, the author's great-grandparents, reside in the Palais Ephrussi, a spectacular mansion in central Vienna. He acquires the netsuke at a time when the antisemitic Dr. Karl Lueger was mayor and thousands of persecuted Jewish refugees were arriving from the east.

Viktor and Emmy lived at the heart of Viennese society until the Anschluss, which introduced a flood of Brownshirts, shouts in the streets and shattering of glass. The Ephrussis were soon swept away by the turmoil. A mob with swastika armbands banged their fists on the door, swarmed into the apartment and ransacked it, a scenario repeated endlessly in many other Jewish households.

"They have walked past this house for years, glimpsed faces at windows, seen into the courtyard as the doorman holds the gate open while the fiacre trots in. They are inside now, at last. This is how the Jews live, how the Jews used our money – room after room stacked with stuff, opulence. Pushing the family members into a corner, they reach Emmy's dressing room, the room with the netsuke, push everything off the desk, drag the desk into the corridor and over the handrail; it smashes on the courtyard below."



Hitler arrives by motorcade along a Ringstrasse lined by cheering crowds; soon the male Ephrussis are taken away, but Emmy is permitted to live in two rooms at the back of the house. She watches as the contents of the apartment are Aryanised, becoming the property of the Third Reich.

"The house wasn't theirs any more. It was full of people, some in uniforms and some in suits. People counting rooms, making lists of objects and pictures, taking things away. Anna [the maid] is in there somewhere. She has been ordered to help with this packing-up into boxes and crates, told that she should be ashamed of working for the Jews."

The Nazis are interested in everything. Some Old Master paintings are given to museums, many others sold to dealers, and the very best photographed so that Hitler may have his choice of the lot. Books in the Ephrussi library are dispersed to high-ranking Nazis and to libraries in Vienna and Berlin. They also take clothes, furniture, silver; such materials are called "ownerless Jewish property."

Viktor and Emmy's daughter, Elisabeth, de Waal's grandmother, escapes to England and revisits the Ephrussi mansion after the war. An American soldier invites her into what has been transformed into a series of offices. She recognizes only a few incidental family possessions; the vitrine is still there but it is empty. The soldier sends for an old local woman who might know more.

Thus is Elisabeth reunited with the family maid, Anna – and then with the netsuke, which Anna had smuggled out of the house in her pockets by threes and fours. Eventually Elisabeth's brother, Iggy, inherits them and ultimately hands them down to de Waal. Beautiful and mute, these figurines are just about all that remain of the once inestimable Ephrussi fortune.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

TIFF Bell Lightbox screens Polanski retrospective

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

It's debatable whether the Holocaust has affected, much less influenced, Roman Polanski, one of the masters of contemporary cinema.

A child of the Holocaust whose Polish Jewish parents were interned in the Krakow ghetto, Polanski has directed only one feature film about this catastrophic event, The Pianist (2002), which won three Academy Awards.

But in his dark, suspenseful films, the Holocaust is implicitly present as a metaphor for man's inhumanity to man.

Impregnated with violence, fear and unpredictability, Polanski's movies bring into relief the random, heartless cruelty that lurks beneath the thin veneer of our civilization. This is hardly surprising, since he was a frightened, bewildered Jewish boy left to his own devices in Nazi-occupied Poland.

These thoughts come to mind on the eve of a Roman Polanski retrospective, due to take place at the Toronto International Film Festival's Bell Lighhtbox from Dec. 17 to 25.

Roman Polanski

The movies due to be screened are selections from his distinct phases as a director of distinction.

Knife in the Water (1962), Polanski's first feature-length movie, won an Academy Award nomination for best foreign film and introduced westerners to a refreshing new talent. After Knife in the Water – a psychological thriller seething with sexual tension and rivalry – Polanski settled in Paris, where he was born in 1933.

Unable to carve out a niche in France, he moved to Britain, where he directed, among others, Repulsion (1965), his first English-language film, and Cul-de-sac (1966), a Gothic horror film he regards as his finest movie.

With Rosemary's Baby (1968), a spooky film starring John Cassavetes, a young Mia Farrow and the irrepressible Ruth Gordon, he launched the Hollywood phase of his career.

Around this time, he married Sharon Tate, a starlet who was murdered by the Charles Manson gang in 1969. Shattered by her death, Polanski went to Britain.

In 1977, three years after Polanski's stylish salute to the private eye genre in Chinatown, he pleaded guilty to the charge of unlawful sex with a minor in Los Angeles. Fleeing the United States to avoid prison, he settled in France, a fugitive from the law.

After settling in France, he made Tess (1979), a period piece based on a Thomas Hardy novel and dedicated to Tate. But seven years would elapse before he launched his next project, Pirates, a homage to Errol Flynn's swashbuckling films.

In his movies, Polanski always deals with human frailties. Wartime Poland, where three million Jews perished during the Nazi occupation, gave him a taste of human cruelty and the meaning of racial hatred.

Polanski's parents, Ryszard and Bula, were thoroughly Polonized and Jews in name only. But to antisemitic Poles, and certainly to some Germans from Nazi Germany, the Polanskis were beyond the pale.

Having returned to Poland from France in 1936, they established themselves in Krakow. With Germany's invasion of Poland in 1939, their lives were upended and imperiled.

Pushed into the ghetto, they struggled to survive an unprecedented ordeal. For an impressionable boy like Polanski, who witnessed the horrors and degradations of the sealed ghetto, these were the worst of times.

Deported to German-annexed Austria, Polanski's father survived the rigours of the Mauthausen concentration camp. His mother, however, was murdered in the inferno of Auschwitz.

Having escaped from the ghetto, Polanski fared better than his parents. And like Jerzy Kosinski's protagonist in The Painted Bird, he passed through a series of trials and tribulations that tested his mettle to the maximum.

Disguised as a Roman Catholic and using a pseudonym, he went into hiding, helped by sympathetic Poles. He never forgot this horrific, hand-to-mouth chapter in his life.

Reunited with his father after the war, Polanski was a Holocaust survivor in the profoundest sense. Having been exposed to the dark side of human behavior, he was a marked man, psychologically at least. His days, weeks and months as a Jew dangling on the abyss would affect him as a filmmaker.

A graduate of the National Film School in Lodz, he was an actor before becoming a director. Knife in the Water, the first major postwar Polish film whose theme was not about the war, was an international sensation.

John Cassavetes and Mia Farrow in Rosemary's Baby.

Featuring only three actors, an arrogant sportswriter, his much younger wife and a hitchhiker, it unfolds languidly on a sailboat on a placid Polish lake over a span of about 24 hours. Simmering with pent-up emotions, gamesmanship and betrayal, Knife in the Water paints an unflattering picture of people under pressure and duress.

Rosemary's Baby, which is set in a gloomy Manhattan apartment building that has seen better days, revolves around a young couple befriended by odd next-door neighbours. It is suffused with menace, spooked by witchcraft and drenched in the spectre of Satanism.

And in an implicit reference to the Holocaust, a character exclaims, "God is dead, Satan lives." Presumably, Polanski was animated by this feeling in 1940s Poland.

Undercurrents of evil also course through Chinatown, which stars Jack Nicholson as a Los Angeles investigator who plunges headlong into the heart of darkness after accepting what on the face of it seems like a normal adultery case.

But only in The Pianist, based on the memoirs of a Polish Jewish musician and arguably his best film, does Polanski deal with the Holocaust per se.

Unfortunately, The Pianist is not in this retrospective. When asked about its exclusion, TIFF spokesperson Katia Houde explained that only films that best complement Polanski's latest picture, Carnage, were chosen.

Described as a "scathing, shocking, unsettlingly honest and surprisingly hilarious comedy," Carnage seems unlike anything else in the Polanski pantheon. But if its representation of human beings is unsettling, he will be in his element once again

The films screening at the retrospective are Knife in the Water, Chinatown, Cul-de-Sac, Repulsion, The Tenant, Rosemary's Baby and Ghost Writer. For the complete schedule visit tiff.net.

Artist inspired by her patients at SickKids

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Gloria Green, 48, balances her life between two passions.

By day she is a pediatric clinical dietitian at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, and on nights and weekends, she is an artist.

A member of the SickKids oncology team for 16 years, Green said that she transfers the feelings and sentiments she absorbs during the day into large pieces of abstract art.

"Providing nutritional care and support for children with cancer and their families can be challenging at times, yet it is rewarding because I'm given a chance to make a difference in their lives. Their bravery inspires me.

"My painting acts as an outlet. During the process of working on a piece, I can go through several emotions.

"My work is a channel for my self-expression. I'm reliving the emotions, stresses and rewards from my work. It is a good release for me. It's not unlike the release runners get from a good run."

A classically trained pianist who wrote her own music, Green said she began painting seven or eight years ago when she moved into a new loft apartment with bare walls and high ceilings.

Gloria Green

"I had always been interested in design, colour and space, so I bought a canvas and began painting. I was hooked."

She studied abstract painting under Lydia Parnat at the Avenue Road School of Art and then attended the Toronto School of Art.

"Now, I can't imagine not painting. My walls are covered with abstract pieces, and some are taller than me," said Green, who stands just at under five feet.

Recently, she said, she donated a painting to SickKids. "It was a long process. The hospital has an art committee, and I had to submit a package explaining my work."

The painting, now hanging in the oncology day hospital, is done in blue, yellow and green acrylic, "and I added water to give it lots of movement. It can be uplifting, but because it's abstract, it can be interpreted in different ways."

She favours acrylic paint, she said, because it is non-toxic and versatile. "It can be thickened or diluted."

When she begins a painting, said Green, she takes brush directly to canvas. "I don't draw anything ahead of time. I ruminate in terms of my mood and what inspires me, and I plan my palette in my mind."

Most of her paintings are non-representational, she said, but in one mixed-media work, she shredded paper to represent trees.

Green's art is on exhibit until Dec. 23, with an art party – Green will be present and everyone is welcome – scheduled for Dec. 15 between 7 and 9 p.m., at Toronto's Wellington Street Art Gallery, 270 Wellington St. W., Suite 105.

Degrassi grad stars in Green Day rock opera

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

The first rock concert Jake Epstein saw was one by the American punk band Green Day in Mississauga, Ont. He was 12.

Now, the 24-year-old Toronto actor is starring in American Idiot, a rock opera based on Green Day's Grammy Award-winning 2004 multi-platinum album of the same name.

Epstein says it means a lot to him to be in a show written by this band, and he feels that he has come full circle. He's looking forward to meeting Green Day when they come to see the show in Toronto.

"The show is the closest thing to a rock concert that's still theatre that I have ever seen in my life," says Epstein from New York, where he is rehearsing the role of Will for the show's inaugural American tour.

"I think audiences will be thoroughly entertained. It is quite a moving piece especially with the Occupy Movement… and with the thinking about it being unfair that the one per cent takes everyone's money.

Jake Epstein

And I think that this real piece of news really resonates with American Idiot."

The tour opens at the Toronto Centre for the Arts on Dec. 28, part of the Dancap 2012 Broadway Series, before hitting 14 cities in the United States.

Epstein said he finds the idea of performing for friends and family on opening night equally exciting and nerve-racking.

Epstein is known to television audiences for his role as Craig in Degrassi: The Next Generation and to theatre-goers for a number of productions, most recently the musical Billy Elliot. However, it was his role as Melchior in the North American tour of Spring Awakening, which had the same production team as American Idiot, that got him his current role.

"American Idiot tells the story of three friends, Will, Johnny [Van Hughes] and Tunny [Scott J. Campbell], who want to get out of suburbia and make something of their lives. So, they all make plans to move to the city," says Epstein. "My character, Will, is a slacker, who is into hard-core punk music.

"Will finds out that his girlfriend, Heather [Leslie McDonel], is pregnant, so he is left behind. He is stuck in suburbia, and spends most of the play on a couch. I don't leave the stage for the whole show. It is probably the strangest part I've ever played in my life."

The musical includes the hit Boulevard of Broken Dreams and the title track American Idiot. In 2010, the show garnered a Grammy Award for Best Musical Show Album.

Ironically, even though Epstein spends a lot of his performance on the couch, he says he finds it to be a demanding show. "It is a really physical show. It's really in your body. We have to do a ton of core and body conditioning before every rehearsal. I am really excited. It's like nothing I have ever done before."

Epstein saw the original production of American Idiot in Berkeley, Calif., in 2009 during a workshop. He caught the multiple Tony Award-winning Broadway production during its March 2010 to April 2011 run at the St. James Theatre in New York.

In addition to touring with American Idiot for nine months, Epstein will be seen next season in an episode of the Murdoch Mysteries on CBC-TV and in an indie film called Blood Pressure.

For tickets to American Idiot, at the Toronto Centre for the Arts Dec. 28 to Jan. 15, visit www.DancapTickets.com or call 416-644-3665 or toll free at 1-866-950-7469.

ED MIRVISH'S NAME GOES UP IN LIGHTS IN THEATRE DISTRICT

"Honest" Ed Mirvish, the late and legendary bargain store owner who became a theatre impresario by accident, has been posthumously honoured by having the major downtown theatre on Yonge Street, formerly the Canon Theatre, named after him.

Ed's son David Mirvish made the announcement at a tribute ceremony last week that was attended by hundreds of people, including Mayor Rob Ford, actors Ted Dykstra and Shirley Douglas, singers Michael Burgess and Louise Pitre, and producer Paul Elliott, who variously performed or shared anecdotes.

After video messages were shown from Prime Minister Stephen Harper and other dignitaries, a glittering marquis announcing the Ed Mirvish Theatre was unveiled on the stage.

Born in Colonial Beach, Va. in 1914, Mirvish's first brush with show business occurred when he was circumcised by Rabbi Moses Yoelson, Al Jolson's father. He stumbled into the theatre business in 1963 when he decided to purchase the Victorian-era Royal Alex, saving it from the wrecker's ball. "I didn't buy it for altruistic reasons," he once explained. "I was not a theatre-goer, I was a storekeeper, and to me it seemed like a bargain."

While he continued to run the famous Honest Ed's bargain emporium at Bloor and Bathurst streets, he imported season after season of quality shows to the Royal Alex as he and his son expanded the Mirvish theatre empire with several other theatres. Now, just four years after his death, his name is up in lights in the city's theatre district that he helped to establish.

Celebrating Chagall: A colourful evening of music, dance, performance, spoken word and more unfolds at the Art Gallery of Ontario this week. "Past Present: Chagall Through Toronto's Artists" features the musical ensemble The Thing Is, dance from Kaeja d'Dance, and music from accordionist Sasha Luminsky.

The evening also features the Canadian debut of an excerpt from Bella, The Colour of Love, a new production about Bella Chagall, the artist's wife, written and performed by Yiddish jazz chanteuse Theresa Tova with Montreal pianist Matt Herskowitz. $22.50, members $20.50, students $17. AGO, Weston Family Learning Centre, 317 Dundas St. W. Wednesday Dec. 14, 8 p.m. www.ago.net

Names in the News: Montreal-born actor, comedian and producer Tevya Heller was raised in a devout Jewish household and had seven years of intense Hebrew schooling, but lost his religious faith as a teenager. In Oh My God!, a new six-part series currently airing on ichannel, Heller explores how various groups of Canadian Hindus, Muslims, Christians, Wiccans and others experience God.

Heller presents an atheist's perspective on faith but does not belong to the militant, religion-bashing school of atheism championed by the likes of Christopher Hitchens and Richard Dawkins. "I'm an atheist who wants God to exist," he said.

"I think belief is a gift and that people of faith are lucky. There's such a loneliness in being an atheist because you're not part of a community. So this show is really about an atheist's search for a God he can believe in."

Produced by Toronto-based Stornoway Productions, the series continues on ichannel, Monday evenings at 8:30 p.m. and again at 11:30 p.m. www.ichannel.ca

Getting 'friended' with a paintbrush

Laura Fixman
Special to The CJN

Adding friends on Facebook has gained a new meaning with Canadian artist Carole Freeman's latest exhibit, Friend Me: Portraits of Facebook.

The exhibit, which runs until Jan. 7 at the Edward Day Gallery in Toronto, features almost 200 portraits of people's Facebook profile pictures, some of them well known in the art world. They include artists Judith Braun, Susan Hobbs, Margaret Dragu and Jim Kempner. Freeman also painted a portrait of actor James Franco and media mogul Arianna Huffington.

The idea for the project came after Freeman had been caring for her sick mother in Winnipeg for several months. She would play Scrabble daily with her family there, and she discovered she could continue playing Scrabble on Facebook when she returned to Toronto. She soon became interested in the images people chose for their profile picture.

"When I started looking closely at friends' profile pictures, I realized there was this infinite number of faces to look at, and then I started 'friending' people because of what their profile pictures looked like," Freeman said.

Freeman, who graduated from the Royal College of Art in London, England, in 1980, is excited about the response she has had from this exhibit. She sent messages to people on Facebook asking for permission to paint them, and then sent them a JPEG of the finished painting. She's received Facebook chat messages from people around the world saying that they love the work, and even that they would like to purchase it.

"Everybody loves it and they feel honoured to be included," Freeman said. "It brings people together."

Studying the profile pictures of others has made Freeman think more about the image she uses for her profile.

"Usually I use Facebook to promote my work, and right now, that's how I choose my profile image," she said. "I think I would continue to keep changing the profile photo to a profile I painted of someone else since I don't like to put in photos of myself."

The exhibit opened on Dec. 1, and Freeman said that since that was World AIDS Day, it was a perfect day to begin the charity work she wanted to achieve with her Friend Me project, whose goal is to inspire and engage the 800 million Facebook members to paint their friends, as a global initiative to promote connection, friendship and our common humanity through art, social media, education and technology.

One of the charitable organizations she partnered with was the Stephen Lewis Foundation Arts Fund, which supports the art of African people living with HIV/AIDS and thus helps bring hope to their lives. Executive director of the fund Ilana Landsberg-Lewis spoke at the exhibition opening.

Jordan Banks, managing director of Facebook Canada also spoke at the opening, about Facebook's commitment to the Friend Me project. He said the project illustrates one of the reasons why Facebook could be inspirational.

"One person has the ability to influence and connect with people all around the world who share like interests," Banks said. "They use Facebook to drive and amplify their voices."

Freeman was a teacher for many years, and will be visiting classrooms to run arts workshops where the kids will get the chance to paint one of their Facebook friends.

Carole Freeman

She painted a lot as a child, and she has always been interested in painting faces. Painting fulfils her need to be creative.

"It's my passion in life and about the only thing I love doing," she said. "People's lives are in their faces, so it could be very beautiful or handsome or a face with a lot of character in it. Whatever strikes me as interesting."

Freeman is always thinking about how the project might expand. She is considering travelling to meet some of the Facebook friends she has never met and painting them in their homes. She also hoped to meet some of her Facebook friends at the exhibit's opening. She added that forming connections with people was another benefit to the project.

"We're making more friends," she said.

The exhibit runs until Jan. 7 at the Edward Day Gallery, 952 Queen St. W., Suite 200. For more information, "Like" Friend Me Projects on Facebook.

Toronto athletes play pro basketball in Israel

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you check Bnei Hasharon Herzliya's active roster, you'll see Toronto native Jared Mintz listed as an Israeli. Likewise, review the list of players on the Maccabi Haifa Heat website, and a little blue-and-white Israeli flag pops up next to Simon Farine's name.

Yet both young men, aged 23 and 24 respectively, were high school basketball stars in Toronto. Mintz played for the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto Tigers, taking them to the provincial quarter finals one year. Farine played for the Northern Secondary Red Knights, where he was named athlete of the year and was a Toronto Star basketball all-star.

So what gives?

It's all about using the rules to your advantage. Teams playing in Israel's Ligat Ha'Al (Super League) are limited to four imports from abroad, so they try to improve their rosters and comply with the rule by recruiting North American Jewish players with an interest in making aliyah. Sign the right documents, make the commitment and presto, instant Israeli.

So far, Mintz loves the experience of playing pro ball in Israel. Although he was a go-to guy in college, playing 30 minutes a game for the Lafayette Leopards in the NCAA's Patriot League, he's getting the freshman treatment with Bnei Hasharon.

"I'm not getting an incredible amount of time [playing]," he said. "But it's OK for a first-year player. It's been pretty incredible over all."

Mintz, a six-foot-nine centre, now sees only about 10:34 of playing time per game.

Simon Farine

Jared Mintz [Oded Karni photos]

So far this season, he's averaged 2.3 points per game and 2.3 rebounds. With Lafayette, he scored 15.8 points per game and snagged 5.8 rebounds.

"It's different than in college," he explained. The biggest adjustment is that "they're paying you to play basketball, so it's a little more pressure than in college. You have to prove yourself all the time."

Mintz signed a one-year contract with an option for a second year.

"When I finished by senior year in basketball at college, I started looking for an agent," he said.

Before he signed with Bnei Hasharon, Mintz's agents talked to three or four teams.

"Bnei Hasharon was the best fit," he said in a telephone interview from Israel. "They have a really good reputation… They were really keen on my coming here."

He moved to Israel in July and immediately suited up for Israel at the University Games in China. The Israelis finished 13th out of 25 teams.

In its first seven games in the Super League season, Bnei Hasharon amassed a 2-5 record and changed coaches. "We lost three games by two points," Mintz said.

Over at the Maccabi Haifa Heat, the six-foot-two Farine is seeing 9:36 in court time. A shooting guard, Farine is averaging 1.6 points per game to go along with 1.2 rebounds and .6 assists.

Prior to signing with Haifa, Farine was a star at Dalhousie University, leading the Tigers to two Atlantic University Sport (AUS) championships. He averaged more than 20 points per game in his last three seasons. A perennial AUS all-star, Farine finished his college career by being named to the All-CIS team for 2010-11.

Along with Mintz, he was a key member of the 2005 Maccabiah Games under-19 team. He led the tournament in scoring, netting 31 points in a losing effort against a very strong American squad.

According to the website Northpole Hoops, "Farine's greatest asset is his versatility. He is a strong guard who plays hard on both sides of the ball and always looks to make plays for his teammates. Farine possesses superb vision, passing ability [and is] an absolute playmaker. And of course, the kid can flat out score."

"We were very impressed with Simon Farine in the U.S. tryouts," said Maccabi Haifa head coach Mickey Gorka. "Simon shined among excellent competition at the U.S. tryouts. "He's a physical guard [and] strong rebounder, with a nice touch from mid-range and will add depth to our roster this season."

Izzy Tchinio, general manager of Bnei Hasharon, said the team plans to bring Mintz along slowly, "Right now he's the sixth man, a power forward and centre," he said. "He still has to learn the league."

The style of play is quite different than U.S. college hoops, he continued. Even good NBA players take time to adjust.

American basketball is generally more athletic and individualistic. European and Israeli basketball is more technical and relies more on teamwork, he said.

Mintz, he continued, "is a very good basketball player, and once he adjusts, he'll be good for us."

"I'm sure it's a good experience to explore different places and cultures, especially for a Jew."

Having learned Hebrew at a Jewish school, Mintz acknowledges he has a leg up on other imports. Although practices are conducted in English, he's served as a translator for the team's American players on other occasions, he said.

Knowing Hebrew makes it easier to get along in Israel, although he finds the pace of life in Israel quite different than he's used to: "Everyone's rushing a little bit more, but nothing too crazy," he said.

So far, "the whole thing has been great. It's a dream come true. Playing basketball professionally is the ultimate for people who love sports. It's been great for me," he said.

Israel tries to lure back expats

Uriel Heilman
JTA

NEW YORK — A few different sparks led to the recent flare-up over a two-month-old Israeli ad campaign to lure home expatriates in the United States.

An ad suggests that a child of Israelis living in America would mistake Chanukah for Christmas. An influential blogger claimed that the Netanyahu government was trying to dissuade Israelis from marrying American Jews. The ads were criticized by the Jewish Federations of North America and the head of the Anti-Defamation League.

It all came to a quick end: Michael Oren, Israel's ambassador to the United States, announced that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had ordered a halt to the campaign that had so offended American Jews.

But the recent flare-up threatens to obscure a larger challenge for Israel: how to lure its citizens living overseas back home.

For many years, Israel viewed its emigrants with some distaste. They were referred to as yordim, a derogatory term that means "those who go down." Israeli embassies and consulates refused to provide solid numbers on how many there were, reflecting the sense that somehow Israelis who had left the fold were an embarrassment for the state.

In recent years, however, that attitude has shifted, and Israel both has made a more conscious effort to draw them back and started to look at its expats as more than just lost citizens.

"We have to rethink the definition of Israelis abroad – it's a different world today," Israel's minister of public diplomacy and Diaspora affairs, Yuli Edelstein, told JTA. "Is someone who goes to the U.S. to get an MA a yored? A PhD? I don't think this diminishes Zionism."

Israel's aggressive effort to bring back expats has included not just ad campaigns overseas but changes at home. Israel helped create and fund new academic research centres to compete with universities abroad for Israeli minds. The Finance Ministry is trying to create incentives that would turn Israel into a technology research centre for the financial services industry as a way of attracting Israeli expats who work in the field but cannot find jobs in Israel.

"We know there are people who would like to return or make aliyah," Haim Shani, the director general of Israel's Finance Ministry, told JTA last year. "It's part of a larger strategy of bringing minds back to Israel."

According to the 2010 U.S. census, more than 140,000 Israelis live in the United States; the Israeli Consulate in New York says the real figure exceeds 500,000. Whatever the number, it's clear that more Israelis are moving to the United States than Americans are moving to Israel. From 2000 to 2010, the number of Israelis in the United States grew by more than 30,000, according to the U.S. census. By comparison, 25,712 Americans moved to Israel in that period, according to figures from the Jewish Agency for Israel, which handles immigration to Israel.

America has long beckoned immigrants from all over the world, Israel included. Israelis' reasons for coming are varied, but experts say it's mostly for economic and professional opportunities. Doctors, lawyers, academics and other professionals make more money in America.

"The solution of returning to the Diaspora and living overseas always captivated us," Israeli engineer Liad Magen wrote recently in an op-ed piece in Ynet. "Especially in my field, as a computer engineer, relocation is not a dirty word. Many of my friends are overseas, in Europe, Australia and the United States. Even friends who served in the army with me and completed a full combat service left for the U.S. and opened successful companies there. All of them are doing well."

The loss of Israeli citizens overseas is deeply troubling for Israel. For one thing, Israel's determination to maintain a Jewish majority in the country means that the emigration of every Jewish citizen is a setback.

For another, a relatively high proportion of Israelis living overseas are professionals or those with advanced degrees. Israel doesn't want to lose their expertise, wealth, spending and tax income.

One of the controversial ads

In recent years, Israel has recognized the value of having Israeli communities abroad. As potential wellsprings of overseas support for the Jewish state, the Israeli government is increasingly helping to cultivate them. But it would rather have them home.

Competing with places like the United States – where there is abundant opportunity and little discrimination against Jews – isn't easy. So when officials at Israel's Ministry of Immigrant Absorption came up with an ad campaign targeting Israelis living here, they tried to zero in on the one thing America cannot offer Israeli expats: Israeliness.

Critics, however, saw the ads as suggesting that America cannot offer something else: Jewishness.

In one ad, the young daughter of Israeli expats is video-chatting with her grandparents in Israel, who have a lighted menorah in the background. When the grandparents ask the girl what holiday it is, she exclaims "Christmas!" The tagline: "They will always be Israeli. Their kids won't."

In another ad, a dozing Israeli expat father is deaf to his son's calls of "Daddy!" until the kid finally says "Abba!" The tagline: "Before 'Abba' turns into 'Daddy,' it's time to come back to Israel."

In a third, the boyfriend of an Israeli expat mistakes her subdued mood and a candlelit room for romantic when she is actually observing Israel's Memorial Day for fallen soldiers.

The Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg, after learning of the ads from a report on the Jewish Channel, wrote a blog post about the ad campaign headlined "Netanyahu government suggests Israelis avoid marrying American Jews." He called the campaign a "demonstration of Israeli contempt for American Jews."

That set off a cascade of reactions. ADL national director Abraham Foxman told Ha'aretz that the ads were "heavy-handed and even demeaning." The Jewish Federations of North America called them "outrageous and insulting."

Within about 48 hours, Netanyahu canceled the campaign, which had included billboards in addition to the 30-second spots on Hebrew-language satellite channels and YouTube. So far, however, only the Christmas ad has been removed from YouTube.

"The Ministry of Immigrant Absorption's campaign clearly did not take into account American Jewish sensibilities, and we regret any offence it caused," Oren said in a statement. "The campaign, which aimed to encourage Israelis living abroad to return home, was a laudable one and it was not meant to cause insult."

The Knesset committee on immigration, absorption and Diaspora affairs was to discuss the campaign yesterday. For its part, the Absorption Ministry noted that the ads generated positive feedback from Israelis living in the United States.

"It was aimed at the Israelis and it worked," said Edelstein, the Diaspora minister. "The criticism got a little carried away. With all the anger, American Jewish leaders missed the point."

The ad campaign was meant to show Israelis that their Israeliness will be diluted by living in the Diaspora – if not for them, then certainly for their children. American Jewish critics, however, saw the ads as a swipe at them, seeing in the Christmas ad in particular a suggestion that American Jews don't know how to be Jewish.

Edelstein said the opposite is true: Israelis don't know as well as American Jews how to live as Jewish in the Diaspora.

"An Israeli, when the Hebrew is taken away, the army service is taken away, the income tax is taken away, the friends are taken away, I'm not sure we know how to distinguish our identity and distinguish between Chanukah and Christmas," he said.

One Israeli expat in New York, Sivan Noy, the program manager of Dor Chadash USA, a network of Israelis living in America and American Jews, said the ads failed to move her.

"I think they are highlighting situations that wouldn't make me feel less of an Israeli," Noy wrote in an e-mail message to JTA. "I do have a little girl, and we are celebrating Christmas with our friends [who celebrate Chanukah with us] and she does call me Mommy sometimes and I fail to see why it makes her less of an Israeli."

Community leader promotes young adult participation

Michelle Bitran
Special to The CJN

When Shauna Waltman reached the end of her undergraduate degree, she felt disconnected from the Jewish community. Instead of walking away for good, Waltman, now 31, decided to go on a Birthright trip to Israel.

Little did she know she would not only meet her future husband, Jeremy, on the trip, but she would also begin the exciting and rewarding path toward becoming a leader in the Jewish community.

"When I was in Israel, I was reminded of how good it feels to be a part of something bigger than yourself," she said. While on the trip, Waltman ran into her former camp counsellor, Michael Soberman, who was the director of Canada Israel Experience at the time.

As soon as she got back to Canada, Waltman contacted Soberman and asked about job opportunities in the Jewish world. She felt an urge to reconnect with the Jewish community, and decided that she wanted to apply her training from the University of Western Ontario's Richard Ivey School of Business to something that she felt strongly about. But she wasn't yet sure what that would be.

"I found myself back at home and really struggling with what I wanted to do now that I was all grown up," said Waltman, but it wasn't long before she found her calling in Jewish community work. With Soberman's guidance, she eventually became the co-ordinator for March of the Living Canada, and later, the director of Toronto's Birthright Israel Alumni Community (BAC). As co-ordinator of March of the Living, Waltman helped to recruit new groups of participants who would take the emotional and educational trip from Poland to Israel. She attracted university students, adults, educators and even politicians to sign up for the unique experience.

It was clear that Waltman had a talent and a passion for community engagement, and when she became director of BAC, she was able to direct her work toward people her own age.

"As a child, as a teenager and as a university student, there are so many great opportunities available to Jews... As a young adult, those opportunities aren't always as obvious," she said, adding that it became her goal to find new ways for Jewish young adults to connect with their community. Waltman planned numerous events and activities to keep former Birthright participants engaged, and through that, she brought Toronto to the forefront of Birthright post-programming as well as Birthright trip leader training. Toronto's BAC is now the second-largest one in North America.

More recently, Waltman became the director of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Community Connect, what she calls "a grassroots organization inside an established organization." She works to engage her peers, Jewish people in their 20s and 30s, in programming, networking and leadership opportunities in the Jewish community.

"We consider ourselves the changemakers, we consider ourselves the innovators, we consider ourselves the people driving the movement for and with our peers," she said of the Community Connect team.

Waltman's dedication and hard work earned her the prestigious Young Professional Award of the Jewish Communal Service Association (JCSA), which she was presented with at the Jewish Federations of North America General Assembly in Denver, Colo., this past November.

"There are so many great young people working in the field, so to be recognized as the top of that is a really amazing honour," said Waltman, adding that working with her inspiring team of Jewish young adults is "the best award" she could ask for.

Waltman explained that working for the up-and-coming generation has helped to reverse some of the community disengagement that many Jewish young adults experience as they leave university. "I relish the opportunity to create a world [for] that [age group], and I think we have," she said.

It was Soberman, now the director of National Initiatives for the Next Generation at the UIA Federations of Canada, who nominated Waltman for the award. "She's somebody, I think, who really wanted to work in the community for all the right reasons," he said. "Quite simply, she's a star." Soberman added that the award is an important step forward in recognizing the impact of young adults in the Jewish community.

Although Waltman, who is completing a master's in Jewish professional studies at Spertus College in Chicago, is as modest about her accomplishments as Soberman is proud of them, she realizes the importance of her work.

Waltman enjoys the view from Massada on a March of the Living trip in 2005

"It's about showing the next generation that it's possible," she said, explaining that, as a new mother, she has discovered the significance not only of building up the Jewish community for the future generation but also of giving them the tools to continue to build it for themselves. Waltman said she hopes her one-year-old daughter, Hannah, will also contribute to creating a relevant and meaningful Jewish community when she grows up.

Although not too long ago, Waltman saw herself drifting away from the Jewish community she grew up in, she said making the choice to reconnect and to forge her own path in the community is one of the best decisions she's made. Referencing the famous Robert Frost poem, The Road Not Taken, Waltman said of her decision, "I chose the road less travelled, and, as they say, that made all the difference."

Intermarried holidays

Dear Ella,

My husband and I were invited to a family dinner at the home of my niece, Marlene. Marlene is married to a non-Jewish man and has two beautiful boys. It was the first time we've been there at this time of year. When we walked in, there stood a towering Christmas tree decorated with blue tinsel and blue ornaments, topped with a lit Star of David.

I know I must have turned white, because Marlene asked if I was OK while she helped me off with my coat. My husband, didn't seem to care, but I was completely offended and disgusted.

After dinner, when we all retired to the living room, I was forced to sit on the couch facing that monstrosity, and I could no longer keep quiet.

I made sure the boys were out of the room, and I asked Marlene how she could so blatantly disrespect the Jewish religion by having such a sacrilegious symbol in her home. Perhaps I went too far when I asked if she thought her grandparents, who were Holocaust survivors, would approve. My sister stood up for her daughter and told me if I was so uncomfortable I was free to leave, so I did. We have not spoken since, and I feel terrible. I don't want to apologize, because that will send the message that I approve. I'm not sure how I should proceed.

Sickening Symbolism

Dear Sickening Symbolism,

It's understandable that you were shocked when you walked in and saw this tree topped with a Star of David. The tree is a symbol of Christmas, which is the holiday commemorating the birth of Jesus, while the Magen David sitting on top signifies Judaism. It's a symbol on the Israeli flag and was used to identify Jews during the Holocaust. Since your parents were Holocaust survivors, I can see how this might offend you. However, the fact is, you are part of western culture, and many people don't have that same strong connection to the Magen David as you do.

The Jewish Federations of North America did a survey that showed the percentage of intermarriage in 2001 was 47 per cent. That's a huge number, and my guess is it's gone up since then. You may not like it, as I'm sure many parents don't, but in the end, they must accept it or lose their children.

Ask Ella

By Ella Burakowski

Try to look on the positive side. Marlene and her husband are doing their best to keep Judaism in there home. They are showing their children that they are the product of two religions. Raising children this way may not be optimum from a religious point of view, but it does teach tolerance and acceptance. I'm sure when it's time to light candles, they will have a chanukiyah too.

Intermarried families are here to stay, and the sooner the community accepts them, instead of shunning them, the better chance of teaching them about Judaism and not losing them completely.

Apologizing is the right thing to do. You can't impose your way of living on others, but you can take over latkes, dreidels and Chanukah gifts and tell the story of Chanukah. Kids will accept learning a lot better if it comes from the heart.

Important to prepare for winter

As autumn progresses and leaves fall from the trees, the media remind us to have winter tires put on our cars and make sure our furnace has been tuned for winter.

It's also a good time to remind seniors that they need to personally prepare for winter. Unless you routinely leave the cold of Canada every year for a trek south to warmer climates, it's imperative that certain steps be taken to avoid serious consequences that cold and inclement weather can promote.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

Depending on your living situation, there may be a need to do things around the house to prepare for winter. If you live in an apartment where general maintenance is provided all winter, there's usually little to worry about in terms of ensuring that the heating system is in good working order.

Many older people, however, experience excessive dryness from central heating, and many older buildings don't have a central humidifying system. For seniors who have problems with excessive dryness, which can affect the skin and respiratory system, using a room or apartment humidifier might be worthwhile. Newer models are easier to use, but it's important to keep them clean so that the water does not become a source of problems. Most hardware stores have fluids that are added to the humidifier to keep it clean, but you must follow model directions for maintenance. The amount of humidity in the room can be adjusted in most models.

If you live in your own house, make sure the furnace is in good working order with a clean filter for the winter and a working and clean humidifying system. It's also very important to arrange for snow clearance of steps and walkways, and that there is ice-melting material available if this is a problem in the place where you live.

It's useful if you can arrange for someone to make sure this is all taken care of – sometimes family members do it – but it may be necessary to hire someone who will provide maintenance on a regular and reliable basis.

Proper personal wear is also very important, especially good boots that are not just warm but have treads that can deal adequately with snow and ice. A bad fall can be devastating for an older person.

In term of personal health, you should make sure you have the necessary immunizations. Every winter you should have an influenza vaccination, which can be very important in preventing serious and potentially life-threatening influenza infection.

If there is any issue about making sure prescriptions are filled on time, make an arrangement that ensures that you do not run out of critical medications when there is inclement weather that prevents your getting to the pharmacist. Explore whether there is a prescription delivery system available or someone who can reliably pick up your medications, even if there is very bad weather.

One instruction I provide to my patients is that if you have a doctor's appointment and the weather is bad, unless there is someone who can reliably and safely get you to that appointment, cancel it, as the risk may be too serious. To be fair to the physician and other patients, always try and give enough notice to the office so that the time can be used for someone else.

Winter is part of Canada. In order for you to cope well, these kinds of preparations are necessary so that you can welcome the following spring in good health.

Israeli goes on sufganiyah binge for charity

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

Most people pick up a coffee on their way to work in the morning. But when Elie Klein, a non-profit public relations professional, hops off the bus in Jerusalem, he heads straight to the nearest bakery to buy a sufganiyah. Or three.

It's the Hebrew month of Kislev, and that means Klein is back on his "Dough for Donuts" campaign diet. This American immigrant binges on sufganiyot to raise money for charities around the world.

"I am blessed with a fast metabolism," Klein assures The CJN, saying he's not after a coronary.

He hopes to wolf down 100 sufganiyot and raise $12,500 (Cdn).

"I'm not asking anyone to give to a specific cause, but rather just to give. Everyone has a cause or charity that they believe in," he says.

Klein's high-calorie munch-a-thon started out two years ago as a gentleman's bet between friends as to who could eat the most sufganiyot between the first day of Kislev and the end of Chanukah. The group updated their Facebook and Twitter accounts to keep score.

"I joked with my wife that I was eating so many sufganiyot that someone should sponsor me," he says.

In 2010, the bet was on again, but this time, a neighbour set up a Facebook page (http://tinyurl.com/dough4donuts) with the title "Dough for Donuts" and people started sponsoring Klein for his new round of gorging.

After 31 days, the Beit Shemesh resident had consumed a whopping 70 sufganiyot and raised $8,900 for 44 charities.

Elie Klein gets ready to start his Dough for Dougnuts campaign.

Though the name of his campaign refers to sufganiyot as "doughnuts," Klein stresses that they are not one and the same.

"They're totally different," he says. "I can eat a million doughnuts in one sitting. They're made to go down easy. They're light and fluffy. Sufganiyot have no holes, they're much heavier. If I were to say I'm going to eat 100 doughnuts I'm sure many other people could do it, so it's not much of a challenge."

Sufganiyot are only for sale in Israel during the weeks leading up to Chanukah and until the end of the holiday. This oil-fried indulgence is packed with 350 to 750 calories, depending on the filling.

The traditional sufganiyah comes with strawberry jam. But patisseries and bakeries are known for their originality during the holiday, and this yummy dough ball is also available with fillings of halva, dulche de leche (Klein's favourite), chocolate, vodka-melon, Irish cream, pistachio cream, marshmallow and so on.

The average Israeli eats five sufganiyot each year. "My goal is to eat three sufganiyot every day until Chanukah and then four every day on Chanukah," Klein says. "Part of my donation is buying the sufganiyot upon which the campaign is based."

'Choose the cause that makes sense to you'

At least once a day he's asked if he's trying to do an Israeli version of the American documentary Super Size Me. After all, the health aspect is something to think about.

"I'm trying to make it my first half of the day," says the 31-year-old, who eats his sufganiyot at work. "I'm trying to walk more and trying to balance out my eating with salad and protein."

And what does his family think about this philanthropic noshing?

"Last year, my wife was in favour of the idea. She bought the sufganiyot. She really wanted things to happen," he reports. "She is still my biggest supporter."

Klein says his mission is all about the charities involved.

"Part of what I noticed when I was formulating the idea was that everyone knows someone who is running in marathons or cycling or walking to raise money for causes they believe in. The other initiatives are great, but they tend to meld together after a while and the cause doesn't always speak to the sponsor," he explains.

"My initiative draws attention, and you can choose the cause that makes sense to you. Some choose Israel-based charities, people choose North American causes, and some people trying to be funny choose to sponsor the Israeli Diabetes Association or Overeaters Anonymous," he says. "What's important is to just give."

At press time, Klein had 75 sponsors for 50 causes including the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation, Chai Lifeline Canada, Organization for the Resolution of Agunot, synagogues around the world and summer camps, among others. Pledges vary from 10 cents to $3 per sufganiyah.

"It's an international campaign," he says. "This is not only a Jewish or Israeli campaign. It's a fundraising initiative for wherever the person is and whatever he or she feels connected to."

Klein says people can start giving at any time during the project. As a public relations whiz, he says he "knew the big number of 100 would draw people."

Then he adds, "Now I have an altruistic reason to eat sufganiyot."

Chanukah in Israel: Sufganiyot on the streets

Marcy Oster
ITA

They're making sufganiyot on the streets of Israel – Chanukah must be near.

Actually, it started feeling like Chanukah here in Israel about two days after Sukkot, when the first vendors started frying the delicious and caloric doughnuts in vats of oil in front of bakeries and on the street in towns throughout the country.

As malls in America rush the Christmas season by putting up decorations right after Halloween, some vendors in the heart of Jerusalem were making sufganiyot in the middle of Sukkot.

I spend the weeks until Chanukah checking out the sufganiyot offerings – jelly, chocolate, custard, you name it. At a rumored 1,000 calories each, I can only allow myself one or two throughout the whole season, so they had better be good.

One of the highlights of my family's Chanukah is our annual venture to a fancy coffee shop for sufganiyot and hot cocoa (for the kids, coffee for me). Last year's offerings included sufganiyot filled with flavours such as champagne, taffy and pistachio.

But Chanukah in Israel is not all about sufganiyot. With the kids out of school for a week, family fun rules. Workplaces mostly stay open, but stay-at-home moms and parents who manage to get some end-of-the-year time off do not want for kid-friendly activities during Chanukah.

Cities throughout Israel offer many cultural extravaganzas during the holiday. There are musicals and plays for children, often starring some of the best-known old and new Israeli television and music personalities. Malls feature children's programming like arts and crafts stations, or they set up stages with visits from jugglers, singers, and often characters from beloved Israeli children's shows such as Yuval Mibubal (Yuval the Confused) or Kofiko (a monkey with very human traits).

One of our favorite happenings in recent years featured candle dipping. Others included demonstrations of making olive oil and pita (and eating them).

There are also plenty of Chanukah parties to attend in the evenings, either public or private. As in North America, synagogues, schools and other institutions host parties, and kindergartens put on pre-Chanukah extravaganzas with song-and-dance presentations for parents. Families get together to light candles and fry latkes in celebration of the miracle of the oil.

Our extended family gets together every year for Chanukah, though co-ordinating the event becomes more difficult each year as more of the nieces and nephews marry, move away from the community and have children of their own.

Buying sufganiyot

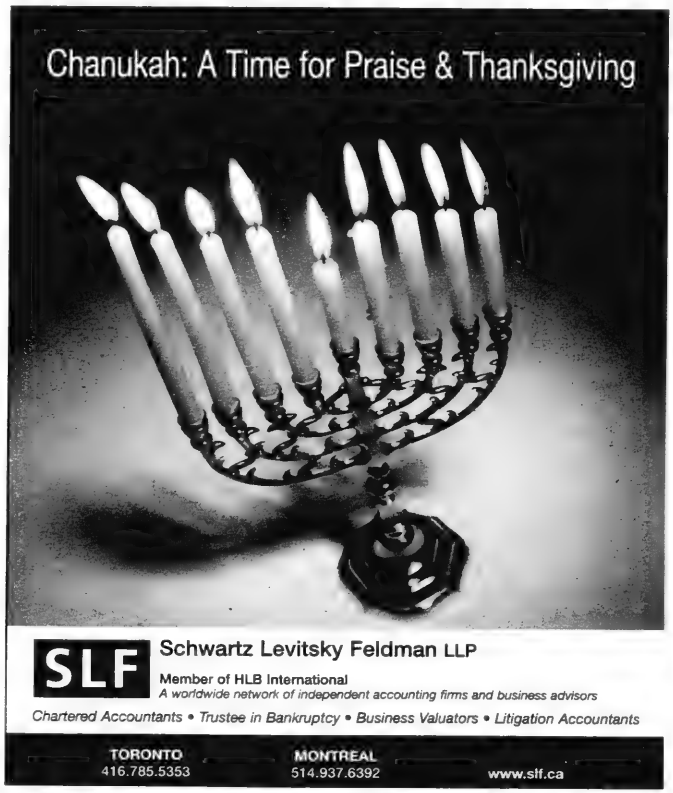
One of the highlights of our party is the family sing-along, which begins with songs for Chanukah, moves on to well-loved national Israeli songs and finally moves into a different realm – Simon and Garfunkel and show tunes.

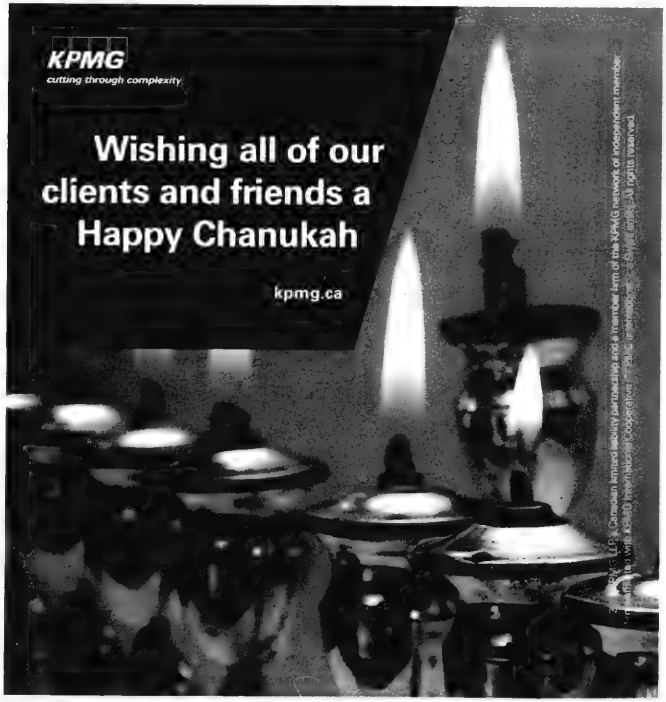
There are plenty of public chanukiyah lightings – in the Knesset, on army bases, at the Western Wall. The president and the prime minister travel to significant spots throughout the country, and sometimes the world, to kindle the Chanukah lights.

Also as in communities around the world, Chabad is a palpable presence in Israel during Chanukah, with its chanukiyot sprouting in town squares, public parks and on the backs of cars. In our own community, the local Chabad lights a tall chanukiyah in the middle of our open-air mall, inviting children to come each night to sing the blessings and enjoy sufganiyot.

Perhaps the best part about being in Israel during Chanukah is walking down the streets of many cities and seeing Chanukah lights burning, often in special glass containers, outside, next to the front door. With the mezuzah on one side and the Chanukah lights on the other, the home is surrounded by mitzvot, according to tradition. And since everyone lights their own chanukiyot, it is not uncommon to see a home with dozens of lights burning in the window.

It truly makes Chanukah feel like a national celebration.





Judaism's beauty being overshadowed

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

By Rabbi Gideon Sylvester

One of Israel's most celebrated writers, Yoram Kaniuk, has resigned from the Jewish religion. He won his case in court to have the word "Jewish" removed from his identity at the Population Registry, and from now on, he will be listed as "without religion."

He is not alone. Apparently, hundreds of Israelis are lining up to follow his example.

Kaniuk has his own personal reasons for abandoning our faith, and many commentators have criticized and lampooned him for it. Rabbis have not taken him seriously either, because Jewish law makes it clear that however much Jews try to escape their origins, they remain Jewish (Sanhedrin 44a).

But even if the act has no halachic significance, it should still concern all who care about Judaism in Israel. Never before has it been easier to be a Jew, so why the wave of defections? As an Orthodox rabbi, I am troubled by their actions, but I understand the frustration that drives them.

Many Jewish traditions including the Passover seder, the lighting of Chanukah candles and our lifecycle events are popular, beautiful and inspiring to religious and secular Jews alike.

Unfortunately, this beauty has been overshadowed by the religious leadership's coercive tactics. Our religion demands precision, but when the legalistic minutiae of ritual become the raison d'être of Judaism, drowning out the beautiful ethical messages of our tradition, people feel cheated out of the outstanding beauty of their heritage.

Even the driest portrayal of Judaism would still be tolerable to most Israelis were it not for offensive attempts to force them to follow a religious lifestyle. Religious coercion is the enemy of true religion. Forcing people to believe or to practise Judaism breeds resentment and hatred. Genuine spirituality can only come when it is intelligently presented and accompanied by the warmth and lovingkindness that have always been associated with Jewish life.

Many years ago, when zealots in Petach Tikva tried to prevent Sabbath desecration by calling for the closure of cinemas on Shabbat, my teacher, Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, rejected their coercive techniques. "Let every cinema remain open," he told us, "but let them be empty, because every Jew has been invited to a traditional Shabbat meal with their friends, neighbours and family."

When I challenged him on the need to protest religious transgression, his answer was straightforward and wise: "No one appointed you God's policeman!" he said.

Acting as God's policeman is a recipe for disaster, but recently, elements of the "religious" community have exchanged their role as God's police officers for the role of His criminals. In the great cause of modesty, we have seen attacks on young schoolgirls in Beit Shemesh, and the love of the Land of Israel has been expressed through racist declarations and "price tag attacks" on olive groves, mosques and Israeli army bases.

In religious terms, these individuals are committing one of the worst possible crimes, a chillul HaShem – a desecration of God's name. The villains represent only a tiny minority of observant Jews, most of whom are good, law-biding citizens, but their actions tarnish all of us. Seeing their behaviour, we can understand why many of the most idealistic people feel alienated from their religion.

Fortunately, there are people working to counter these phenomena. One of the most beautiful recent initiatives, through which religious services are held in community centres across Israel, was launched by Rabbi Michael Melchior and has been developed by Rabbi Shlomo Riskin's Ohr Torah Stone institutions.

These services are run by rabbis and educators who are chosen for their acceptance of every Jew, their non-judgmental style and their determination to create unity amongst our people rather than harbouring divisions. Their services, ceremonies, lectures and workshops are attended by thousands of Jews who would never set foot in a synagogue, but are very happy to taste traditional Judaism in a community centre without the poison of racism, elitism and coercion.

Israelis seek alternative wedding ceremonies

Linda Gradstein
JTA

Anna Melman and Ari Bronstein are in the midst of planning their wedding, which will be held in January in Israel. They have a venue and a rabbi. But they want to find ways of making the traditional ceremony more egalitarian.

"In the wedding ceremony as it is now, the bride is inherently passive," Melman told JTA. "We wanted to do something where it would be more egalitarian within the confines of a nonegalitarian ritual. I wanted to have more of a voice."

They plan to modify the ceremony while staying within the confines of Halachah, or Jewish law – something essential in a country where all Jewish weddings must be sanctioned by the Orthodox-controlled rabbinate.

Melman and Bronstein are planning a joint "tisch" – the traditional bridegroom's table, where the bridegroom signs the marriage contract and offers words of Torah. In their case, both the bride and groom will speak. The couple also will sign a "partnership agreement" in addition to the regular ketubah, or marriage contract.

A traditional wedding in Israel

"I wanted to be more involved than just sitting in a chair and looking pretty," Melman said.

Increasingly, Israeli couples are seeking to create weddings that are more reflective of their own lifestyles. But because Israel has no civil marriage and the rabbinate retains exclusive control over marriage and divorce, this puts many couples in Israel on a collision course with the rabbinate.

"The area of marriage is one of the most bitter areas of tension between secular Israelis and the religious establishment," said Nachman Rosenberg, the executive vice-president of Tzohar, a Zionist rabbinic organization devoted to bridging gaps between secular and Orthodox Israelis.

In Israel, weddings must be performed by an Orthodox rabbi on the rabbinate's list. Most of these rabbis are haredi, as are most of the 182 government-appointed regional rabbis in Israeli towns and cities who issue marriage licenses to couples who live in their cities.

Some Israeli couples are put off by the bureaucracy of the rabbinate, others by mandatory "bride's classes" in which critics say that brides often are told that if they don't observe the laws of family purity and go to the mikvah regularly, they or their children will be plagued by disease.

Secular Israelis have long bypassed the rabbinate entirely by obtaining marriage licences overseas, which in turn are recognized by Israel. In 2008, for example, 5,028 Israeli couples married in nearby Cyprus, according to Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics, while 37,188 Jewish couples married in Israel through the rabbinate. Many of those who married in Cyprus held their own non-official weddings in Israel without the rituals required by the rabbinate.

But a growing number of Israeli couples want alternatives in Israel that are recognized by law yet bypass the rabbinate's rabbis. Organizations such as Tzohar have been offering such alternatives to rabbinate-officiated weddings, allowing couples to add personal touches to their wedding ceremonies while staying within the confines of Jewish law.

Tzohar rabbis do not charge for their services. The rabbis from the rabbinate are not supposed to charge, either, but many suggest a "tip" that is usually about $250, several officials in both the rabbinate and Tzohar confirmed. Tzohar now handles some 3,000 couples annually.

Only the first step

"We try to make the wedding an uplifting and positive experience," Rosenberg said.

Several weeks ago, tensions between the rabbinate and Tzohar erupted when Israel's Ministry of Religious Affairs announced that Tzohar rabbis would no longer be allowed to perform weddings. In a bit of a legal fiction, Tzohar was marrying couples throughout the country but registering them in towns whose official rabbis are sympathetic to Tzohar. The ministry said weddings must be registered in the town where they are performed.

"It is very important that the rabbi doing the wedding know the couple and know 100 per cent that they are Jewish," Rabbi Rasson Amrusi, the chief rabbi of the Israeli city of Kiryat Ono and the chairman of the rabbinate's marriage committee, told JTA. "That is why we want the registration to be where the couple lives."

But Tzohar and its supporters saw the bid as a power play by the haredi-dominated rabbinate to disenfranchise the more liberal Orthodox rabbis employed by Tzohar. Following a public outcry, the Religious Affairs Ministry backed down.

Irit Koren, author of a book about Orthodox Jewish marriage called You Are Hereby Consecrated to Me, says that many of those seeking alternatives are observant Jewish women looking for new rituals to make the marriage ceremony more egalitarian.

"As opposed to most secular women, who are concerned mainly with their dress and makeup, these women are very knowledgeable about Judaism and they put a lot of thought into what the ritual means," Koren said. "They deal with the tension between Halachah and ideology."

For example, Koren cites the ritual of the bedecken, when the groom traditionally comes and veils the bride, who then remains veiled for the entire wedding ceremony.

"For some women, it was very romantic and they saw it as something that gives them some privacy," Koren said. "But for some it felt like a burka. They felt that at the most important moment of their life, they wanted to be uncovered and stand with their whole essence, like their husband."

Rabbi Amrusi says those sorts of changes are fine.

"We have many weddings where the bride shows her face," he said. "But there are some things that we can't allow, like when the bride gives the groom a ring. That's one of the things that Reform Jews do."

Rabbi Amrusi says the rabbinate's rabbis try to be sensitive to the desires of the couple but they cannot violate Jewish law. He says exchanging rings during the traditional ceremony is forbidden because only the man's ring can signify the kinyan, or acquisition, of a wife by her husband.

"The groom gives the ring, but he also takes on the obligation of taking care of the bride," Amrusi said. "If she gave a ring, it would mean she is taking on the obligation to take care of the groom. Giving a ring is not a great honour, it's a responsibility."

Nevertheless, many couples want to find a way to exchange a token of their affection.

"One thing I suggest is to have the bride and groom give each other a tallit under the chupah," said Rabbi Haviva Ner-David, founder of Reut, the Center for Modern Jewish Marriage.

Since the chupah symbolizes the groom's home, Rabbi Ner-David also suggests that instead of the groom waiting under the chupah for the bride to be led to him, he should wait just below the chupah and they can enter together. Together they can also break the glass, which symbolizes the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem. Women also may read English translations of the Seven Blessings or add an eighth blessing. Many women also make their own chupah.

Koren says that efforts to change the wedding ceremony are only the first step in making Orthodox Jewish ritual more egalitarian.

"The change in the previous generation was that women began seriously learning Torah for the first time," she said. "Reform in marriage will happen eventually, but I can't tell you how long it will take."

Compassionate Judaism

We are taught that the Torah's "ways are pleasant and that all of its paths are peaceful" (Proverbs 3: 17). This is not just a beautiful slogan, it has powerful halachic ramifications. Judaism must be taught with gentleness, warmth and sensitivity.

Only when our rabbis start leading the charge for a compassionate Judaism that champions the rights of the widow, the poor and the stranger, when they give full support to agunot and converts and all the other vulnerable people in our society, will we reverse the lines at the Ministry of Interior, restoring the Jewish People's pride in their faith.

Return Torah to its place of glory

Rabbi Elie Kaunfer
JTA

I want to challenge one of the mainstay assumptions of organized Jewish life: Jewish continuity is the end goal, and everything is in service of that goal.

It's been 20 years since the release of the 1990 National Jewish Population Study, which found an unprecedented rate of intermarriage. It launched 1,000 ships of Jewish identity efforts in the service of ensuring Jewish continuity. Indeed, in our current language, everything is in service of Jewish identity. Birthright strengthens Jewish identity. Day schools strengthen Jewish identity. Summer camps strengthen Jewish identity.

Our theory: strengthen Jewish identity and Judaism will continue.

But here's the problem with that theory: in our zeal to ensure the Jewish future, we forgot to articulate why it matters for Judaism to continue.

Abraham Joshua Heschel already recognized this in 1965, when he addressed the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds in Montreal. He said, "The significance of Judaism does not lie in its being conducive to the mere survival of a particular people, but rather in its being a source of spiritual wealth, a source of meaning relevant to all peoples." (from Moral Grandeur and Spiritual Audacity)

Rabbi Kaunfer speaks at the opening plenary of the Jewish Federations of North America's General Assembly.

Jews were not placed on this earth to survive. Jews were placed on this earth to embody and to model the quest for spiritual wealth and meaning.

Jews, like all people, are searching for meaning, substance and connection. The more we are inundated with e-mails, status updates and tweets, the more we want to go deeper. Our souls are calling out for engagement; our hearts are crying out to be opened.

Judaism, at its core, is a response to that yearning, an answer to that call. What are we continuing with our calls for "continuity"? Why does Judaism need a future? Because Judaism offers a system, a covenantal language, a heritage and tradition that respond to the human need for meaning, substance and connection. It is our system, our language, our heritage; it is relevant, and that is the reason that we need a Jewish future.

We Jews have a word for the pathway to meaning, substance and connection. It is called Torah. I don't just mean the Torah scroll that sits alone in the Ark, or even just the words of the five books of Moses. I mean the sum total of Jewish sources and texts – the wisdom stored up in our textual heritage.

So often we sideline Torah in the culture of the organized Jewish community. It takes the form of a pithy quote at the top of a website; an icon on our iPad; a glazed dvar Torah at the beginning of a board meeting. It's what we pay lip service to before we really get down to business. But real Torah is so much deeper.

Torah has the power to draw us into the conversation, and to push us to think more deeply about ourselves and our struggles.

'The power to push us to ask bold questions'

Torah gives us a language for clarifying our own life's mission, and an entryway to express our deepest values.

My dad and I study Torah every week over the phone, and have done so for the past 15 years.

"When I discuss a text with my son," he said, "I always ask questions to which I do not know the answer. What comes out of these dialogues is a set of novel and exciting ideas which never occurred to me. But my son and I do more than connect with the texts and their moral gems; we also connect with each other."

'We have to abandon the old paradigm of Jewish continuity as an end in itself'

Torah has the power to push us to ask bold questions and to transform our relationships.

So who is Torah for? Is the search for meaning and content reserved for a few motivated Jews? Is it stuck up in the heavens where no one can reach it? Or across the sea where no one can find it? (Deut. 20:12-13)

There is a radical teaching in Jewish tradition in Midrash Tehilim 65:6 about the moment of revelation at Mount Sinai that addresses that question:

"When God spoke the word [on Sinai], God's voice split into seven voices. Those seven voices split into the 70 languages of the world so that everyone could understand."

What's incredible about this midrash? It means that Torah has something to say to everyone. Not just kids. Not just day school graduates. Not just synagogue goers. Not just rabbis. Not even just Jews!

We often assume that Torah is for the elite or only reserved for those with a strong Jewish education. But Torah never understood itself that way. This midrash recognizes that it is a basic human need to yearn for meaning and substance, and that yearning doesn't exclude anyone. Our real birthright, our real morasha, is Torah.

Rabbi Elie Kaunfer

Our task is twofold. First, we have to abandon the old paradigm of Jewish continuity as an end in itself. Instead, continuity must be in the service of Torah; survival must be in service of the deep search for meaning and substance. When we are able to articulate why Judaism matters, why it is critical for us to have a future, then continuity will be the obvious result. In the 21st century, Jews are not inspired to survive just to survive. But we can be inspired to engage in the deepest questions of meaning and existence and do that through the wisdom of our heritage.

Second, we have to make Torah accessible to all. We have to stop imagining Torah as only for the clergy and the elite. We have to stop telling ourselves, "I do social justice, other people do Torah." We would never limit the quest for pursuit of social justice, or charity, or service, to a few elite. Why do that with Torah? We suffer and Torah suffers when we short-sell its relevance.

We often have trouble articulating why Judaism matters, and we start casting about for the "next big idea." Torah always has been the big idea. Let's bring it back to its place of glory, and in so doing, remind ourselves why we care so much about our Jewish future.

Rabbi Elie Kaunfer is the executive director of Mechon Hadar, an egalitarian yeshiva and independent minyan organization. He adapted this op-ed from a speech he delivered Nov. 6 to the Jewish Federations of North America's General Assembly.

How many Jews are we?

Dan Klein
JTA

Could the seven billionth person on the planet be Jewish?

According to the United Nations Population Fund, the Earth welcomed its seven billionth resident on Oct. 31. Statistically, the newborn was most likely a boy in India or China. The symbolic title was given to Danica May Camacho, born two minutes before midnight in Manila in the Philippines.

There is no reason, however, it couldn't have been Ava Sarah Keyrallah, who was born later that evening in Paris.

"Every single second, four to five new babies are born in the world," Sergio DellaPergola, a professor of population studies at Hebrew University, told JTA by e-mail. "It is difficult to say exactly which baby was the seven billionth inhabitant of Earth. But why not dream that it might have been a Jew?"

Sergio DellaPergola

Daughter of a French Jewish mother and a Lebanese Christian father, seven-pound Ava Sarah joined a world in which one in 510 people is Jewish, but where the Jewish world as a whole, according to demographers, grows gradually and unevenly.

That Jewish world is increasingly defined by a small number of population centres, according to a study by DellaPergola titled World Jewish Population, 2010. Approximately 80 per cent of Jews live in Israel and the United States, and the nine countries with more than 100,000 Jews constitute 91.1 per cent of the total worldwide Jewish population. Further, Jews remain exceptionally urbanized, with half living in just five cities and two-thirds living in 11 cities.

Ira Sheskin

"Jewish population stands at somewhat above 13.5 million and very slowly grows – only thanks to Israel's component, now approaching 43 per cent of the total world Jewry," DellaPergola said.

Israel, the world's most fertile developed nation, is the engine of Jewish population growth. Like the rest of the world, Israel saw a massive decline in fertility rates during the 1970s and 1980s due to increases in public health and education for women. Unlike the rest of the world, however, Israel stabilized in the early '90s and since then has maintained a fertility rate of 2.9 children per woman.

"Israel has an unprecedented birth rate," said Leonard Saxe, a professor of contemporary Jewish studies at Brandeis University whose current research involves demographic studies of American Jewry. "Women, even highly educated women, have high birth rates."

By 1995, according to the World Bank, Israeli women for the first time began having more children than the rest of the world. And last year, Israel surpassed Saudi Arabia to become the most fertile developed nation in the world.

At the beginning of 2010, Israel had a Jewish population of 5.7 million.

Counting Jews outside of Israel is no simple task. Where Israel has a government census, Jewish communities in the Diaspora must rely on less rigorous and consistent methods, which leads to disagreements over numbers.

Just two weeks ago, an otherwise productive conference at Brandeis University temporarily turned to finger pointing during a debate over the decision of the Jewish Federations of North America not to fund a census of the Jewish community.

In general, demographers agree that the Diaspora population is in decline because of low fertility rates. Other factors changing the Jewish population include migration, "opting out" of Jewish life, intermarriage and choosing not to raise children as Jews.

According to both DellaPergola and demographer Ira Sheskin of the University of Miami, the apparent exception is the United States, where the American Jewish population has been stable.

"In the long term it should be decreasing, yet it's relatively constant," Sheskin said, noting fertility rates that are below replacement levels but citing immigration from the former Soviet Union as one possible reason for the population's stability.

The two disagree, however, on the overall number of American Jews. DellaPergola says it's 5.2 million, which is the number found in the 2000-2001 National Jewish Population Survey. Sheskin's study found 6.5 million, but he doubts his own numbers, estimating a total of 6.2 million.

Saxe, on the other hand, has confidence in the 6.5 million figure, which he arrived at in an independent study. But unlike Sheskin, Saxe says the population trend is increasing due to intense outreach and improved Jewish education.

"We believe that what is happening is that families and households that include Jews are more and more making the decision to raise their kids Jewishly and Jews are more likely to acknowledge their Jewish heritage and Jewish identity," he said.

Happy Chanukah!

World has anxiety disorder regarding Israel

David Matlow

I confess I love Israel. I am amazed by the miracle of its creation, I marvel at its ability to survive and thrive against all odds, and I'm proud of its accomplishments and contributions to the world. I have been there more than 25 times and travel there with my wife and three daughters annually. It's not perfect. No country, even one as great as Canada, is perfect. I have long wondered why there is such vitriolic hatred of Israel, which seems out of proportion to its imperfections and ignores the 95 per cent (or more) of Israel that is good, and just, and true. I may have found the answer to that question in my own home.

My wife, Leanne, is a cognitive behavioural therapist who specializes in anxiety disorders. Her book, Thinking About Thoughts, helps children who suffer from anxiety. From hearing Leanne describe the symptoms of her clients, my question about Israel has been answered. When it comes to Israel, the world has an anxiety disorder.

When you consider the symptoms of an anxiety disorder you will see what I mean.

Prof. Daniel Shechtman

Overgeneralization is seeing a single negative event as representing an overall pattern. Certain things that Israel does that are unpopular (for instance, construction of settlements and the security barrier) are viewed as the totality of Israel's relationship with its minority populations, ignoring other positive elements such as the ability for all Israelis to vote resulting in Arab representatives being elected to Israel's Knesset, access to health care for all and increased opportunities for education. The reasons for Israel's actions are ignored (including protecting itself from terrorist attacks) and only the response is considered, with the character of the country generalized from that.

Mental filtering is picking out a single negative detail and dwelling on it exclusively so that the entire picture becomes darkened. Israel's research and development projects have created innovations that have helped the world (including cancer-curing drugs such as Gleevec and much of the technology that supports the Internet). Israel is one of the world's first responders to major disasters, such as the earthquake in Haiti and the tsunami in Japan. These positive contributions are ignored by the fixation on a limited number of negative details.

Disqualifying the positive is rejecting positive experiences, insisting that, for some reason, they do not count. With the recent award of the Nobel Prize in chemistry to Daniel Schechtman, Israel has its 10th Nobel laureate. Israel's positive contributions to humanity are disqualified, with Israel being seen only through the negative mental filter.

Jumping to conclusions is about making a negative interpretation even though there are no definitive facts that support the conclusion. This is an often repeated pattern whether in the battle of Jenin, the Second Lebanon War, Operation Cast Lead in Gaza or the flotilla incident. the world's immediate reaction is that Israel is wrong, regardless of the facts then known or that later emerge.

Magnification or minimization is exaggerating the importance of certain things or inappropriately shrinking things until they appear irrelevant. For instance, the thousands of missiles launched by Hamas from Gaza or by Hezbollah from South Lebanon are viewed as insignificant. The threat by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to wipe Israel off the map is viewed as bluster. Hamas' stated objective to destroy Israel is described as just words. Their importance is minimized by the world. On the other hand, building a few apartment buildings in a residential community that's home to tens of thousands is maximized as a threat to the peace in the area.

All-or-none thinking sees things in terms of black-and-white categories. Israel is seen as being all bad. There are regularly more United Nations resolutions critical of Israel than are critical of all other countries in the world combined. Israel cannot possibly be a worse country than, for example, Syria, Sudan, North Korea, Iran and China put together.

Emotional reasoning assumes that negative emotions necessarily reflect the way things really are. People may have all kinds of reasons not to like Israel, but many confuse their own feelings with what is really happening. Just because you don't like something about Israel doesn't mean it doesn't have a right to exist, and that everything it does is wrong. I may not like the New York Yankees, but I can still appreciate their history and acknowledge they are a good team, and I would never suggest they don't have the right to play Major League Baseball.

I acknowledge that Israel is not perfect, and that the Palestinians have their own narrative and history that must be understood and respected. There is a real dispute that the parties themselves must work out. Neither side is totally right, but neither side can be totally wrong either.

The resolution of the Middle East conflict is not helped by the world's cognitive distortions that result in Israel feeling that it is unfairly condemned, isolated and demonized all the time. If the world had a series of international therapy sessions to help it deal with its global anxiety disorder, the prospect for peace in the Middle East will be improved significantly. That may be a delusional thought, but it's not an anxious one.

Chai Tech: Top 10 Jewish apps

Sala Levin
Moment Magazine

Version Jew.0

Is your Yiddish rusty? Want to whip up a kosher culinary masterpiece? Trying to remember which prayer to say as you cast off your sins on Rosh Hashanah? Don't worry – there's an app for it!

Oy!

Ever wonder when it's OK to toss out an "oy"? The opportunities, it seems, are endless. The Oy! app for iPhones and iPads provides five recorded variations on the go-to favourite for moments when no other expression of dismay will work. Does the situation call for a full-blown "oy gevalt"? Done. Need a classic "oy vey"? No problem. The app even covers that perennial favorite, "oy yoy yoy."

Gematria Calculator

Gematria, part of kabbalistic thought, assigns a numerical value to each of the Hebrew alphabet's 22 letters, used to decode deeper meanings in Hebrew words and phrases. For those unable to perform such complex calculations in their heads, the Gematria Calculator determines the numerical values of phrases in Jewish texts, making the trajectory to spiritual reward a little less mathematically onerous.

Jewish Mother

The makers of Jewish Mother have remedied the logistical difficulties of constant maternal accompaniment: in lieu of an actual mother, a virtual version programmed with more than 100 phrases follows users. "Happy Chanukah, bubbeleh," she might say. "Of course, I'd be happier if you had kids." The digi-mom even spouts phrases based on gender and marital status.

Jewish Temple Jigsaw

Re-jigger this app's puzzle pieces to form the Holy Temple, known in Hebrew as the Beit Hamikdash. Those who solve the puzzle are rewarded — the screen flashes: "You built a Beis Hamikdash!" Not even King David could say that.

iTashlich

Tashlich, the Rosh Hashanah ceremony in which pieces of bread symbolizing sins are cast into a body of running water, has gone high-tech. This handy app explains the ritual and provides audio of the main prayer in both English and Hebrew, as well as the Hebrew text of the three primary blessings. It also prompts reflection on possible modern sins, such as, "Have you used other people's unsecured wireless Internet?"

Jew Booth

Sure, that photo of you at cousin Jake's wedding looks nice, but does it need a little Jewish je ne sais quoi? Jew Booth is here to help. Take any photo and make it distinctly Jewish by adding a kippah, a Star of David necklace or other Jewish accoutrements. Your Facebook friends will think you've undergone a religious transformation when they see photos of you wearing a black fedora. Whether or not you clue them in to Jew Booth's photographic trickery is up to you.

Yiddish Slang Dictionary

The next time you're at a party and someone calls you a shlemiel when you spill your soda, whip out the Yiddish Slang Dictionary on your smartphone for an appropriate retort. Thanks to this app, Yiddish experts and neophytes alike can parse the language's rich rhetorical epithets. The dictionary includes common words (shlep, mensch) along with more obscure bon mots such as tummler and schmutter.

The Amazing Jewish-Fact-a-Day Calendar

Can you name the play into which Shakespeare slipped some Hebrew? What do you know about the Talmud's seemingly prophetic stance on airplanes? This app informs users about important historical events that occurred on that date, fascinating religious practices and famous figures. Learn about everything from Louis Armstrong's early job working for a Jewish family to historic disagreements between Hillel and Shammai.

Going Paprikash

Before World War II, as many as 250,000 Jews lived in Budapest, filling the Hungarian capital's 125 synagogues.

When they weren't praying, they were cooking up a treasure trove of culinary treats, such as rakott krumpli (potato casserole), paprikas csirke (chicken paprikash) and gomboc (dumplings). Those longing for a taste of Hungary's Jewish heritage can download this app, which features 120 kosher Hungarian recipes and the tales of how they came to be.

Judoku

Thumb twiddlers on subways and in office meetings can now brush up on their Jewish symbols while passing the time: A new version of the popular logic game Sudoku, usually played with numbers, features images such as the shofar, the Star of David and Hebrew letters. Just make sure to follow the cardinal rule of the game: no more than one menorah in each three-by-three box.

Dragon boats arrive in Israel

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

Offloading the six dragon boats in Haifa was not an easy task. But Victor Yagoda, director of projects and infrastructures for United Israel Appeal Canada, could hardly contain his excitement as each of the decorative craft touched Israeli soil.

The boats arrived in Haifa from China and were sent on to the Jordan Valley Regional Council Marine Center – the latest step leading up to Israel's First Annual Dragon Boat Festival.

"Things have gone very well so far," said Yagoda, who is organizing the event on the Israeli side.

Debbie Halton-Weiss, chair of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, is in charge of getting the Canadian side of things in order.

Hype for the first-ever dragon boat race on the Sea of Galilee is building. When the idea for the May 2012 event was first proposed, organizers hoped to attract 20 teams.

"In Canada, we already have 17 teams from all across the country," Yagoda told The CJN. "In Israel, we already have 22 teams. We're overbooked. We have three teams on the waiting list. We have good troubles in Israel, already."

The sport is not known in Israel. But that hasn't stopped people from showing interest.

"Nobody knows what a dragon boat is, so everybody was skeptical at the beginning," said Yagoda, who was saddled with the task of presenting the sport to potential paddlers. "It takes a short time to show people how cool this could be. I did presentations, and within 10 minutes, I had people smiling."

The Israeli teams are a mixed lot.

Yagoda said there are two teams of factory workers from the Upper Galilee, youth teams, teams of disabled IDF veterans, all-women's teams and a Soroka Hospital team made up of nurses and doctors.

Dragon Boat Israel

It was a Canadian dragon boat team that brought this traditional Chinese team sport to Israel. Based in Ottawa, the team members thought it would be fun to combine their love of dragon boat racing with their love of Israel. That gave birth to Dragon Boat Israel (DBI) a joint Canada-Israel initiative.

In mid-November, three Canadian experts flew to Israel to help prepare for the festival.

"We held sessions of paddling, technical sessions, how to plan the festival, how to run a race," Yagoda reported.

Yagoda said dragon boating is in a different class of team sports. Each boat has 20 paddlers, one steerperson and one drummer whose beats encourage the team to go faster.

"There are no other sports in Israel where you have 22 people active on the field – or in this case on the water. Young and old, any religion, any background, this is a true group sport," Yagoda said.

The sport dates back more than 2,000 years to China where it was preserved as a folk ritual. Hong Kong sent dragon boats to the 1986 World Exposition on Transportation and Communication in Vancouver, and the sport suddenly got global coverage. Today, dragon boat racing is popular in 70 countries. Starting in May, make that 71.

When asked how it differs from rowing, Yagoda gasped. "This isn't rowing, it's paddling," he all but exclaimed. "It's like mixing fleishig and dairy."

It's not just a sport, either. An important part of dragon boating is fundraising. Yagoda said this festival is meant to foster a greater connection to northern Israel and also support two educational charities, Youth Futures, which provides disadvantaged youth with mentors, and Net@, which trains young people in high-tech.

"It could have been done with better infrastructure and cheaper in Tel Aviv, but we don't want to do it in Tel Aviv," Yagoda said. "We wanted to do this for the north. They'll be the direct beneficiaries. We're going to bring 600 tourists who will be staying in the north for three to four nights. This is a very encouraging outcome."

The festival is scheduled for May 17 and 18, 2012. The first day will be dedicated to training; the second day will be for paddling and races.

Yagoda says organizers are expecting some 2,000 people to attend.

"This is the first annual event and we're hoping to end this event with the date of next year's festival," Yagoda said. "If we have such a big turnout, we will have to buy more boats."

Canadian doctors make a house call to Israel

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel 21c

A group of Canadian physicians recently got a first-hand glimpse of the medical breakthroughs coming out of Israeli universities, medical schools and startups.

Amir Amedi's "virtual cane" for the blind, Hossam Haick's NaNose for diagnosing disease from breath samples, Moshe Shoham's ViRobe robot that delivers cancer meds directly to tumours, Jacob Barak's device to prevent blood clots without drugs – these and many more inventions were explored during the Medical Breakthroughs Tour for Doctors organized by Keshet: The Center for Educational Tourism in Israel, sponsor of ISRAEL21c's Travel Channel.

'The theme of our tour is technological innovations'

"The theme of our tour is technological innovations, and we've seen 'better' cars – electric vehicles – that, in a way, are a metaphor for the kind of innovation that Israel is doing in biotechnology," said Dr. John Mail, a family practitioner.

The tour was organized by Keshet at the suggestion of Vancouver family physician Larry Barzelai. Reading the bestseller Start-Up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle by Dan Senor and Saul Singer gave Barzelai the idea.

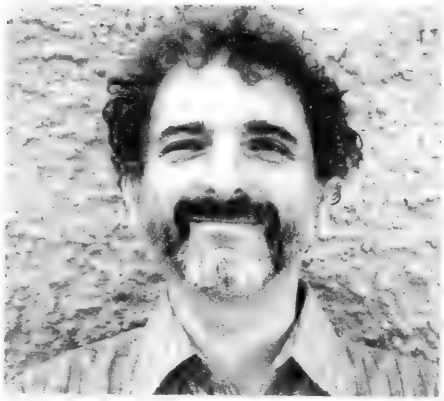
"I was blown away by the calibre of medical technology going on here, and I thought people would be interested," he told ISRAEL21c.

Keshet was already offering "Start-Up Nation" tours focusing on technology, and worked with Barzelai to make his idea a reality.

"I used some ISRAEL21c materials to locate people in the field," trip co-ordinator Rabbi Bill Berk said. "I would sift through 40 to 50 stories on doctors doing amazing things and send Larry articles. He chose the topics that most interested him and did the legwork of contacting doctors here, while we arranged for company visits. The companies were excited about having a group of doctors coming to see what they do."

Among those firms were Given Imaging, a world leader in developing patient-friendly solutions for visualizing and detecting disorders of the GI tract; and Neuronix, maker of a novel electromagnetic stimulation system to treat Alzheimer's disease.

"The doctors explored the subterranean halls of the 12th century Hospitalier Knights in the World Heritage Site of Akko [Acre], provided some exercise for their cardio-vascular systems on a bike ride on a desert trail in the Negev and were treated to a multicultural tapestry of modern and ancient Jerusalem," Barzelai said.



Dr. Larry Barzelai

"Given the location in the centre of the great monotheistic religions, lectures on Islamic and Jewish medical ethics were also part of the offering as well as exploring the role of faith in the ancient and modern healing arts. Not overlooked was a sampling of the increasingly renowned Israeli cuisine and its award winning wines."

Operating room of the future now a reality

Advances for blind and deaf

The doctors, some accompanied by spouses, learned of many Arab-Israeli co-operative ventures in medicine. One of these was described by professors Karen Abraham of Tel Aviv University and Maien Kanaan of Bethlehem University, who are jointly studying the causes of genetic deafness.

"It was clear that in the Israeli academic community there is no issue as to where people studied, where they go home at night or what their politics are," notes Dr. Rhona Gordon of Vancouver. "That really gives hope for the future if we can extrapolate that to how the general society can move forward."

Gordon said that Abraham and Kanaan arrived early for their presentation and sat in on a talk by Nano Retina's Ra'anan Gefen about his company's telescopic implants to treat macular degeneration.

"As they listened to him describe how the artificial retina uses an electrode array to magnify signals and improve vision for someone still partially sighted, you could see the wheels beginning to turn in their minds about applying this same science in their field," Gordon said. "Ten to 15 years down the road, when we hear they are about to improve hearing using a similar technology, we can say we were there when the penny dropped."

The operating room of the future

Seminars at leading Israeli medical centres gave participants a chance to earn CME (continuing medical education) credits. A session with paleopathologist Dr. Mark Spigelman, of the Kuvin Center for the Study of Infectious and Tropical Diseases at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, led to an unexpected discovery.

Dr. Arie Orenstein

In describing his research on tuberculosis, Spigelman mentioned that his Palestinian graduate student had introduced a rapid screening test, called PCR, in the West Bank.

The doctors exchanged surprised glances, because PCR isn't yet the norm in Canada. "This is a minor example of a scientific advance that Israel has adopted faster than Canada has," Mail said.

A lecture on "the operating room of the future" by Dr. Arie Orenstein, director of the Center for Advanced Medical Technologies at Sheba Medical Center, struck a chord with Gordon, a family physician from Vancouver.

"One of the techniques he discussed is spectroscopy, which I studied almost 30 years ago in relation to stars," Gordon said. "Now we see a biological application for imaging in surgery. I figured this was something that could take another 10 or 20 years, but Dr. Orenstein said they are doing this already in Israel."

The visitors heard a report from Israeli medical teams that responded to the 2010 Haiti earthquake, toured an IDF medical unit and learned about Islamic medical ethics from Dr. Kassim Baddarni. "It was interesting how close Islamic medical ethics are to Jewish medical ethics," Barzelai noted.

Dr. Barry Nathanson, head of medicine programs at the Toronto-area Southlake Regional Health Centre, said he noted "the juxtaposition between Israeli contributions to medicine and health care, and Judaism's contributions to medicine. One is the science of health care, while the other is the art of medicine, and to see them both come together is really beautiful to me," he told ISRAEL21c.

The doctors also had opportunities to tour Ben-Gurion University's medical school and check out Israeli tourist spots including the Carmel Mountains, the Baha'i Gardens, the City of David, the Mitzpe Ramon crater, the Roman ruins of Caesarea and Tel Aviv's Independence Hall and Nahalat Binyamin crafts fair.

Google to incubate Israeli startups

David Shamah
Israel 21c

Hard as it is to believe, Google is barely a decade old – not too far out of "startup territory." So it makes sense that the now giant company would still have a soft spot for entrepreneurs just starting out.

Recently Google Israel announced that it will go the extra mile for Israeli entrepreneurs, by opening an incubator where great ideas can grow and mature into great products and services.

Google has been in Israel for about five years, and "from the beginning, the goal was to build a research and development centre in Israel and to innovate global products and technology," said Yossi Matias, director of Google's R&D centre in Israel, which employs about 250 people at facilities in Haifa and Tel Aviv.

Google Israel is known for its innovations. Several key technologies developed either entirely or in part at Google's local R&D centres include Google Suggest, Google Trends, Google Insights for Search and others. As the leader of this inventive team, Matias appreciates the importance of supporting developers and startups.

"I have been looking at how to contribute to the developer community, especially in the early stages that will have the biggest impact on their ability to succeed," he said. As a result, the Google Incubator program was born.

The project is set to begin in early 2012, with around 20 "pre-seed" startups (about 80 people) participating in each "round." Companies will be expected to graduate from the incubator after a few months, and will be replaced by another startup. The project will be open to startups from different fields, "with an emphasis on open-source technologies, naturally, since that's an important value for Google," Matias said.

The technologies will not be limited to any specific area. Google is open to hearing about good ideas from the gamut of digital technology, from desktop to cloud to mobile, he added. He said a Google team will be established to work with universities, colleges and other organizations, with the aim of exposing the project to the maximum possible number of entrepreneurs and developers.

Google hasn't decided how much, if any, money will be invested in specific companies, but the point of the program isn't funding; it's about "getting into the Google groove," imbibing the influence of one of the most innovative teams at one of the most innovative companies in the world.

"We will provide them with working space and an Internet connection," Matias said. "The entrepreneurs will be working on a floor of our new headquarters, right next to our R&D team in Tel Aviv. They'll have an opportunity to work with our engineers and programmers, as well as experts from outside the company, who will be able to help and inspire them."

Shopping for ideas in Israel

While Matias, who will be directing the program, will take each idea on its own merit, companies must meet certain basic qualifications. Google will be looking for "the kind of things investors in a startup look for – a good idea, an enthusiastic team and people who are easy to work with. That's important because we will be working with them on a daily basis for at least several months."

In return, he said, "companies will learn a lot about how to succeed, both technically and practically. We'll be helping them with marketing as well, helping them to not only develop their idea, but bring it to the public."

In addition, "we're hoping also to include entrepreneurs and developers from different sectors in Israel, including those that don't have high representation [or] exposure in the Israeli technology scene today."

Of course, Google is always interested in good ideas for its own purposes, Matias said, and it's certainly possible that Google could even acquire some of the startups that will be working in the incubator.

It wouldn't be the first time Google has gone "shopping" for Israeli ideas. In 2010, Google acquired two Israeli companies (Quiksee, which developed 3D video tour software for use with Google Maps, and LabPixies, which makes "widgets" for iGoogle and Android phones.

But the incubator program isn't about acquisitions, says Matias.

"The incubator is a separate program sponsored by Google, and not about work inside Google Israel," he says. "We are here to help the developer community, sharing our know-how and bringing great ideas to the fore."

"The Israeli developer community is hugely innovative and has the potential to create many more groundbreaking technological developments," corporate headquarters stated in a news release at the founding of the incubator. "This project was initiated with a desire to encourage entrepreneurship and to provide support at exactly the stage when developers are often most in need of it."

Shoah Foundation gathers Rwandan stories

Jonah Lowenfeld
The Jewish Journal

The University of Southern California (USC) Shoah Foundation Institute is home to more than 52,000 videotaped testimonies about the Holocaust, and people searching the archive's index enter a single keyword into their queries more than any other: "Auschwitz."

"Auschwitz seems to be the one that people go to most," said Crispin Brooks, curator of the foundation's visual history archive.

Likewise, people tend to focus on dark topics when accessing the archive of videotaped testimonies at the Kigali Genocide Memorial Center (KGMC) in Rwanda's capital, which is dedicated to preserving and disseminating memories of that country's genocide. Among the centre's holdings is an archive of recordings of survivors, perpetrators, rescuers and others telling of their experiences during the 100-day period in 1994 when 800,000 members of Rwanda's Tutsi population were massacred by Hutu militias.

"Mainly they want to know the way people were killed," said Diogene Mwizerwa, 29, an indexer at KGMC.

About 80,000 people visit KGMC every year, most of them to pay respects to the more than 250,000 Rwandan genocide victims whose bodies are buried in 14 mass graves on the site. But those visitors also include students and scholars interested in consulting the Rwandan genocide testimonies that are currently housed there.

Thanks to a new partnership between the Shoah Foundation Institute and KGMC, some of the Rwandan testimonies will soon become much more widely accessible and searchable.

Since mid-October, Mwizerwa and three other KGMC staffers have been in residence at the Shoah Foundation Institute in Los Angeles. The four fellows, who are all survivors of the genocide, are part of a recently announced joint effort between the two centres that will also expand the Shoah Foundation's archive to include 50 new testimonies about the Rwandan experience.

"We are not trying to compare human suffering," Stephen D. Smith, the foundation's executive director, said, adding that there are also plans to incorporate voices from the Cambodian and Armenian genocides into the archive in the near future. "What we're trying to do is document each of these experiences with depth and dignity."

The new Rwandan testimonies, all conducted in Kinyarwanda, will be translated into and subtitled in English. As part of this $500,000 project, they will become part of the Shoah archive by the end of 2012, making them accessible in part via the Internet, and in full at 32 locations around the world.

Karen Jungblut, the foundation's director of research and documentation, who is directly responsible for the Rwanda project, also has worked with groups of archivists from Cambodia in the past.

"The mission of Shoah has always been 'to overcome prejudice, intolerance, and bigotry – and the suffering they cause – through the educational use of the foundation's visual history testimonies,'" said Jungblut, who started out as an indexer in 1996, just two years after the foundation was founded by Steven Spielberg and 10 years before it moved its archive to the University of Southern California, in 2006, to become the USC Shoah Foundation Institute.

"At that time, it was a conscious decision not to say 'Holocaust testimony,' with the view that it would open the door to including testimonies of survivors of genocides other than the Holocaust."

To make the videos of Rwandan testimonies searchable for scholars in the way the Shoah archive's testimonies of the Holocaust already are, they need to be indexed in the same way.

For the last few weeks, Mwizerwa and his colleagues have been working with Brooks and other Shoah staff to learn the process, starting with learning how to use the proprietary computer program that Shoah indexers used to attach keywords to specific segments of Holocaust testimonies.

Over 10,000 keywords in foundation's database

On Nov. 10, Brooks led the Rwandan fellows through a segment of one Holocaust survivor's testimony from the Shoah archive. In the upper-left-hand corner of Brooks' computer screen, Peter Hersch, a central European Jewish survivor who migrated to Australia after the Holocaust, could be seen describing a particularly vicious kapo, a prisoner who had authority over other prisoners, whom he encountered while imprisoned in Auschwitz.

The rest of the screen was full of drop-down menus and boxes. Using the mouse, Brooks could rapidly click and double-click on the menus and boxes to attach keyword tags to the Holocaust survivor's story on a minute-by-minute basis.

"So we have the name of the kapo, and the 'forced labor' terms," Brooks said, stopping the recording, "but I added in 'forced labor conditions,' because it definitely felt like, early on, he was describing what the conditions were like doing this forced labour."

Crispin Brooks helping a student navigate the archives [SFI Teacher Institute]

Distinctions between the more than 10,000 keywords in the Shoah's database are very nuanced – "camp deaths" is not the same as "camp suicides," "camp killings," "camp executions" or "camp corpses" – and some keywords are specifically related to the Holocaust experience.

So, before the Rwandan fellows can index the testimonies about the 1994 genocide, they will first have to create a new set of keywords – a process that will require them to put themselves into the positions of the information's end-users.

"How did you survive? That means how did you hide until the end?" said KGMC archive manager Yves Kamuronsi, 30, explaining why "hiding" would be one of the more commonly used keywords attached to the testimonies of Rwandan survivors. The index will be crucial to the usefulness of the archive. Before joining KGMC, another fellow, Paul Rukesha, 33, spent one year working with the traditional Gacaca Courts that were set up after the Rwandan genocide to try perpetrators. Researchers, he said, shouldn't have to go through three hours of testimony to get to the information they're looking for.

"You want to be as perfect as possible, as accurate as possible, because indexing, for me, is all about time management for the researchers," he said.

In addition to asking how people were killed, Kamuronsi said, visitors to KGMC also ask about other topics – like reconciliation or forgiveness – albeit less often.

That's likely to change, Kamuronsi said. "I'm imagining that, let's say, 40 years after genocide, I think people will be asking different questions," he said. "We will be asking ourselves different questions."

In comparison to the Holocaust, Rwanda's genocide is still recent history to many – and especially so in the country itself, where people who once would have been identified as either Tutsi or Hutu now live side by side but are prohibited from using those group names in many contexts.

The very words "Tutsi" and "Hutu" started off as Rwandan cultural designations but took on far greater importance during the colonial and post-colonial periods, after the colonizers empowered the Tutsi minority to exercise authority over the country.

The mass killing of Tutsis by members of Rwanda's majority Hutu population can be traced directly back to this distinction – and today, usage of the terms in Rwanda is banned in many situations. But, for the purposes of the index, the terms will be used.

"If you say, 'Tutsis and Hutus,'" Kamuronsi said, "it's fine. But if you say, 'You are not allowed into here because you are Hutu or Tutsi,' you will be punished, because you are discriminating against someone based on who you know he is."

"Frankly speaking, people still have that kind of perception of Tutsis and Hutus in their minds," said Rukesha, who trained in sociology at the National University of Rwanda. "And you can't stop them from perceiving that issue like that."

Some survivors, Rukesha said, consider all Hutus as enemies. But though he works at KGMC, he does not see it as part of his mission to change that perception.

"My mission is to index," Rukesha said. "And to index is not to interpret the history; it's just to facilitate you as a journalist, as a researcher, to focus on a certain issue you want to work on."

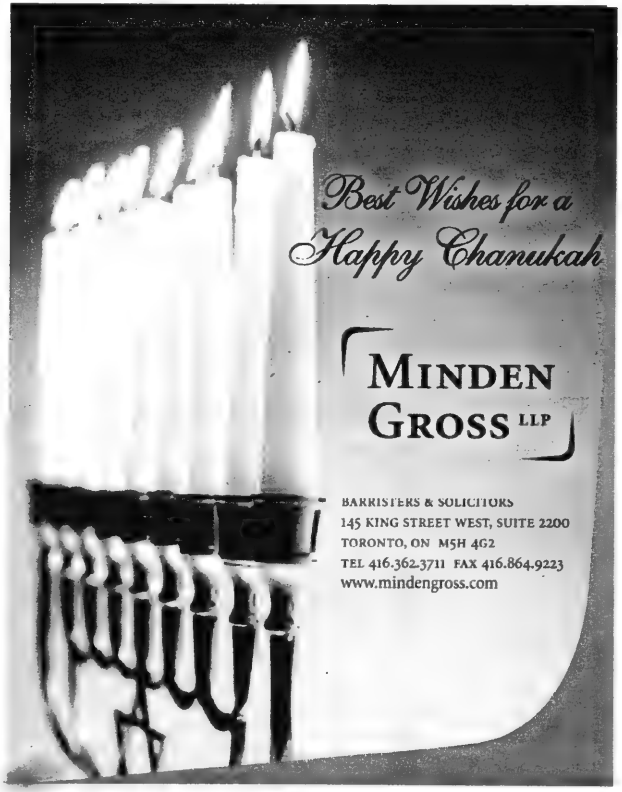
This kind of compartmentalization was common to all indexers – no matter which group of testimonies they were working with.

"We have to forget the other things and focus on this," Martin Niwenshuti, 34, said.

"You have to know how to deal with emotions," Rukesha said. "You do some relaxation techniques."

"You take a break," Brooks said.

Rukesha nodded. "You drink some water."



Reports examine Jewish life in eastern Europe

Ruth Ellen Gruber
JTA

It's not easy to decipher the complicated trajectory of Jewish life in post-communist Europe.

"There are claims and counterclaims about contemporary European Jewish life," Jonathan Boyd, the executive director of London's Institute for Jewish Policy Research (JPR), said. "At one end of the spectrum there are reports of a remarkable renaissance of activity; at the other there is a strong narrative of decline."

Boyd's institute recently published a pair of reports written by local researchers in Hungary and Poland that offer a more nuanced view. The reports looked at the development of Jewish life in these two countries since the collapse of communism and examined the challenges their Jewish communities face going forward.

The reports, Boyd said, "illustrate that both perspectives are correct: While Jewish life has undoubtedly been reinvigorated since the collapse of communism, considerable investment is required to ensure the long-term sustainability of Jewish life in both places."

Hungary, with an estimated 100,000 Jews, has the largest Jewish population in post-communist Europe outside the former Soviet Union. In Poland, the European Jewish heartland that was home to more than 3 million Jews before the Holocaust, the Jewish population today is estimated at only 8,000-15,000.

The reports were prepared on the basis of interviews with a range of Jewish community activists in each country, followed up by focus-group discussions. Their results highlight similarities in the post-communist Jewish revival process but also illustrate the differences between various Jewish communities.

They also demonstrate the increasing importance of alternative forms of engagement in nurturing identity among younger Jews. These include Jewish community centres, Jewish studies programs, grassroots educational projects such as Limmud, and even initiatives such as Jewish cafes and culture festivals.

The research in Hungary showed a community reinvigorated over the last 20 years but facing the challenge of low engagement in communal life, with only 10 per cent of the Jewish population affiliated with a Jewish organization.

Young people especially appear alienated from established Jewish communal structures, such as the umbrella Federation of Hungarian Jewish Communities -- or Mazsihisz, to use its Hungarian acronym.

The JPR Hungary report calls for an urgent overhaul of Mazsihisz and the entire institutional system of organized Hungarian Jewry to ensure that decisions on issues affecting the whole community are made in a democratic and transparent fashion.

It also calls for greater religious pluralism and more co-operation and co-ordination among the plethora of often competing local Jewish groups and initiatives. This, it said, could help foster the emergence and training of a new generation of leaders "who recognize that success in any part of the community should be regarded as success for the whole community."

"One of our purposes was to present conflicting views on every issue we considered," sociologist Andras Kovacs, an expert on Hungarian Jewish issues who was one of the co-authors of the report, told JTA. "We wanted to provoke debate."

In Poland, research bore witness to the rebirth of a community that remains tiny but has a disproportionate impact both at home and abroad, in part due to the importance of Polish Jewish history and heritage to world Jewry.

Because of this, the report said, and "because of the remarkably positive reaction of the Polish state and most of civil society to Jewish interests and concerns," Jewish programs in Poland "have a very high multiplier effect," with a direct impact "both on the world community of Jews of Polish origin, and on Jewish and non-Jewish Poles alike."

Polish community will remain small

Therefore, it said, preservation and study of Jewish heritage – from cemeteries, synagogues and Holocaust sites such as death camps, to archival, museum and library collections – "are of great importance."

Moreover, it said, while Orthodox Jewry remained the primary established religious stream, only a minority of the community identified with Orthodoxy.

The report urged greater investment in programs supporting Jewish cultural initiatives and non-Orthodox alternative forms of Jewish engagement.

"There is a future for the Jewish community in Poland, but the community will remain small," Konstanty Gebert, a leading Jewish intellectual and writer who co-authored the report, told JTA. "While the Orthodox part will remain a core of it, it represents only a minority," he said.

"Culture is a main identity factor for young Jews," he went on. "The most important things are happening on the interface between the Jewish community and society at large."

Jonathan Ornstein, the director of the Jewish Community Centre in Krakow, said the report gave a good overall picture of Jewish life in Poland today and many of its complexities.

"It accurately portrays Polish Jews as being optimistic and not overly concerned with antisemitism, which stands in marked contrast to the rest of Europe," he told JTA.

But he added, "I would have liked to see more focus on the somewhat unnatural structure of the community, where official religious life is Orthodox but few of the members are. Polish Jewry coming to terms with that situation, and having its institutions more accurately represent the people is to me the greatest challenge we face moving forward."

The reports were the first two of a series of JPR investigations into contemporary Jewish life in eastern and central Europe funded by the Rothschild Foundation (Hanadiv) Europe. Future reports will deal with Ukraine and Germany.

"This research highlights the importance of avoiding generalities about Jewish life in Central and Eastern Europe," Sally Berkovic, the chief executive of the Rothschild Foundation Europe, said in a statement. "Despite some shared experiences, each Jewish community, with its distinctive characteristics, has responded differently to the challenges precipitated by the fall of communism."

Young Jews lead resurgence in Detroit

Dan Klein
JTA

Blair Nosan grew up in the Detroit suburb of West Bloomfield, attended the University of Michigan and then, like thousands of other young Jews from the beleaguered state, moved away.

Though she grew up in a heavily Jewish area, Nosan, 26, had felt disconnected both from her Jewish identity and the nearby city, which was undergoing its own debilitating population drain. Over the last decade, 25 per cent of Detroit's residents have taken flight. Some 5,000 young Jews left Michigan between 2005 and 2010, according to a 2010 survey by the Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Detroit.

But then Nosan came back.

In 2009, she moved to Detroit to work in its burgeoning urban agriculture scene, eventually starting her own pickling company, Suddenly Sauer.

Nosan was startled to learn that she was part of a significant migration of young Jews to the Motor City – a young Jewish renaissance that has been as unexpected as it has been successful. It's evident not just in numbers but in a resurgence of Jewish activity and vitality in the heart of Detroit, including among Jews who had never been Jewishly active.

"I did not expect to find a Jewish community at all," Nosan told JTA, echoing the sentiments of many of Detroit's new Jewish residents. "Most of the Jews were living in Detroit as participants in the Jewish community, but with their Jewish identity in mind were trying to fill in the blanks of this long history we had had in the city but weren't raised with."

Over the last few years, a slew of new programs from the institutional to the grassroots and from suburb to city have blossomed in the Detroit area.

> Over the last few years a slew of new programs have blossomed

Detroit's first Moishe House opened in June in midtown, and its occupants – five from the suburbs of Detroit and one from Los Angeles – have been holding five or six Jewish events a month. The most recent was a sauerkraut workshop taught by Nosan that attracted 16 people.

At a bar in Royal Oak, a suburb near Detroit, Rabbi Leiby Burnham began a weekly program in 2007 called Torah on Tap to talk about Judaism in a bar setting, with the drinks paid for by an anonymous donor. Starting with seven people, the event now draws as many as 100 per week.

The most striking example of the transformation of Jewish life in Detroit is at the Isaac Agree Downtown Synagogue, the last remaining synagogue in the city. Detroit once was a major hub of Jewish life, with 44 synagogues. But after race riots in the 1960s and economic decline, most of the city's whites – Jews included – left for the northern suburbs, repeating a pattern taking place in cities across America.

In 2008, the 90-year-old Conservative shul was in dire straits – open only once a week, often unable to assemble a minyan and without a rabbi (the last one had died in 2003). The board was considering packing it in and selling the historic four-storey building.

"Some didn't think we had a future," said David Powell, who has attended Isaac Agree for decades. "We continued to plod along until reinforcements came."

Growing arts scene drew social activists

Starting a few years ago, those reinforcements began to come in the form of young social activists and entrepreneurs who were drawn to the city by its growing arts scene and revitalization programs that offered subsidized rent and unique employment opportunities for social justice work. Many of the Jews among them came to the synagogue, in the process changing it. They began running services, serving on the board and organizing events of the sort that the old shul had never seen: Israeli film screenings, potluck dinners and Israeli folk-dancing. Community activists also used it as a gathering place.

"The synagogue wasn't meeting the needs of the city, and it was struggling," said Oren Goldenberg, a filmmaker and prominent activist in the community. "It needed to adapt."

Isaac Agree became more and more popular. Services were held three days a week rather than one. Events were organized to celebrate all the holidays. The synagogue started offering Hebrew lessons and even conversion classes. And now every Friday night it hosts a Shabbat dinner.

"I liked Isaac Agree because it stayed. It's been here the whole time," Nosan said. "That's a poignant point of entry for the community – what's already here and been here, and figuring out new energy that's being brought to the table."

In the past few years, Isaac Agree has more than tripled its membership households, becoming the only Conservative synagogue in Michigan not to suffer a decline, according to the 2010 federation survey.

"There are definitely more Jews here then there were a year ago," said Goldenberg while having coffee in Avalon International Breads, a bakery co-founded by Jackie Vicks, a 20-year resident of the city who joined the synagogue last year. "I live here. When things change, I know it."

Some of the new Jewish revitalization programs, including Torah on Tap and Detroit's Moishe House, are receiving support from CommunityNext, a program started by one Detroit returnee based on the idea that creating cultural activities and a strong cultural centre is as important as jobs to retaining and attracting young adults to Detroit.

"Young Jews are not going to move to suburbs. They're going to move to cities," said Jordan Wolfe, the Detroit native who launched the program in 2010 after returning to the area in 2007 following a stint in California's high-tech sector. "They're willing to take jobs as a waiter if there's something to do."

CommunityNext's strategy is to support both Jewish culture and Detroit's revitalization.

The program, which was funded in the first year by $60,000 from two anonymous donors and another $40,000 from Detroit's Jewish federation, organizes Jewish events and offers Jewish entrepreneurs small-business loans and free office space. CommunityNext also supports nonsectarian Detroit revitalization projects such as Come Play Detroit, which helps organize intramural sports leagues. In its first year, Come Play Detroit created 27 leagues in nine sports involving 4,500 people.

"We're building community, but the larger agenda is Detroit," said Rachel Lachover, CommunityNext's associate director. "People are moving back. People are talking about Detroit."

In August, the federation teamed up with Come Play Detroit to set up fundraising sports tournaments across the country, raising $100,000 for 25 rent subsidies to help people move to Detroit on the condition that they hold community events once a month – the Moishe House model.

"I've enjoyed becoming part of the Detroit Jewish community," said Allie Gross, a Los Angeles native now living at Moishe House. "It's changing as a lot as young people move back in. There's a sense of urgency. People are excited about what Detroit's offering. It's very exciting."

How to do well by doing good

Suzanne Kurtz
JTA

A scoop of Ben & Jerry's may taste like heaven, and for company co-founder Jerry Greenfield, the business of making ice cream has a spiritual side as well.

"There is a spiritual aspect to business, just as there is to people," Greenfield told a crowd of 300 recently at a networking event for the Jewish Federation of Greater Washington.

The ice-cream company, known for its colourful pint-size containers, funky flavours and creative marketing, has implemented smart business practices that have advanced its bottom line as well as its do-good corporate culture.

Raised on suburban New York's Long Island, Greenfield, 60, and his longtime friend and business partner, Ben Cohen, met in gym class in junior high school after discovering a shared dislike of running track. They were chubby kids who always enjoyed eating, Greenfield said, and both attended Hebrew school and had their bar mitzvahs at the Reform Congregation of Merrick.

Though a self-described "cultural Jew," Greenfield said that his religious education helped sensitize him to discrimination, marginalization and the needs of "other people in society and around the world."

Jerry Greenfield

In his mid-20s, after being rejected from some 20 medical schools and not content with working as a lab technician, Greenfield split a $5 Pennsylvania State University correspondence course in ice cream making with Cohen and embarked on a new business venture.

In 1978, with $12,000 scraped together from loans and savings, they opened Ben & Jerry's Homemade, Inc., in a renovated gas station in Burlington, Vt. Their single storefront venture would grow eventually into a $300-million global ice cream empire owned by the Unilever Corp.

Neither Greenfield nor Cohen is still active in the day-to-day running of the company. Instead, Greenfield said, his present role with Ben & Jerry's holds "no responsibility and no authority," joking that it should be a position that those attending the federation event also strive for in their careers.

But their vision for an ice-cream company that would be both profitable and care about the needs of society has left a lasting impact on both employees and customers.

"Simply operating this way had so many benefits for the company," said Greenfield, as he detailed some of the values-driven business practices that also saw him and Cohen named U.S. Small Business Persons of the Year in 1988.

One oft-cited example of Ben & Jerry's socially conscience business practices is its purchase of $8 million annually of chocolate brownies baked at the Greyston Bakery in Yonkers, N.Y., a non-profit that offers job training and hires workers who might have a difficult time finding jobs elsewhere, such as ex-convicts, former substance abusers and welfare recipients.

"We came up with this popular flavour [for using the brownies] and the bakery is pretty happy with it, too!" said Greenfield.

In 1984, when the company needed to raise additional capital to grow the business, they let their Vermont neighbours "get a scoop of the action" by holding an in-state public offering.

"People of essentially any economic situation could participate," said Greenfield, and one in every 100 Vermont families became shareholders in the company. "As the business supported the community, the community supported the business."

In 1985, the company made a public stock offering and also established the Ben & Jerry's Foundation. It began donating 7.5 per cent of pretax profits to nonprofit organizations – the highest percentage of any publicly traded company at the time, he said.

"As you give, you receive," Greenfield said. "As you help others, you are helped in return."

He added, "And just because the idea that the good that you do comes back to you is written in the Bible and not in some business textbook, [it] doesn't mean that it is any less valid."

Who is killing the Syrians?

Mordechai Kedar

The horrible events that have been occurring in Syria for the past nine months raise a worrying question: why isn't the world getting involved in what's going on there? Why did NATO interfere in Libya to bring about the fall of the Gadhafi regime but in Syria the slaughter continues without the world lifting a finger? Is the Libyan "black liquid" really more valuable in the eyes of the world than the Syrian "red liquid"?

A complex system of relationships exists between those countries that have a say about Syrian affairs, a "system" that paralyzes every international action to rescue the citizens of Syria, after about 4,500 of them have been murdered by the regime, and many thousands more have been arrested and their fate is still unknown.

The whole world clearly knows that Syria is very important to Iran, and indeed Syria is the Iranian Trojan horse inside the Arab world. Syria is the logistical backbone of Hezbollah in Lebanon, so the fall of the Syrian regime will end the Syrian support for Hezbollah and bring an end to the "exporting of the revolution to Lebanon." Iran has cautioned the whole world that external interference in Syria will be considered by Iran as an attack upon itself, which will result in acts of reprisals against Israel and Turkey. Turkey is involved up to Prime Minister Recep Erdogan's ears in the events in Syria, but why Israel? What has Israel done to Syria that would justify an Iranian attack? Iran has the answers to these questions.

Turkey is constantly stirring up matters in Syria. Not one day passes without its leaders – and contrary to Syrian President Bashar Assad, they are legitimate leaders – announcing that he (Assad) must resign and leave office, and the Turks are hosting thousands of Syrian refugees in their country. Recently, there have been scattered reports that Turkey has established a training camp within its territory for the Syrian citizens and soldiers who deserted their posts, in order to turn them into guerilla units under the name the Free Syrian Army. Turkey arms and equips them, and these are the ones who are attacking military camps, intelligence headquarters and buses of the Syrian army. The number of Syrian soldiers that these guerilla units have killed and wounded is estimated to be in the hundreds, and as a result, they have caused the Syrian army to take defensive positions in their own camps.

Turkey seeking border buffer near Syria

Turkey threatens to take over several kilometres in the north of Syria along its border with Turkey, to serve as a protected buffer zone where Syrian citizens will be able to find shelter from the Syrian army. In response, Iran threatens Turkey that it will attack NATO positions in Turkey if Turkey will attack Syria. This warning amounts to no less than a threat of war between Iran and Turkey.

Iran's reaction to the fall of the Assad regime may not be limited only to Turkey and Israel, but may include the Gulf. Why not? If the Iranians see that Europe is also involved in the overthrow of the Syrian regime, they may announce that there's a naval mine – only one – in the Strait of Hormuz (a narrow, strategically important waterway between the Gulf of Oman in the southeast and the Persian Gulf.) This announcement would be enough – even if it wasn't actually so – to raise the price of oil drastically in the world, and the sputtering economy of Europe will suffer a hard blow. Iran can very easily harm oil installations in the countries of the Gulf without even deploying the army. It would be enough to pay a few Shiites in Saudi Arabia to do to the oil and gas pipes in their country what the Bedouin are doing in Sinai, to the pipe that brings gas to Israel and Jordan.

Europe and the United States might react to the Iranian action, and the deterioration into war between Iran and NATO may follow quickly. The result of this war would be – among other things – cessation of the export of Iranian oil to China, and a dramatic rise in the price of oil in the world. China has invested many billions in the petrochemical and other industries in Iran, and a NATO war on Iran may bring about regime change in Iran. The new regime might renege on the agreements that the Ayatollahs' regime have made with China, which might cause all of those investments to go down the drain. This is the reason for China's support of Iran and Syria.

Russia supports Syria, too, because it, too, has invested many billions in Syria and Iran, and worries about these investments. But Russia has an additional, much larger fear: the fall of the regime in Syria, and the war that may break out in the Gulf as a result of that, might cause great damage to the Chinese economy, which is already suffering a slowdown as a result of the worldwide economic slowdown. High unemployment in China will cause many millions of unemployed Chinese to join the millions of Chinese who are flooding into Russia today in search of work. If there is anything that the Russian leaders fear, it is to be swallowed up demographically by the Chinese, which has been happening in recent years at a rapid rate, mainly because of the demographic decrease of the Russians.

Russia has military and intelligence bases in Syria, and the only ports in the Mediterranean Sea in which Russian warships anchor on an ongoing basis are the Syrian ports, Latakia, Tartus and Banias. The toppling of the Assad regime by NATO might bring to power a western-leaning regime, and Russia will lose its special privileges in Syria.

However, it is important to bear in mind that Europe is also invested economically in Iran: thousands of European companies, mainly in Germany, France and Italy, are up to their necks in investments of many billions in Iranian industry, and not just in oil, so a European attack on Syria might have the same effect on these investments as the attack on Iraq did eight years ago: flush them down the drain, and the European economy will suffer a hard blow as a result.

The economic crisis in China that might result from a war in the Gulf will also have an influence on the economy of the United States, because China lent many billions to the United States in recent years in order to support the White House in its efforts to stabilize the American economy. A crisis in China might cause China to demand the States to pay its debt or China may raise the interest on it. A scenario such as this might bring to an end the efforts of the American administration to improve the American economy, which might, in turn, damage U.S. President Barack Obama's chances for re-election.

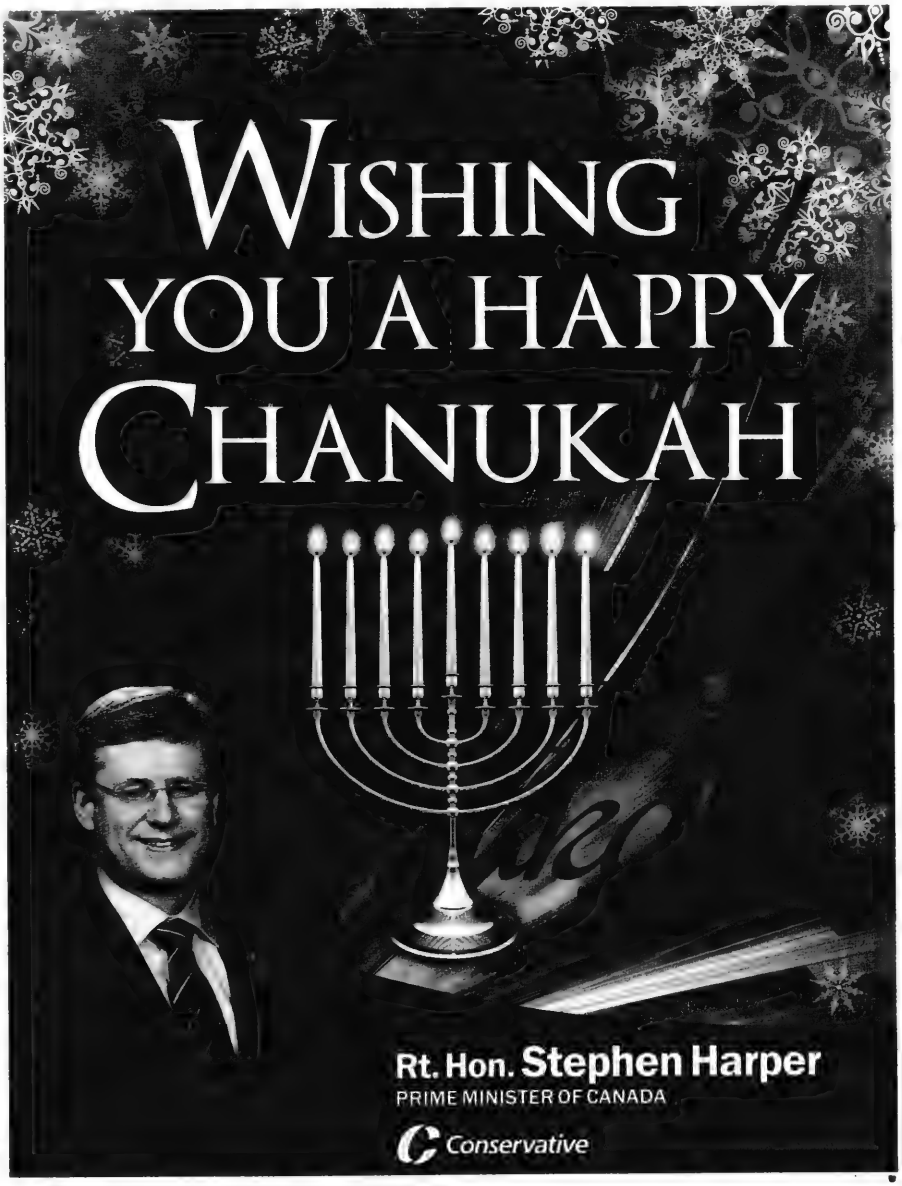
Vladimir Putin, Prime Minister of Russia, continues to provide support to Syria.



Fall of Syria may influence Israel as well

The great rise in oil prices will worsen the economic situation of Third World countries, especially Egypt and the African countries. The worsening economic situation in these countries will increase the stream of emigrants to Europe and to Israel; this will place an extra burden on the European economy, which is suffering to begin with.

The fall of the Syrian regime may influence Israel as well. On one hand, it will result in the partitioning of Syria into a number of countries: Kurdish in the north, Alawite in the west, Druze in the south, Bedouin in the east and two more in Damascus and Aleppo, which have never had great love between them. This partition will improve the mood in the area, due to the departure of an illegitimate regime that has castigated Israel for years in order to unite all of the groups under Assad's aegis. But the fall of the regime might also create difficult problems: a) weapons belonging to the Syrian army might get into the hands of Hezbollah and other terror organizations who have representation in Syria, and b) the worsening struggle between the regime and the citizens in Syria might cause thousands of Syrians to request refuge – perhaps only temporary – in the Golan Heights.

It would be important for Israel to grant them refuge, both for humanitarian reasons and also in order to create a good rapport with the Syrian people. But refugees don't always return to their country of origin, especially if the situation has not stabilized, and that might be a dangerous precedent regarding the Palestinian refugees: how would Israel be able to explain the fact that it accepts Syrian refugees of the year 2011 but refuses to accept Palestinian refugees who were – according to the claim – residents, before 1948, of the land that subsequently became the State of Israel?

The fall of the Syrian regime might cause the Alawites to take revenge on anyone who helped to overthrow their regime. They may send terror groups to carry out attacks in Turkey, Europe and the United States, to add another concern to the list of worries concerning Europe these days.

Iran, which is worried about what's going on in Syria, is increasing the pressure on Iraq, which has the majority of Shiites, to take on the role of Iran's Trojan horse inside the Arab nation, especially after the U.S. army completes its withdrawal. There are signs lately that this is Iran's intention, mainly because of the series of recent visits in Iraq of U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden, which is meant to stabilize a pro-American government that will reject Iranian pressures. The United States wants to retain bases in Iraq, which will serve as sources of intelligence in case of war with Iran, but the Iraqi government objects. This objection increases the American fear of an Iranian takeover of Iraq, because this would be an additional step in Iran's overall goal to take over the rest of the Gulf countries, with Saudi Arabia heading the list.

One sad conclusion that arises is that the motives that drive the world today are economic and military interests, not ethics nor human rights. The UN, which was established in the wake of World War II, in order to prevent a similar occurrence, does not do anything in order to stop the butchering of thousands of Syrians, which might deteriorate into a multi-national crisis. This crisis may quickly develop after the freedom-loving Syrian people overthrow the bloodthirsty dictator who inherited Syria from his father, who, in his turn, took control of their lives and deaths 41 years ago.

The responsibility for this ongoing butchering of Syrians lies with Assad and his army, police security organizations and the Shabbiha gangs; Iran, Hezbollah, Russia and China, which support the Syrian regime, while the rest of the world so far only condemns.

The fall of the Syrian regime may create a series of earthquakes with a regional and global scope, and its ripples may arrive to Iran, the Gulf, China, Russia, Europe, the United States and even Israel. World leaders are well aware of the physical law, "Water seeks its own level," and this is the very reason that the world is reluctant to give the Syrian regime what it deserves. This is another price that "les misérables" pay for globalization: a shock in one place is felt well in many other places, and the Syrians are paying the price in blood for the economic interests of many countries. Nevertheless, and despite the dangers, the world without the dark and bloodthirsty regime of Syria will be a better place, and if it will be possible for the regime of the Iranian Ayatollahs to join Assad in his final resting place, the world will surely be better, calmer and far less dangerous.

A Chanukah story

Special to The CJN

Harry Samson took the Chanukah lamp out of the cabinet and stood resolutely in the middle of the living room. "Tonight I'm going to light the candles by the front window," he announced to his wife.

He watched his wife's eyes move away from her book and up to his face. "You've always lit them in the kitchen," she said.

"Not always. You remember in New York…"

"These past four years have not been New York."

Harry paced the living-room floor. "For once I don't want to hide it. So this is a hick town in the South. So what! The lights are supposed to be seen for many reasons. As a reminder to a passing stranger. For everyone to see how the Jewish spirit manifested itself over tyranny."

By Curt Leviant

His wife, Vera, understood. Still, she said, "But we're the only Jews here. Who will you inspire?" Harry curled his fingers around the lamp. "No more hiding. This is a holiday of lights. A light in the darkness is no light at all."

They looked at each other in silence, absorbing the words and feeling the loneliness of four years of isolation. In the small town in Georgia, even the people's names were so Anglo-Saxon that you couldn't even have the pleasure of conjecture – maybe, maybe he's a Jew. Scattered in the nearby towns were a few Jewish families, but not nearly enough to shape a community.

So the Samson home became synagogue and house of study combined. But a house of meeting it could never be. On the horizon stood the day when Harry and Vera would be able to leave town, when Harry would have a teaching job in the big city. There they wouldn't be island-dwellers. There they would participate once more in communal life. Still, Harry persuaded himself that the gifts of the spirit were everywhere.

Their neighbours were silent, distant people. Like Fire Chief Brown across the street, estranged not only from the Samsons but from his other neighbours as well. A silent, brooding man looking as if some kind of guilt rode perpetually on his shoulders. Never close to anyone, he just did his job. Harry's other neighbours, too, were polite but distant friends. And so the Samsons' companionship was centred around the faculty of his school, from whom they sustained their social and intellectual nourishment.

It was the first night of Ḥanukah. As on each holiday, their aloneness was accentuated by the starkness of no one sharing their joy. Harry carried the candle-holder and placed it on the window sill facing the street. He put the first candle into position and lit it with the shamash candle. He sang the blessings sweetly, looking at his wife. Her eyes were focused on the flame, as if seeking out its mystery.

Harry's hand shook as he passed the flame to the candle. He waited anxiously for the next day.

Business on the street as usual. He taught his classes in basic chemistry; his wife ran their little arts and crafts shop; the world remained a tiny norm. That evening, Harry Samson lit the second candle. Still the quiver of the flame reflected in his mind. Soon someone would inquire. He was impatient for someone to ask – "Why?"

A light in the darkness

The next day a question was asked.

Fire Chief Brown stopped him on the street, saying, "Excuse me, Mr. Samson, but, uh, can you tell me where you buy those little candles? The ones you were burning in your window last night."

Harry expected him to ask, "Why?" Instead he asked, "Where?" But Harry was ready with an answer.

"You can't get them here." Harry forced a laugh. "You get them 10 miles out in the supermarket. You know. A few Jewish families are scattered around there."

Harry watched Mr. Brown's face. His lips didn't form the word Why? In that case, Harry would ask him, "Why did you want to know, Mr. Brown?"

"Thought I would test them for... fire hazard, quick burning quality, and, uh, we can't be too careful, you know."

They both laughed, Harry again exploding the artificial smile into a laugh. "Yes, you can get them at the supermarket," he repeated foolishly.

When he told his wife the story, she laughed and said, "Maybe he's Jewish."

Harry joined in with the joke. "Maybe I'm a fire chief." But underneath his tongue the words were forming: What will he really do with them?

Two days later, he saw some men talking on the street. They were huddled together strangely. He couldn't hear what they were saying and his sensitive mood imagined the worst. "He packs a powerful wallop," said one man, raising his fist. But then he heard, "That guy is some boxer."

Chanukiyah and candles

He walked by the firehouse, purposely, wanting to meet Mr. Brown, wanting to bring the situation to its inevitable conclusion. He saw him standing there, an intense look on his round face, the lips puffed out, the eyes half closed. He was about to say something. Harry signalled his attention by lifting his head upwards in a half nod.

He'll tell me about the fire hazard. And I'll have to remove the candles from the window. But Mr. Brown was silent. He just looked at Harry, made another motion, as if to walk toward him, but then walked slowly back into the shaded firehouse, his hands in his pockets.

The continued silence of the town hung heavily like a curtain over Harry's mind. By the fourth night, he was ready to remove the candles from the window. All he needed was an official excuse. His zeal had done nothing but set him on edge. His wife noticed it. And maybe she was right. All this would have been fine in a Jewish community. But here? Here it was just stubbornness. His wife's thoughts were now, somehow and mysteriously, his own. With each lit candle, his head buzzed with vague fears. Something had to come.

'Another miracle'

It was slowly building up. He knew it. He breathed it in the air of the streets. He saw it in the looks of the people's eyes. He heard it in the rumblings of daily life.

As soon as he finished lighting the fourth night's candles he resolved, "This is the last night." As if confirming his decision, the phone rang. There it is, he thought. He stood watching the candles as his wife answered the phone. The little flames leaped higher and higher and disappeared into the air. Yet more flames always sprang up from the wick. Thus our people against the tyrants, he thought. He let his eyes relax, filling them with light, filling his whole being with the warmth of the light.

"It's for you, Harry." His heart bounced with the leaping flames.

"This is Fire Chief Brown," he heard the voice say. Get those candles off the window, he thought. But instead a soft voice said, "Do those candles have to burn in the window?"

Very subtle, thought Harry. "How do you mean?" Harry's voice was not his own. The cords in his throat tightened as he spoke. The sound was in a higher, odder pitch. He swallowed.

Mr. Brown continued. "Is it part of the religious ceremony to do that?"

Come out with it, Harry thought, and tell. Don't play with me. Don't keep me in suspense. Tell me now. "Let me explain the significance of the candles, Mr. Brown."

Harry was cut short. "If you don't mind, just tell me, is it better if they burn in view?"

"Yes," Harry's thoughts exploded. "It is better if they are seen, if they communicate their message to the others…"

"Good. That's all I wanted to know. The message was communicated. Thank you." And click – the phone was dead. Harry looked at the mouthpiece for a while and set it back.

"What's the matter, Harry?" his wife asked. She stretched her hand out to him. He took her warm hand into his and felt his fingers trembling against hers. The nervousness leaped into her with the touch. "What is it? What did he say?" the edge of her lips quivered. "You're all upset."

"I don't understand, Vera. He said, 'The message was communicated.'"

"Harry," Vera said softly. "Since you started this candlelighting in the window you haven't been the same. You worry about every word, every sound, every flame. Either go back to the privacy of the kitchen, or accept your own move."

Harry knew his wife was right, but still he felt that his wife was deserting him, by asking about it in the open, by verbalizing what had previously been unsaid. Gloomily he looked at the candles and at the street below, scanning the houses across the street mechanically.

His mind was playing tricks again. Two of his four candles had gone out already. In the window opposite his, symbolically enough in Mr. Brown's window, the reflection of his Chanukah lights were shining. He looked at their reflection. Suddenly he called his wife.

"Come quickly. I'm having a vision."

Vera came running, afraid something was wrong with him.

"Look. Look across the street. In Mr. Brown's window."

She held her breath. They couldn't believe it. A living reflection.

Strangely, a third candle appeared to be shining in Mr. Brown's window, while only two remained in Harry's window.

"He's kindling Chanukah lights," Harry shouted. "Vera, do you know what that means? Chanukah lights by Mr. Brown?"

Across the street, the lit candle illumined Mr. Brown's shadowy, brooding features, and the flickering flames cast a glow on his face as he lit the fourth candle.

"A light from the darkness," Vera whispered. "Another miracle."

Iran was the topic of discussion

Amir Oren

Comment

Is it possible that the half-hour meeting last Friday at the Gaylord Hotel in National Harbor, Md., between U.S. President Barack Obama and Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak will be remembered in Israel's history as the moment at which Obama gave the green light to Barak – for better or for worse – to attack Iran?

Can this be seen as a sort of flashback to the talk between then-defence minister Ariel Sharon and U.S. secretary of state Alexander Haig in Washington in May 1982, that gave rise to the (mistaken) Israeli impression that there was an understanding with the United States over going to war in Lebanon?

Barak's entourage was tight-lipped upon returning to Israel Sunday. It made no comment. Of course, the members of the delegation would only know what they heard from one side of the Obama-Barak meeting, but such a secret could not be disclosed, even in a whisper. First, it would be reported to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

A meeting between an Israeli defence minister and a U.S. president can be held for three reasons: to convey to the president confidential military or diplomatic information; to try to convince the president to change his policy, or to figure out whether the president has been convinced to make some move or another.

The essence of such a meeting is the hope that the president will be influenced. If Barak hoped to convince Obama about attacking Iran in the coming months, there is still no sign that he succeeded. One shouldn't make light, however, of the American president's willingness to meet the defence minister.

Over the past several weeks, Barak has spoken to the top diplomatic and military leadership in the Obama administration: Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, Defence Secretary Leon Panetta and national security adviser Tom Donilon.

Cirque to Israel

MONTREAL — Quebec's world-renowned Cirque du Soleil will perform in Israel for the first time in its 27-year history. Its show, Alegría, will be presented at Tel Aviv's Nokia Arena Aug. 8 to 18. Alegría (the Spanish word for joy) has been touring internationally since its creation in 1994 and has been seen by 10 million people. It's described as "a baroque ode to the energy, grace and power of youth." Its theme is the passage of time, interpreted through acrobatic choreography, music and humour. Its cast of 55 don more than 400 different costumes. Israeli producer Shuki Weiss said it took much discussion to bring the troupe to Israel because it wanted assurances that its high technical standards could be met.

$8.5 Million Bequest

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Foundation of Manitoba has received an $8.5-million bequest from the estate of local philanthropist David Silverberg, who died in 2009. The gift creates a fund in memory of Silverberg, his parents and brothers. The endowment will support local hospitals, agencies, synagogues and Jewish community groups, primarily in Winnipeg and Israel. Silverberg was born in Winnipeg in 1913 to immigrant parents. An electrical engineer by training, he spent many years designing airports in Manitoba. The Jewish Foundation of Manitoba manages an endowment fund exceeding $70 million and has distributed more than $30 million in grants and scholarships.

Imam Criticized For Nazi Comparison

CALGARY — A Calgary imam's comparison of the plight of Muslims in Canada to that of Jews in Nazi Germany has been denounced by Jewish officials.

Earlier this month, Imam Syed Soharwardy likened Canada's new policy of banning Islamic face veils at citizenship ceremonies to what Jews faced in the 1930s in Germany.

Imam Syed Soharwardy

"We categorically reject his comparison with the society of today and pre-war Germany," said Jeffrey Smith of the Calgary Jewish Community Council. "It's factually wrong and insensitive, and if you start to compare the Canadian government's policies with Nazi policies, it's unwarranted, misleading and hurtful."

But a day after his remarks to a reporter, Imam Soharwardy added to them. "What is happening across North America is quite alarming because there are people who create hate against Muslims and then the government gives them ammunition," said Imam Soharwardy, president of the Islamic Supreme Council of Canada. "This is what started hate against Jews."

The imam's comments came a few days after Ottawa announced a ban on niqabs, burkas and other face-coverings at citizenship ceremonies.

WORLD

Noted Feminist Dies

NEW YORK — Noted Jewish feminist Paula Hyman, who served as the first female dean of the Seminary College of Jewish Studies at the Jewish Theological Seminary, died Dec. 15 at age 65 of cancer. She was the Lucy Moses Professor of Modern Jewish History at Yale University, a position she held for 25 years. Hyman served as dean of the Seminary College of Jewish Studies from 1981 to 1986, as well as an associate professor of history at the Jewish Theological Seminary. She published extensively on topics such as Jewish gender issues, modern European and U.S. Jewish history, and Jewish women's history as well as feminism and several books on French Jewry. She was a founder in 1971 of Ezrat Nashim, a group of Conservative Jewish women who lobbied for changes in the movement's attitude toward women, including ordaining them as rabbis and inclusion in a minyan.

A Chanukah Reminder
from
Steeles Memorial Chapel

For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.

Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.

If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.

It's amazing how a little love and caring can make such a big difference.

Legitimacy questions continue to plague CIJA

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

As 2011 draws to a close, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) continues to face questions about its composition and legitimacy, and about why it mothballed Canadian Jewish Congress.

From 2004 until this year, CIJA had been known as the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy and was the umbrella organization that oversaw most of the national Jewish communal organizations in Canada.

Following a re-launch earlier this year, CIJA consolidated and took over as the primary advocate for community and Israel-related issues by assuming the roles previously held by Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the University Outreach Committee and the Quebec-Israel Committee, among others.

Rabbi Philip Scheim

Since then, a re-branded CIJA has been working to implement a mandate that it says will engage people at the grassroots level, as well as in already established institutions, for the betterment of the Jewish community.

But supporters of the 90-year-old CJC are still asking questions about CIJA's accountability and representativeness.

Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue and a member of The CJN's Toronto advisory board, said he's particularly concerned about the issue.

"It is not clear to me who CIJA represents. Unlike Congress, whose officers were elected by a body representing organizations and communities across Canada, CIJA seems to be a self-appointed body, beholden only to a very small group of extremely influential backers. This transformation is a major defeat for democracy in the Canadian Jewish community," Rabbi Scheim said.

In early August, CIJA nominated its inaugural board of directors. At the time it described this process as "anomalous" to its first operating year, but CIJA officials now say that the practice will continue.

The CIJA board nominating committee – led by CIJA chair Steven Cummings and founding member Larry Tanenbaum – chose the first 25 board members based on "geography, gender balance, age, partisan affiliation, knowledge of the Jewish community, experience within or engagement with the political sector and the like."

Going forward, CIJA will drop its board size to a maximum of 21 people, but retain its methodology for the selection process, as outlined in the organization's bylaws, CEO Shimon Fogel told The CJN.

"In terms of appointments, the process is the same in both circumstances. A nominations committee appointed by the [board] members meets and recommends a slate to the membership for approval. There is no set formula for board appointments. Rather, all are ad personam appointments."

The original 25 board members are Steven Cummings, immediate past-chair; David Koschitzky, chair designate; Stanley Plotnick, a founding member of CIJA; Toronto businessman Morris Perlis; Montreal lawyer Eric Maldoff; Jewish Federations of North America vice-chair Marylin Blumer; Austin Beutel, chair of Astral Media's corporate governance committee; Paul Goldman, a Vancouver lawyer; Liberal candidate for Dartmouth-Cole Harbour Mike Savage;

Memoir as literature

From the editor's desk...

Over the past two decades, spurred in North America by the efforts of people such as Steven Spielberg and the Shoah Foundation he established and in Israel by a reinvigorated Yad Vashem, survivors have been urged, in ways that in the four decades after the war were mostly unthinkable, to tell their stories.

The youngest teenage survivor of the Nazis' genocide would today be an octogenarian, or nearly so. And the record of his or her extreme suffering in the murderous maw of the Nazi monster would most likely be known, if at all, to family and perhaps friends.

Eli Pfefferkorn is one such survivor. A teenager in 1945, he trod through the chaos and disorientation of liberation through a new world that led him to England, Israel, the United States and Canada.

An accomplished man of letters, Pfefferkorn acquired a doctorate in literature from Brown University, taught at Haifa, Tel Aviv and Brown universities, worked as a literary critic in Israel and served as director of research at the United States Holocaust Memorial Council. He also brought his considerable knowledge and abilities to the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, where he taught for a number of years.

But he never told his story – except in small pieces that revealed more than they disclosed – even to family and friends. Until now.

This year Academic Studies Press published Pfefferkorn's memoir. Titled The Muselmann at the Water Cooler, the book is an arresting reading experience both for the manner in which Pfefferkorn writes and the conclusions that he conveys.

Not surprisingly, given his adult life-long dedication at the personal and scholarly level to writing, drama, poetry and prose, Pfefferkorn is a superb literary craftsman and stylist.

His book is truly memoir as literature.

Indeed, some of the passages are so carefully, so powerfully constructed they are magnetic in their emotional pull. Using the sharp instruments of his superior ability to observe and his stellar command of a broad vocabulary, Pfefferkorn has sculpted in finely chiselled relief the stunning details of his survival to this very day.

For example, he describes the roll call at Majdanek. "Picture this: the vesper Appell was in the making. I found a spot close to my barrack. The smell of soup wafted into my nostrils, quickening the acid cruising in my entrails. And just a fraction of an instant before dismissal or a fraction after, I must have stepped out of the line, incurring the wrath of an inmate functionary. The punishment came as quickly as lightning. Bruised and hurting, I shuffled to the barracks with the tail end of the column. My fellow inmates kept on slouching towards the soup vat, oblivious to what was happening around them: an ordinary occurrence in a day's existence. To view the beating of a boy endangered their fragile sanity. I learned this from my own encounter with the brutality inflicted on other inmates."

Pfefferkorn is a rare, honest writer who is as unsparing on himself as he occasionally is on others. He comments, for example, on his lapse in judgment after having written a critique of the Jewish studies program in Providence, R.I.

"I was into my second year of graduate studies and we intended to return to Israel as soon as I was done, so why would I want to badmouth the good people of Providence. They had greeted us with such a welcome basket... and despite their generosity, I criticized their institutions of education."

Throughout the deeply charged pages of the book Pfefferkorn returns continually and consistently to his belief about human nature and human survivorship in situations that he describes as in extremis, of which of course the Shoah is the most paradigmatic.

"I found that the human realities of the concentration camp bore a close resemblance to the real world." The survival of the fittest, or "Darwinism," to use Pfefferkorn's recurring terminology, was the sociological, anthropological, psychological predictor of human survival in the world created by the Nazis.

"After liberation, hunger vanished from my life, but the flaws of human nature persist."

Despite his own views, however, Pfefferkorn also acknowledges and even marvels that not all survivors drew the same conclusions as did he about man's essential nature.

Even unto the very last line, Pfefferkorn remains true to his uninhibited, exacting self-inquiry. "And when mine [my life] ends, will my memoir survive to keep on telling the story? And has it been worth it?"

For this reader, the answer rushes forward without hesitation, without equivocation. To be sure, the book is hard reading, but it is so stunningly written it is almost required reading.

Gay-straight alliance club launched at CHAT

Frances Kraft and Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporters

Earlier this month, the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Wallenberg campus held the first meeting of its new gay-straight alliance.

Unlike most of the school's clubs, which are initiated by students, Keshet – the Gay/Straight Alliance was started by Ali Aber, a guidance counsellor, and Josh Sable, co-director of student activities. They are serving as staff advisers.

Paul Shaviv

"Because no students had approached us, Ali and I thought it was important for us to initiate it," Sable told The CJN.

Part of the impetus was last month's news that Ottawa teen Jamie Hubley committed suicide after he was bullied for being gay, "and our concern that nothing like that ever happen here," Aber said.

Staff, students and parents who have been in contact with her and Sable about the group have been "really positive" about it, she said. About a dozen students turned up for the Dec. 6 meeting, and others have expressed interest in coming to the next meeting in January, Sable said.

He added that "the ultimate goal is to create or maintain an environment in the school that promotes acceptance and tolerance."

"And a feeling of safety for everybody," Aber said. "We have a very strongly worded bullying policy in our handbook, and we do take that very seriously."

Although it's not mandated by the school, several staff members have posted notices telling lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) students that they are in a "positive space," Aber said.

She and Sable noted that, in general, the 740 students at the campus "are really great" in terms of being accepting, respectful and helpful. However, Sable qualified, "at any school, there are exceptions to that."

The formation of the group is a first for the school, but according to Paul Shaviv, the school's director of education, "there was a move to establish" a similar group at the school's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan a year or so ago. It "never came to anything," he said. "The students didn't go forward."

Shaviv said he encouraged the formation of the new group after being approached about it recently.

Several years ago, Shaviv noted, the winning entry in a short film festival at the school was a student documentary "about the issues around being gay at CHAT." The film was shown at the final staff meeting that year, Aber mentioned.

Shaviv said the formation of the gay-straight alliance has nothing to do with new anti-bullying legislation introduced in Ontario earlier this month that called on school boards to address bullying and support gender equality and gay-straight alliances. However, he added, "obviously it resonates with the spirit and the letter of the proposed act."

A coalition of traditional Catholic and Jewish groups has denounced the Accepting Schools Act, calling it a front for a "radical sex education" agenda.

The act urges elementary and secondary schools in Ontario to enforce anti-bullying policies, and to possibly expel students who engage in abusive behaviour. It also encourages school boards to support gay-straight alliances.

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, spiritual leader of Chabad @ Flamingo, told The CJN last week that he was concerned that the sex-education component "encroaches on the religious freedoms guaranteed to all Canadians."

"[The bill] further calls for children to be indoctrinated to reject the faith of their parents and the family values they have been taught," Rabbi Kaplan said.

Joanne Cummings, a clinical child psychologist who is also a director at PREVNet – a national network of researchers that works to put information and statistics about violence prevention into practice – said she is "very much in favour" of the new legislation.

She said there was a national climate survey release earlier this year by Egale Canada, a national LGBT human rights organization, that found 64 per cent of students who were LGBT or had LGBT parents, "experienced higher levels of bullying and harassment."

"They also found that in schools that do have gay-straight alliances – as well as explicit policies addressing homophobic bullying – students feel much more comfortable and safe," Cummings said.

"More and more, gay youth are coming out in their high school years, and they really need support."

Cummings added she doesn't think private religious schools should be excluded from embracing the Accepting Schools Act.

"I understand the legislation tried to be sensitive and said that the gay-straight alliances don't have to be called gay-straight alliances, but acceptance and tolerance are important Jewish values."

Of course, bullying is an issue for straight students, too. Based on research conducted by PREVNet, in a classroom of 35 students, between four and six children are bullying and/or are being bullied.

Labour ministry rules mashgichim employees

Supervisors are entitled to overtime, travel time

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

The Ontario Labour Relations Board has ruled that two former kashrut supervisors were employees of the Kashruth Council of Canada and therefore entitled to overtime and travel time according to the terms of the Employment Standards Act (ESA).

As reported in The CJN in August, the Kashruth Council, which oversees the COR certification, had asserted that the role of mashgiach is a "religious office," meaning the ESA would not apply. The exemption allows clergy to work long, irregular hours without necessarily being compensated on a per-hour basis.

Morley Rand and his son, Michael Rand, both former COR mashgichim (supervisors), petitioned the Ministry of Labour to be paid in accordance with the ESA for overtime and travel time. They oppose current compensation practices that the Kashruth Council insists are "over and above the legal standards."

Ontario law generally requires overtime after an employee has worked 44 hours in a single week. In 2008, the Kashruth Council began paying time and a half for public holidays and shifts over ten hours. This means, as Morley Rand told The CJN in August, that mashgichim sometimes work up to 60 hours a week without overtime, as long as no shift lasts a minute longer than 10 hours. Rand was employed by The Kashruth Council for 23 years.

OLRB vice-chair Brian McLean applied precedents in Quebec and the United States to determine the role of the mashgiach, as well as to determine the Rands' relationship with the Kashruth Council.

In this case, McLean wrote, "While they have some freedom in how they carry out their respective functions, there is also oversight – both from an employment perspective and a religious perspective – which lead me to conclude they are not religious office holders." For instance, the Kashruth Council assigned mashgichim to work with particular clients, meaning the Rands had no say in where they would work.

The decision doesn't rule out the possibility that some mashgichim could indeed be considered religious office holders, but it unequivocally rules that in the Rands' case, the ESA should apply.

Previously, the Kashruth Council had stated that "the mashgiach is the supervisor and authority on all kosher matters in the establishment" as proof of the spiritual nature of the job. But McLean wrote that the centrality of kashrut in Judaism "cannot transform individuals who are described as employees, directed and treated like employees, paid and engaged as employees, into the holders of religious office."

The Kashruth Council, which employs about 150 mashgichim, told The CJN in a written statement last week that "the decision will have no repercussions for mashgichim, because the Kashruth Council's remuneration policy has always been, and continues to be, in full compliance with the Employment Standards Act 2000."

This stance may rely in part on a 2010 case unrelated to the present hearings in which the Ministry of Labour determined that the Kashruth Council's overtime policy provides a "great right or benefit" under the provisions of the ESA.

Neither of the Rands wished to comment on the ruling to The CJN before this issue went to press.

The decision regarding mashgiach status is one of an ongoing series of cases between the Rands and the Kashruth Council. Future decisions are expected on issues concerned with actual unpaid wages, overtime and travel time owing.

Beth Tzedec chooses non-COR caterer

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Beth Tzedec Congregation has become the first major shul in the GTA to select a caterer that is certified as kosher by Badatz Toronto, a kashrut supervisory agency formed in 2008.

Beth Tzedec Congregation recently selected its new exclusive caterer, Applause Catering, which is poised to take over the kitchen in January, ending not only Beth Tzedec's three-year contract with caterer Zuchter Berk, but also its long relationship with the Kashruth Council of Canada, which oversees the COR certification.

Applause is certified by Badatz Toronto, which is led by rabbis Amram Assayag and Moshe Bensalmon.

Choosing a kosher caterer was extremely important to Beth Tzedec, said synagogue president Carolyn Kolers, but the decision didn't hinge on which agency was involved. "That was not a criterion at all," she said.

Applause was one of several caterers, including Zuchter Berk, that made presentations to Beth Tzedec – North America's largest Conservative synagogue, with some 2,700 member families – in a process that took several months to complete.

"This was not a choice between kosher certifications," Kolers said, listing several factors that led to the choice of Applause, such as the desire to find a caterer who would operate on-site – Zuchter Berk has a large off-site commissary where most food preparation is done – and, of course, flavour. As a leading contender, Applause was invited to present a taste test to the board, which it apparently aced.

The selection of the new caterer engendered some controversy when an e-mail earlier this fall from the Kashruth Council to its board members implied the community would not be well served by the appointment of a Badatz-certified caterer at the synagogue.

The Kashruth Council subsequently sent a second e-mail in which CEO Rabbi Tuvia Basser admitted his regret at the "lack of precision" in his initial e-mail, and retracting the implication that Beth Tzedec would choose a caterer that did not uphold "a high standard of kashrus."

In a statement to The CJN, the Kashruth Council explained that "our intention was to allow for Beth Tzedec to continue offering its catering facilities to the full range of the kosher community, including those who only feel comfortable eating from COR-supervised establishments… frankly, we are hurt by any false allegation that we don't have the best interests of the community at heart."

Badatz's Moti Bensalmon, Rabbi Bensalmon's son, said Badatz did not get involved beyond sending out a brief clarification e-mail. "Beth Tzedec put out a tender, then decided on their own who was best for them," Moti Bensalmon said.

Beth Tzedec's spiritual leader Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl investigated Badatz's kosher standards thoroughly. "It was [Rabbi Frydman-Kohl's] belief and it is our belief that Badatz oversees kashrut to the… highest degree," Kolers said. "We want anyone who is kosher… to feel comfortable eating in our synagogue."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

Until now, Badatz – which recently collaborated with Montreal's MK kashrut agency and other kashrut organizations across Canada to form a new kosher food safety initiative – had been supervising commercial factories and catering halls, Moti Bensalmon said.

Zuchter Berk, meanwhile, continues to provide services to Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Sephardic Kehila Centre, Beth Radom Congregation, the Kiever Congregation and Kehilat Shaarei Torah Synagogue, as well as community centres, event venues, hospitals and airlines.

Jay Stochinsky, one of four partners in Applause Catering, says "Rabbi Bensalmon has very high standards. He worked for COR for 23 years." All the partners have been impressed with his "professionalism, the honourable way he dealt with us."

Stochinsky said that, having worked as a mashgiach (kosher supervisor) with the Kashruth Council himself, "I know their standards," and Badatz's are comparable.

However, of Beth Tzedec's ultimate decision, Applause partner Cary Silber said, "they weren't interviewing a kashrut service – they were interviewing a caterer."

"Their goal is to give their members an opportunity to have really great food in the shul," Silber said.

Kolers admitted the decision shows there's room for more than one kashrut organization. "We're acknowledging that there's a second hashgachah. But it was not about us wanting to see Badatz succeed or not succeed, or COR be harmed or not."

A seasonal reminder of a timeless obligation

Many of our schools will soon be closed for a couple of weeks of rest and recovery. The teachers and administrators who transform the classrooms and the buildings from schools to places of learning and attachment will be deservedly at ease, at least for a few days. And the students, too, deserve a break from the regimen of rules that comprise the discipline of study.

It is an opportune time, therefore, with gratitude to the people who facilitate the education of our children, to reflect upon and reinforce the urgency of a special plea to the Jewish Diaspora communities made some three weeks ago by Israel's Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman in the pages of The CJN.

"The most urgent challenge jointly facing Israel and Jewish communities worldwide is that of ensuring Jewish continuity," Lieberman stated. "It cannot be emphasized enough how important – indeed critical – this issue is for both Israel and world Jewry," he added. Appealing to the entirety of the Jewish communities around the world, he wrote, "It is our joint responsibility and duty to ensure the continuation of a strong Jewish identity."

Lieberman framed the need to ensure the continuation of a strong Jewish identity, in part, as a response to what he referred to as the "symbiosis" of the "persistent scourge of antisemitism and the particularly dangerous overlap between antisemitism and anti-Israel sentiment."

We would frame that need in broader terms.

The goals of ensuring Jewish continuity, Jewish identity, a sense of peoplehood and a desire to belong to this uniquely ancient-and-modern people derive from the very beauty and fulfilment of doing so. Experiencing and passing forward that sense of fulfillment is itself the best response to antisemitism.

But if he stated the objective of ensuring continuity and identity too narrowly, he was quite accurate regarding the means of doing so. "Nothing is more crucial to advancing this goal than Jewish education," Lieberman wrote.

We wholeheartedly agree with him.

Jewish education – in all its many manifestations, but especially comprehensive day school – must be the highest priority on the agenda of Diaspora communities.

It must occupy the best and brightest minds of the community, lay and professional, across organizational divides. And since the scope of the challenge exceeds the abilities of any single organization to provide solutions, the entire range of community organizations and concerned community members should now be conscripted to find a way to respond to the challenge with the breadth and effectiveness necessary for our children and, indeed, for the Jewish people.

Bullying

I read the article "Winnipeg Jewish teen assaulted, burned" (cjnews.com, Dec. 8), about a male high school student who tried to light a Jewish girl's hair on fire in what was referred to as an act of antisemitic bullying and which prompted an outcry among Canadian Jewish leaders (also see "Two teens face hate crimes charges in Winnipeg incident" on page 24). Then I read "Jewish, Christian groups pan anti-bullying bill" (Dec. 15), about a Canadian Jewish leader who has "serious concerns" about the sex-education component in the proposed Ontario anti-bullying bill, which he "cannot, in good conscience, support [because it] is a law that calls on those of faith to abandon beliefs considered sacred all in the name of political correctness." I hope to read about other Canadian Jews who feel that it is wrong to condemn a despicable act of antisemitic persecution against a Jewish teenager one week and the next week slam legislation to prevent despicable acts of persecution against a gay teenager. If this is the faith that I am meant to be practising and passing on to my children, I want no part of it.

'Criticism' is a badge of honour

Mark Steyn, speaking at Holy Blossom Temple, targeted "a lot of Canadian Jews" and me specifically for our support of Canada's anti-hate laws and, most directly, human rights commissions in this country ("Author takes aim at 'western self-loathing,'" Dec. 8). Well, quite frankly, if that's the worst I have done, then I will take such "criticism" and wear it as a badge of honour. Why? Simple. I am proud to stand on the shoulders of human rights advocates that arose from the Ontario Jewish community – people such as Louis Lenkinski, Kalmen Kaplansky, Sidney Midanik, Ben Kayfetz and many others who worked hand in hand with anti-racist activists such as Bromley Armstrong and Daniel Hill to ensure that there was a proper fence of protection to shield vulnerable minorities from hate and discrimination. These Jewish community social justice advocates led the way in the development of Canada's first provincial human rights commission in Ontario.

Today, there is, for the most part, a much-needed and level-headed discussion pertaining to the efficacy of human rights legislation that targets hate speech. However, those like Steyn, who use this debate to advocate the full dismantling of our human rights apparatus instead of finding ways to make it better, do a terrible disservice to those who understand, as has the Supreme Court of Canada, that laws targeting hate speech are reasonable in a free and democratic society. Jews, of all people, understand full well how hatred, allowed to flourish, can become evil and destructive.

Disagrees with author

We don't agree with Hirsh Goodman, the author of The Anatomy of Israel's Survival, that Israel should give up the West Bank unilaterally if it can't come to an agreement with the Palestinians (Writer brings important Mideast issues to the table," Dec. 1). Look what happened in Gaza. You do not give the Arabs anything for nothing!

Takes exception to CJN 'even-handedness'

I am amazed that you chose to publish the letter "Disagrees with Goldstone" (Dec. 8), attacking Israel with the good old leftist cliché of "apartheid Israel," when you only have room for four letters. I would expect a Jewish paper to leave the "even-handedness" to the likes of the Toronto Star or the New York Times.

The Torah's place

It was a pleasure to read the article "Return Torah to its place of glory" (Chanukah supplement, Dec. 15), setting out the Torah as the source of spiritual wealth and meaning. Social activism or gastronomical Judaism cannot replace the Torah as a source of Jewish understanding and the reason for Jewish existence.

Revisionism, rejectionism and an Arab-Israeli peace

Irwin Cotler
Special to The CJN

While serving as a Canadian delegate to the annual inter-parliamentary hearing at the United Nations, I came across an exhibit marking the annual International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People whose organizing theme is the nakba –catastrophe – suffered by the Palestinian people, caused by the establishment of the State of Israel.

It is clear that the Palestinian people have suffered and continue to suffer – and that they did, indeed, suffer a nakba in 1948. But this is to confuse cause and consequence. And so the question: what, in fact, did occur some 64 years ago?

This past week marked the 64th anniversary of the UN Partition Resolution of Nov. 29, 1947, recommending the partition of then-Mandatory Palestine into a Jewish state and an Arab state. It is sometimes forgotten that this was the first-ever blueprint for a "two-state, two-people" solution.

It is tragic to appreciate that had the Partition Resolution been accepted 64 years ago, there would have been no Arab-Israeli war – no refugees, Jewish or Arab – and none of the pain and suffering experienced since. Indeed, we would today be celebrating the 64th anniversary of both the State of Israel and the State of Palestine.

The Jewish leadership accepted the resolution, but the Palestinian and Arab leadership did not, as they had a right to do. What they did not have a right to do was to attack the nascent Jewish state with the objective – as they acknowledged at the time – of initiating a "war of extermination." The result was, therefore, a double nakba: not only of Palestinian-Arab suffering and the creation of a Palestinian refugee problem, but also, with the assault on Israel and on Jews in Arab countries, the creation of a second, much less known, group of refugees – Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

The lesson that emerges, therefore, is not that the nakba was the result of the creation of the State of Israel. Rather, it was the result of the Palestinian and Arab leadership rejecting the UN resolution calling for the establishment of both a Jewish state and a Palestinian-Arab state, and launching a "rejectionist" war.

This "double rejectionism," where Arab leadership was prepared to forgo the establishment of a Palestinian state if it meant countenancing a Jewish state within any borders, not only found expression 64 years ago, but has underpinned the Arab-Israeli-Palestinian conflict ever since.

Yet, the revisionist Mideast narrative – which has found expression in this UN exhibit and is prejudicial to authentic reconciliation and peace between peoples as well as between states – continues to hold that there was only one victim population, Palestinian refugees, and that Israel was responsible for the Palestinian nakba of 1948.

And so the United Nations, once again, commemorated the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People on this 64th anniversary of the United Nations Partition Resolution by continuing to ignore the plight of Jewish refugees on this commemorative occasion – turning history and law on its head – while indulging and encouraging this Mideast revisionism.

Moreover, this revisionist narrative has not only eclipsed – and erased – the forgotten exodus from memory and remembrance, but it also denies that it was a forced exodus, and one that resulted from both double rejectionism and double aggression. This is the real nakba – the real double catastrophes.

Simply put, the Arab countries not only rejected a Palestinian state and went to war to extinguish the nascent Jewish state, they also targeted the Jewish nationals living in their respective countries, thereby creating two refugee populations – the Palestinian refugee population resulting from the Arab war against Israel, and the Jewish refugees resulting from the Arab war against its own Jewish nationals.

Indeed, evidence contained in a report titled Jewish Refugees from Arab Countries: The Case for Rights And Redress documents a pattern of state-sanctioned repression and persecution in Arab countries – including Nuremberg-like laws – that targeted its Jewish populations, resulting in denationalization, forced expulsions, illegal sequestration of property, arbitrary arrest and detention, torture and murder – namely, anti-Jewish pogroms. And while the internal Jewish narrative has often referred to pogroms as European attacks on their Jewish nationals, it has often ignored Arab-Muslim attacks on their Jewish nationals.

Moreover, as the report also documents, these massive human rights violations were not only the result of state-sanctioned patterns of oppression in each of the Arab countries, they were also reflective of a collusive blueprint, as embodied in the Draft Law of the Political Committee of the League of Arab States.

This is a story that needs to be heard. It is a truth that must now be acknowledged.

Regrettably, the United Nations also bears express and continuing responsibility for this distorted Middle East and peace narrative. Since 1948, there have been more than 150 UN resolutions that have specifically dealt with the Palestinian refugee plight. Yet, not one of these UN resolutions makes any reference to, nor is there any expression of concern for, the plight of the 850,000 Jews displaced from Arab countries. Nor have any of the Arab countries involved – or the Palestinian leadership involved – expressed any acknowledgement, let alone regret, for this pain and suffering, or for their respective responsibility for the pain and suffering.

How do we rectify this historical – and sustaining – injustice? What are the rights and remedies available under international human rights and humanitarian law? And what are the corresponding duties and obligations incumbent upon the United Nations, Arab countries and members of the international community?

What follows is a nine-point international human rights action agenda.

• First, it must be appreciated that while justice has long been delayed, it must no longer be denied. The time has come to rectify this historical injustice – and to restore to the Middle East narrative from which they have been expunged and eclipsed these 64 years – the plight and truth of the "forgotten exodus" of Jews from Arab countries.

• Second, remedies for victim refugee groups – including rights of remembrance, truth, justice and redress, as mandated under human rights and humanitarian law – must now be invoked for Jews displaced from Arab countries.

• Third, each of the Arab countries – and the Arab League, which has played a protective role in Libyan and Syrian aggressions – must acknowledge their role and responsibility in their double aggression of launching an aggressive war against Israel and the perpetration of human rights violations against their respective Jewish nationals. The culture of impunity must end.

• Fourth, the Arab League Peace Plan of 2002 – still held out as a blueprint for an Arab-Israeli peace – should incorporate the question of Jewish refugees from Arab countries as part of its narrative for an Israeli-Arab peace, just as the Israeli narrative now incorporates the issue of Palestinian refugees in its vision of an Israeli-Arab peace.

• Fifth, on the international level, the UN General Assembly – whose theme in the session in which I participated this past week was "political accountability" – in the interests of justice and equity, should include reference to Jewish refugees as well as Palestinian refugees in its annual resolutions; the UN Human Rights Council should address, as it has yet to do, the issue of Jewish as well as Palestinian refugees; UN agencies dealing with compensatory efforts for Palestinian refugees should also address Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

• Sixth, the annual Nov. 29 commemoration by the United Nations of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People should finally be transformed into an International Day of Solidarity for a Two-Peoples Two-State Solution – as the initial 1947 Partition Resolution intended – including solidarity with all refugees created by the Israeli-Arab conflict.

• Seventh, jurisdiction over Palestinian refugees should be transferred from UNRWA (the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East) to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. There was no justification then – and still less today – for the establishment of a separate body to deal only with Palestinian refugees, particularly when that body is itself compromised by its incitement to hatred, as well as its revisionist teaching of the Mideast peace and justice narrative.

• Eighth, any bilateral Israeli-Palestinian negotiations – which one hopes will presage a just and lasting peace – should include Jewish refugees as well as Palestinian refugees in an inclusive joinder of discussion.

• Ninth, during any and all discussions on the Middle East by the Quartet (United Nations, United States, European Union and Russia) and others, any explicit reference to Palestinian refugees should be paralleled by a reference to Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

The continuing exclusion and denial of rights and redress to Jewish refugees from Arab countries will only prejudice authentic negotiations between the parties and undermine the justice and legitimacy of any agreement.

Let there be no mistake about it. Where there is no remembrance, there is no truth; where there is no truth, there will be no justice; where there is no justice, there will be no reconciliation; and where there is no reconciliation, there will be no peace – which we all seek.

Poverty exists in our own backyard

"The poor you will always have with you" is not a very hopeful commentary on social justice and its efficacy in eradicating poverty.

A recent vacation took us to parts of Central America. It underscored, among other things, the truth of the truism about poverty; in fact, it illustrated, sadly, the extent to which such poverty exists.

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

Our cruise through the Panama Canal had various stops along the way. The oceans are beautiful, the wildlife close and varied, and the amenities of shipboard living beyond the necessities of life, unless you want to feed a whole village for a week on what is available daily.

And the contrasts between what we had available, and what we saw – shocking.

Guides at each port were there to show us the best of the town, but they also gave us scope to prowl among off-the-beaten-track areas. To go from Puerto Vallarta's tourist-laden waterfront to the old town up the hill is to walk from one century into another. Too, we knew that just a few kilometres away a drug war of incredible viciousness was being waged.

Not a surprise, that. After all, if you are a young man (overwhelmingly the issue is among young men) and you have the choice of hawking tchatchkes to the gringos for a few dollars, or having your pockets heavy with coin from the drug cartels, which would you choose?

There is no contest, believe me.

Poverty became even more visible in the shuks of Huatulco, Antigua and Cartagena. There, women walked about with baskets of fruit on their heads hoping that the tourists would, for a dollar, enjoy being photographed with "Mama." Others cried out to draw attention to their wares of carved animals, pottery, strings of beads, woven bags, pocketbooks and jewelry.

Men piled panama hats (during canal construction, the style became identified with Panama) on their heads and competed with one another to attract the tourists' attention. Street vendors served coconut milk, fruit and sugary drinks.

Of course, none of the vendors made much money. There were just too many of them all selling the same things.

Could I come away thinking that this poverty existed only in the other places, not in our own backyard? Clearly not. As this article was being written, news flashed across the country that yet another First Nations reserve had fallen so far into decline that the Red Cross – the Red Cross! – had to intervene, trailed by some red-faced government officials. Of course, we know that many reserves share this problem. One step forward has been announced: people on reserves can now own their own homes, which will create a new pride in ownership and the ability to take out loans to make needed improvements.

That would be one small step for on-reserve housing.

In British Columbia, the government has begun closing, not opening, housing for the homeless as winter begins.

Teachers in low-income neighbourhoods have been paying for school lunches and supplies out of their own pockets as British Columbia struggles with higher than 14 per cent child poverty. More than seven per cent of seniors live in poverty in British Columbia, which next to Quebec is the highest number in Canada.

I note also that Toronto is facing, according to The Globe and Mail, cuts to nutrition programs for children, to drug prevention, AIDS awareness and at-risk neighbourhoods (I quote from an editorial). Three homeless shelters will close in Toronto; the same will be true in Vancouver unless the city wins the battle being waged here, where homeless people sleep on sidewalks three blocks from my middle-class neighbourhood.

The Globe editorial called these cuts "not crushing." I guess that its editorial staff has enough income to give their kids breakfast and lunch money, unlike those in our inner cities where children come to school hungry, sleepy and ill-clothed. It depends, you see, on whose ox is being crushed.

We emptied our mental institutions and left those who were turfed out to their own devices, without support and counselling, without proper homes and treatment. It is no wonder that they now sleep in our doorways. So we give money and support to food banks, to holiday drives, to programs that deal daily with the misery of our downtown cores where the hapless and hopeless congregate.

The text is right: the poor we will always have with us. Whose fault is that?

Who owns what?

I wonder how we know or can prove that we own something. Is possession nine-tenths of the law?

Possession of a significant artwork has not been sufficient, even for prominent art galleries and museums. Proof of provenance is required, and it has been carefully and exhaustively investigated. Some were found to have been stolen by the Nazis. The serpentine process by which these treasures found their way to museums with certificates of varying degrees of authenticity is indicative of how difficult it is to prove legitimate ownership.

The Trial of Abraham's Faith* by Gustave Dore

I wonder, then, how hard it is to prove that we own the land we settle on. We take it for granted that we don't have to give it back to the indigenous peoples who lived here before any Europeans landed. Why is that? Why should some think others have to give back land if we do not?

How do we gain ownership?

Perhaps we are wrong to think that we can own such intangibles.

The story of Jacob's quest to become the leader of Abraham's legacy is instructive if perplexing. Even in the womb, legends tell us, there was a battle raging as to who would own the inheritance of Abraham and Isaac. In a society that followed the rules of primogeniture, there was no room for the Torah's vision of meritocracy.

Since he didn't win the race in the womb, Jacob would have to fight for the right to become like a first born. His attempt to buy the "first-born" leadership also failed. Esau sold it to him, but that didn't yield the fulsome ownership he sought. In the end, with his mother's counsel and help, he steals the right to be blessed as first born. But this path is bothersome as a model, to say the least. Did he steal or take as his own what had always been his from the first prophecy? Jacob owned the inheritance. He didn't steal it and didn't owe it to Esau. He only owed his father honesty.

However, we prefer to follow Abraham's example. Looking for a proper burial ground for his wife, Abraham seeks to pay for the land. He refuses the owner's offer of a gift. Why? We accept gifts all the time and assume the object gifted is ours. But Abraham declines knowing full well that with land there will always be the temptation to reclaim the gift, to, in effect, state: "I only gave it for a little while, for his lifetime or I did not really mean it." Gifts are not trustworthy for something that we need eternally. So Abraham made it clear that this piece of land was forever.

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

Strange that all these avenues of ownership seem lost to Israel at this point in time.

There is evidence of long-lasting Jewish presence in the land, including the territory east of the Jordan River. Not all of it, but much of it. Yet indigenous and continuous presence does not count. I have been told by friends that they will not visit me at my relatives' home in Gush Etzion. Why? That piece of land was long established as Jewish territory. In 1948, Jewish fighters were killed defending it. In 1967, the descendants went back to re-establish their homes there. Whose land is it?

If possession is good enough for the laws governing others, it should be for Israel, too. Israelis live on the land. Some of it was bought. Some of it was gifted or declared Jewish by the world powers through the United Nations. Some of it was possessed and expanded through warfare. The history of the world is written through such vehicles. Israel defended itself and won. So should it give away the land it established as its own through these various means?

Some have stated that Israel should give back the occupied land, since occupation is not good for Israel. War is not good for Israel. Rockets falling down on my nephews and nieces is not good. Neither is giving back land such as Gaza and seeing not one iota of change or difference. If that Gaza land return had yielded an improvement of conditions for Israel and the Palestinians, then the discussions could go forward. But nothing happened. No one advanced. Good hothouses and homes were trashed. Who benefited?

Who owns the land? Prove it.

Settler youths' attack on IDF crosses red line

It was jarring to find Israel thrust back into the news last week, but the issue was an important one. Last Tuesday, extremist settler youths broke into an IDF base in the West Bank, vandalizing military vehicles, hurling rocks and even slightly wounding a senior officer. The assault on the IDF crossed a red line for Israelis from right to left. The headline in the Dec. 14 Globe and Mail, "Israelis shocked by settler assaults on army," accurately captured the mood in the country.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The attack was just one of several related events connected with the reaction of a small group of extremists to rumours that the government, following a Supreme Court ruling a few months ago, was planning to remove an illegal outpost. Disturbances also occurred in Jerusalem, where dozens of far-right activists clashed with police, slashing tires and smashing windows of police cars. An abandoned mosque with historical significance in the city was torched and defaced. The day before, a group of extremists broke into a closed military zone in the Jordan Valley and reportedly tried to set up an outpost. Several of them were arrested.

The head of the army's Central Command, Maj.-Gen. Avi Mizrahi, who in September had issued orders barring 13 of the activists from entering the West Bank, summarized the military's reaction: "In my 30 years in the IDF, I never saw such hatred by Jews toward soldiers."

Defence Minister Ehud Barak was so incensed that he wanted to declare the extremists "terrorists." Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu stopped just short of that, but he approved a range of tough measures, including administrative detention, to quell this violent movement. Declaring a policy of zero tolerance for such behaviour (which many Israeli analysts say has not been adequately addressed in the past, including in response to unprovoked attacks on Palestinian farmers and villagers), Netanyahu was clear: "No one has the right to break the law, or to raise his hand against an IDF soldier or policeman. The law is the foundation of democracy."

Netanyahu also pointed out that the number of far-right suspects is small, and that they did not represent the majority of settlers in the West Bank, "who are loyal to the state and its laws." Significantly, a number of settler leaders and rabbis also denounced the incidents that, unfortunately, are often identified in the West with the settlers in general.

On the Dec. 12 BBC Worlds News (America), Christian Caryl, a contributing editor at Foreign Policy magazine, said that Newt Gingrich's remark about the Palestinians being an "invented" people played well to "the Zionists," thereby implying that supporters of Israel endorse such put-downs of the Palestinian people. Caryl's remark is as crass as Gingrich's. It reflects a negative stereotype of Zionists as callous and illiberal.

Newt Gingrich

The issue is not that Palestinian consciousness grew in the early part of the 20th century in response to Zionism. It's that Palestinian self-identity has been long established and accepted, and that to now assert that Palestinians are an "invented" people is to denigrate them (just as there are those who deny that there is a Jewish people with inherent political rights).

David Remnick, the editor of the New Yorker correctly pointed out (in an interview in Ha'aretz) that the Israeli mainstream and its government do not share Gingrich's views. It's important to recall that as far back as 1978, at the Camp David summit, then-Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin officially endorsed the "legitimate rights of the Palestinian people." In the post-Oslo accords period, successive Israeli leaders have affirmed the legitimate political rights of the Palestinians. Most recently, Netanyahu has repeatedly spoken about the need for "two states for two peoples" – meaning the Jews and the Palestinians.

What's unfortunate, even tragic, is that Palestinian leaders, including foremost Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, refuse to acknowledge the same legitimate political rights for the Jewish people. And until that attitude changes, there can be no hope of reaching a political resolution.

Board nomination process to remain former Conservative MP Stockwell Day; Father Raymond de Souza of Kingston; Ottawa lawyer Tom d'Aquino.

Jonathan Freedman, an Ottawa realtor and past chairman of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa; Staci Silverman, president of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CJFS); Nancy Rosenfeld, president of the Claudine and Stephen Bronfman Family Foundation and the Samuel and Saidye Bronfman Family Foundation; Judy Kremer, a Montreal lawyer and former Congress board member; Moshe Ronen, former CIC board chair and former president of Congress; David Engel, immediate past president of UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC); Toronto lawyer and former Congress president Ed Morgan; Marty Chernin, president of Temple Sons of Israel in Sydney, N.S.; Winnipeg lawyer David Kroft; Calgary businesswoman Carol Ryder; Heather Fenyes, president of Congregation Agudas Israel Synagogue in Saskatoon, and Saskatchewan's Lorne Nystrom, a former NDP MP.

CIJA's bylaws say that the board must include at least three members who are not from Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver, as well as the president of the CJFS, at least one member of the executive committee of UIAFC, and "such other individuals as are required to fill the number of director positions."

Fogel said he understands there is still some yearning for Congress, but based on research his organization conducted in the run-up to its re-launch, the time was ripe for a rebranding and a new direction for communal advocacy in Canada.

"Congress is a very recognizable brand, especially with the older demographic within the Jewish community," Fogel wrote in an e-mail. "However, understanding of Congress and its legacy drops off very dramatically with the under-45 demographic within our community, who cannot relate to the name [or] the legacy (e.g. most don't even remember the USSR or Soviet Jewry). Moreover, there were perceptions of [Congress'] partisan identification within the political sector, which challenge the notion of an impartial profile that the centre is trying to achieve."

Shimon Fogel

On another matter, Rabbi Scheim also said it was "mind-boggling" that CIJA decided to include Father de Souza – a Roman Catholic priest – but no rabbi.

When asked about this seeming oversight, Fogel responded that CIJA's nominating committee debated including a rabbi on the board, but decided against it. "A rabbi was not excluded and several were considered. If we were mandated to include a rabbi, from what denomination would she/he have to be? Or, would we be obliged to take one from each stream of Judaism?" Fogel asked.

He added that CIJA is in the process of ensuring greater rabbinic engagement in its operations. It will revive the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus – formerly run under the auspices of the Canada-Israel Committee – and has "signalled" as much to various rabbis across the country, he said.

"That will serve as a dedicated and complementary platform to benefit from the unique contribution rabbis can make to our overall effort. I think one can anticipate that… a rabbi or rabbis will from time to time be nominated to the board," he said.

When informed about this plan, Rabbi Scheim said that the caucus' revival would "be welcome."

Fogel said the caucus would be established shortly. "We want the rabbis' buy-in and enthusiasm to have a dedicated role in the public policy debate."

He said he has had preliminary discussions on the issue with Rabbi Michal Shekel, executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, to which Rabbi Scheim belongs, as well as with Rabbi Howard Morrison of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation in Montreal, among others.

"We're looking for involvement of rabbis from all quarters," Fogel said.

Cummings hopes a $1.6-million grant from the Networks of Centre of Excellence – a government research funding body – will help put theory into practice, and help Canada develop a national strategy to address bullying.

But Cummings said the strategy to curb bullying goes beyond school policies.

"It's important for parents to treat each other with respect and model respectful behavior and respectful talk about other people," Cummings said. "When parents give their kids lots of encouragement about treating others the way they want to be treated, that sets the right foundation."

Teacher shares her love for Yiddish

In recent years, Jeannette Stein – a retired public school teacher who also taught Yiddish for two years at Bialik Hebrew Day School – has been sharing her passion for Yiddish with adult students.

Shely Mann, who just completed Stein's 10-week beginner's Yiddish course this past semester, said her teacher brings enthusiasm, love and commitment to her students. The classes were held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, and sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Committee for Yiddish.

By Frances Kraft

"If I can share learning with people, and I see the joy in their faces, and they're connecting with whatever I'm teaching, that's the pièce de résistance for me," Stein told The CJN.

A native of Toronto, Stein (née Chapman) was born to Polish immigrants and imbued as a child with a love for Yiddish, her first language. Her parents were members of the Farband (Labour Zionist Alliance), and she attended the Farband Folk Shule.

After graduating from Harbord Collegiate Institute, Stein went to teachers' college in Toronto. "I love working with children. This is in the very marrow of my bones," said the grandmother of one.

A lesson from the teacher: "Laughter through tears – that's [the lesson of] Yiddish, through Sholom Aleichem."

Her first job was at Overland Drive Public School, and she went on to teach every grade from kindergarten to Grade 8, sometimes in tough areas of the city.

Lehrerin Gitel – as she likes to be called by her Yiddish students – segued into teaching weekly children's Yiddish classes and then intermediate level adult classes after she appeared in a three-night production of Schver Tzu Zein A Yid (It's Hard to be Jew) at the Mount Pleasant Theatre about a decade ago.

"We always have music, to make it a little more lively but also to connect with our roots," Stein said of her classes. As well, she likes to bring in Yiddish literature, esoteric items such as author Sholom Aleichem's will, and chendelach ("little jokes and charming stories").

She encourages her students to persist with grammar and vocabulary even if they find it hard. "The reward is getting to read in the original language the authors' own words."

More recently Stein has written and performed in Yiddish productions as part of New Voices for Yiddish, with Nathan Garnick and Faye Zeidman. They have appeared at Toronto's Jewish Book Fair, and are searching for a venue for a show they are preparing for next fall.

Maccabees teach us about hiddur

Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner

Rabbinic Reflections

My elementary school teachers explained Hellenic culture by telling our class that the Greeks worshipped the body. Underscoring this point by noting that ancient Olympic competitors performed without clothing, these teachers succeeded in conveying an indelible image, but they oversimplified the role of beauty in the original Chanukah and its celebrations today.

Greek culture honoured physical beauty, but their emphasis was on a broader conception of beauty, or kallos. Plato conceived of an abstract universe in which the characteristics we express as adjectives exist as nouns – a perfect triangle, a perfect blue, and a perfect beauty – as independent entities.

Within that abstract Platonic universe, kallos occupies a place of honour, and so every beautiful thing in our world is automatically admired as a reflection of that higher kallos, even in the absence of any other redeeming characteristic. To cite from Plato's Phaedrus (Jowett translation), the most elevated person who observes beauty in our world "is transported with the recollection of the true beauty… he is like a bird fluttering and looking upward and careless of the world below; and he is therefore thought to be mad." And as Plato wrote in his Symposium (Nehamas translation), "Only in the contemplation of beauty is human life worth living."

This ideal was rejected by the Maccabees, for Jewish tradition spurns the idea that beauty has inherent value. Beauty is neither good nor evil. It is only a characteristic of a good or evil entity. As Proverbs 31:30 states, "Charm is false and beauty is empty." We don't pursue beauty for its own sake.

However, Jewish tradition does teach that the act of beautifying something demonstrates devotion, as the Sages translated the Jews' song of praise at the Red Sea (Exodus 15:2), "This is my God, and I will beautify Him." Therefore, the same Maccabees who rejected kallos pursued beauty, hiddur in Hebrew, in establishing the restored Temple's Menorah. The Talmud (Menachot 28b) teaches, "The branches of their menorah were iron rods, and the Hasmoneans coated them with tin. When they became wealthier, they made the branches of silver. When they became still wealthier, they made the branches of gold."

We follow in the footsteps of the Maccabees and employ hiddur on Chanukah, too. The Talmud records a baseline practice of lighting one flame per household on each night of Chanukah, but Jews all over the world follow the Talmud's highest "mehadrin" practice of lighting multiple flames, based on the number of Chanukah nights that have passed. As the 13th-century commentary Tosafot explains, this practice is called mehadrin, from the word hiddur, signifying that it beautifies the mitzvah. We practice hiddur in order to glorify our Judaism.

Beyond the religious message, hiddur of a mitzvah also offers great practical value. I wish for my children to value the religious decisions I have made, but if my child sees rote observance, begrudging fulfilment of obligations and bottom-line satisfaction of expectations, she may find that model less than compelling. On the other hand, if our children will see that a mitzvah is a thing worthy of hiddur, then perhaps they will desire to own it themselves. With their beautified menorah, the Maccabees encouraged us to demonstrate, for ourselves and for our children, that mitzvot are worthy of hiddur.

Lessons from the Occupy Wall Street movement

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

As the weather cools, the Occupy Wall Street movement is no longer encamped in cities around the world. Whether one agrees with the movement's methodology or its arguments, the issues it raises are serious and require sober thinking.

The ever-widening gap between the corner office and the person on the factory floor has continued to widen, with enormous wealth being concentrated in the hands of the few while more and more people have less and less.

A recent OECD report noted that the richest 10 per cent of people in Canada make 10 times the income of the poorest 10 per cent, up from an eight-to-one ratio in the past 20 years. Sadly, in Israel, the gap is a much higher 14 to one. Even a number of CEOs have recently publicly admitted that such disparity is unhealthy for society.

The excesses of greed know no bounds. In the words of our sages, jealousy, excessive desire of all things material, and craving honour – which today is so often synonymous with wealth –"removes one from this world," figuratively and even literally. Yet these traits are actually necessary and good – if used in moderation. Our sages assert that if not for the evil inclination, we would be much poorer in so many ways. We must risk the bad if we want the good, and such is true in science, politics, religion and every field of human endeavour.

I was troubled, but not surprised, when a friend of mine who works at a major corporation told me that his department had recently fired a significant portion of its staff. Could it be because they were losing money and needed the layoffs to survive?

Not quite. With the financial world in turmoil, the bonus pool was down this year. By getting rid of excess staff, the same "pie" would be split among fewer people, increasing the remaining people's portion. These are people making six-figure salaries and more, yet were willing to fire their colleagues who undoubtedly had helped them earn their salaries.

Less clear is what should and can be done about all of this – something evident in the less-than-clear message that emanated from the occupiers. While generally despised, "Rae days," when the government of Ontario under the leadership of NDP premier Bob Rae forced workers to take unpaid (extra) vacation days in order to prevent layoffs, seems to have much merit. We are all better off – in the short term morally, and in the long term both morally and economically – if the unemployment rate goes down even if the average salary drops.

Moral preaching generally accomplishes little – and maybe even less than that – and it's true that if you refuse to pay obscene salaries and bonuses, your competitor surely will.

While learning about proper moral actions is no guarantee that they will be put into practice, it's clear that much more needs to be done in terms of "education in ethics," beginning not in university, but in elementary school, and more importantly, by modelling in the home. Publicizing unbecoming practices even if legal can also go a long way towards "embarrassing" companies into putting people ahead of profits. If the Occupy Wall Street movement can help bring this about, it will have accomplished much.

Book on academic freedom attacks Jewish community

A conference titled Israel/Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace took place at York University in June 2009. The conference, organized by two York law school professors, one of their graduate students, and a professor from Queens University, focused on the "one-state solution" for Israel/Palestine.

The conference was controversial. Even before it began, the organizers argued that their academic freedom to explore and study any issue, even the most contentious, was under attack. Critics of the conference from within academia (both at York University and beyond) and from the local Jewish community argued that the conference was anti-Israel political activism disguised as an academic event. Some challenged the credentials of the two York professors to organize such a conference. Prof. Gerald Steinberg, chair of the political science department of Bar-Ilan University, charged that some of the conference speakers listed were "virulent anti-Israel activists with little or no connection to academic research on the subject," and that hosting this conference would transform "the university into a macabre circus that sells hatred, martyrdom and murder."

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

The conference took place as planned. Afterward, both sides continued to complain. The organizers alleged that the university administrators had not been sufficiently vigilant in protecting their academic freedom (although they did run the conference just as they wished). Opponents argued that the conference had been as shoddy, politicized and biased as anticipated. One Israeli participant, a proud Israeli leftist, Prof. Naama Carmi of Haifa University, wrote that "a pro-Palestinian demonstration took place inside the conference itself, from the floor, under an academic disguise… This was not an academic conference… Anyone who challenged the Palestinian perspective was intimidated or even labelled a racist."

Against this background, the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) has just published a book about the conference. Naive observers might hope for a dispassionate account by an honest broker, measuring the merits of the arguments of the conference's supporters and detractors. This book does no such thing.

Written by Jon Thompson, it is titled No Debate: The Israel Lobby and Free Speech at Canadian Universities. The true villains, according to the book, are the Jewish communal organizations, who allegedly did not respect academic freedom, along with one York administrator, a pro-Israel Jew with far better academic credentials in the study of Middle Eastern politics than the York conference organizers.

The author's bias is clear from the start of the book. As background to the events, he feels obliged to define "Zionism." For that purpose, he quotes approvingly from Arno Mayer, a "self-proclaimed left, dissident Marxist" (according to his Facebook page): "Zionism was born out of violence, not God or a golden vision: the physical and psychological violence of the pogroms in czarist Russia… then the physical, psychological and symbolic violence of the Zionist settlement in Arab-Muslim Palestine."

In his lengthy background explanations, Thompson never explains why supporters of the Jewish state are terrified by the prospect of a "one-state solution" for Israel/Palestine. Put simply (among other reasons), after decades when the Palestinian leadership (both Hamas and the Palestinian Authority) celebrate, educate toward and encourage violence against Jewish civilians, people like me are incredulous when we hear the suggestion that the real solution to the Israel/Palestine problem is that Jews and Palestinians live together in one secular, liberal multi-cultural state (as if a model for such a state existed anywhere else in the Arab world).

It makes sense that Thompson never articulates this Jewish concern about the one-state solution since, in his survey of the problems of Israel/Palestine, he never mentions Arab terrorism. Jewish violence, as we saw above, is central to Thompson's explanation of Zionism. But a Martian who read this book would never know about Palestinian suicide murderers and other forms of violence against Israeli Jews (that have also killed many Israeli Arab civilians). Thompson comes close on one occasion, writing that from 2001 to 2009 "there were renewed rounds of extreme violence." This may be an allusion to the murder of students in the Hebrew University of Jerusalem cafeteria or of senior citizens at a Passover seder in Netanya or countless other murderous acts perpetrated against Israeli civilians. But if it is, Thompson just can't bring himself to identify the perpetrators of that violence and their ideology.

Thompson declares that he found the allegation that the conference was antisemitic "incorrect and unfair." But he never provides a definition for antisemitism (which is not a simple matter) or any reason why we should trust his ability to judge what constitutes antisemitism. (He is a retired professor of mathematics and statistics from the University of New Brunswick.)

In the end, the book advocates passionately for a more expansive definition of academic freedom so as to better protect academics like the conference organizers who wish to address controversial topics. But don't be fooled: the CAUT is not in favour of academic freedom for all. The CAUT refuses to take a stand against the boycott of Israeli academics, despite repeated requests that they do so. For the record, in his statement on academic freedom, York's president Mamdouh Shoukri has written that "the concept of an academic boycott… is antithetical to the very purpose of a university. It would undermine the freedom of individual scholars… On this basis, York University has consistently opposed the call to boycott Israeli universities." Many other university presidents have said the same. The American Association of University Teachers (AAUT) has likewise taken a firm stand against the boycott of Israeli universities. But not the CAUT. It claims to promote expansive academic freedom, but only for academics who share its politics.

Just as it is possible to turn an academic conference into an Israel-bashing event, so it is possible to turn a book on academic freedom into an attack on the Jewish community, which, as the graphics on the cover of the book suggest (a picture of a frightened person with tape over her mouth, as though she were about to be raped), allegedly silences academic discourse violently.

Don't believe this book. It has as much credibility as the fox's report on the security of the chicken coop.

Survivors, young adults gather at dinner

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Hundreds of young professionals recently spent an informative and inspiring evening with 40 Holocaust survivors at the seventh annual Dinner of Miracles.

The event, held on Dec. 11 at Petah Tikva Congregation, was co-chaired by Sherri Rotstein, director of the Toronto March of the Living, and Shawna Samuel, events co-ordinator at Zareinu Educational Centre.

The evening of dialogue between the generations featured a four-course meal and a presentation of musical selections from I Believe: A Holocaust Oratorio for Today. Composer Zane Zalis and soloists Kelsey Cowie and Marc Devigne performed the powerful pieces.

At each table, young adults, a facilitator and two Holocaust survivors engaged in conversation. The survivors shared first-hand stories of their experiences during the war, how they overcame adversity and how they re-established their lives in Canada. They spoke of loss and suffering, courage, triumph and faith.

The Dinner of Miracles, which raises enough funds to cover the event costs only, helped deepen the understanding of the Holocaust for the young professionals. It emphasized the consequences of racism and antisemitism and reinforced the need to always remember and learn from the lessons of history.

"The opportunity to hear first-hand testimonies is becoming more rare and the stories need be heard by as many people as possible," said Rotstein. "This is a piece of unique Jewish history, bridging the past and the future. This event is important for both the survivors and the young adults, as each person who attends finds the event fulfilling and meaningful."

Rotstein said there is a unique relationship between Holocaust survivors and young adults, which is fostered through encounters such as the Dinner of Miracles. "The connections made allow the young adults to not only hear survivor testimony, but to see first-hand the kind of fulfilling Jewish lives the survivors are living despite facing such extreme adversity in their early years."

She said the survivors were thrilled to attend and got "so much fulfillment from speaking to young Jewish adults. This is an event they look forward to annually. Many of them have come in the past, are grandparents of people attending or are speakers from the Holocaust Centre of Toronto."

Sharona Abramovitch, a young professional who attended the dinner with her grandmother, said: "It was an unforgettable experience to be among many true heroes and to learn first-hand from survivors who lived through the Holocaust."

Her grandmother, Elizabeth Silverberg, shared painful memories of Auschwitz, where she witnessed her family members being sent to the gas chambers, and Bergen-Belsen, where her job was to carry away corpses in blankets and toss them into graves.

While she was in Bergen-Belsen, Silverberg suffered from typhus. She said she remembers lying on the floor for about 12 days without any food, water or medication and barely conscious. Somehow, she got better, but besides the physical torture, she suffered emotionally. Silverberg witnessed countless people in distress every day, including Anne Frank, who came on the last train to the camp. Frank told Silverberg that her family had been in hiding when someone betrayed them. Silverberg said she remembers Frank being pale and weak, dying three weeks before they were liberated.

After the war, five of the nine siblings in Silverberg's family survived. "We must never forget our past because in order to move forward we must know from where we come. We are all human beings, forgive and replace evil with kindness and thus live life to its fullest," she said. "As my grandmother has told me on numerous occasions, it is important for young people today to hear first-hand from Holocaust survivors about their experiences so that their experiences of the Holocaust can be retold by us to our children and our children's children," said Abramovitch.

Finding meaning over winter break

Campus Life

Jessica Pollock

This time of year marks the long-awaited winter break for students.

Schools pause for several weeks, allocating rest and relaxation following a prolonged first semester.

For a multitude of Jewish families, this time off calls for a sojourn to Florida – perhaps to visit bubbie and zaide who have already migrated to the warm climate – or to a chic Caribbean island where the weather is guaranteed and the resort is an assured paradise.

I myself am an abiding participant in this winter getaway ritual. After all, who would give up an opportunity to escape from the cold winter to a destination of sand and sun?

Nevertheless, upon the onset of my annual vacation, I have begun considering various means to make this year's excursion more relevant, namely, by integrating volun-tourism-related activities.

Volun-tourism is a phenomenon defined as travel that incorporates volunteering expeditions for charitable causes.

No community is spared from encountering periods of struggle and difficulty. For this reason, this winter break I challenged myself to make a difference and demonstrate my support for others in need.

Whether you and your family are jet setting to a destination, or are unwinding in the comfort of your own home, there are countless ways to give back and take social action.

Upon researching volunteer opportunities in Miami, I stumbled across one that I plan to explore during my stay in Florida.

Christmas Day marks the Jewish Community Volunteer Day in Miami, that allows for Jewish people to offer friendship and support to fellow non-Jews on their holiest of days. The Greater Miami Jewish Federation organizes events on this particular date.

Various projects run throughout the day. They include beautifying the area around the federation's community offices, visiting the elderly at nursing homes or similar facilities, or even preparing and serving meals and connecting with the homeless or the Salvation Army.

This event's success is completely reliant on the dedication of volunteers. Thus, if you find yourself in Miami on Dec. 25, I encourage you to accompany me among many others in a fix of volun-tourism, that will surely invigorate the lives of children and adults less fortunate than ourselves.

For those residing in Toronto over the winter break, there are similar ways to volunteer. One opportunity that I have come across numerous times is contributing time to Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian Relief Committee, which operates a Jewish mobile response van.

In the name of community poverty relief, this non-profit operates an outreach van every Sunday through Thursday.

The van drives along the downtown corridor, where volunteers distribute sandwiches, coffee, donated clothing and other necessities to impoverished individuals.

Since Ve'ahavta is dependent on its volunteers to operate this charitable service, I definitely intend to participate in this expedition next time I find myself in Toronto.

Join me in making this year's winter break a humanitarian one. Assigning one day or two out of our holidays in the name of social action and justice may produce lasting impacts on the well-being of many people, not to mention the communities they inhabit.

KANDY KIDS

Kandy for Kids, a tzedakah effort initiated by Summer Hart, left, and held Dec. 7 at Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School, raised $528 by selling pink cotton candy to support SickKids Foundation and to promote school wide anti-bullying week at Danilack. Summer's next tzedakah venture is making and selling personalized greeting cards. Pictured with Summer selling cotton candy is her sister Ciera.

HOSPITAL FUNDRAISER

Zachary Winkler, 10, left, recently held his fifth annual fundraiser for the Hospital for Sick Children, raising $8,250, which he and his sister Maya, 7, right, are shown presenting to Cheryl Eidt of SickKids Foundation. He and Maya made and handed out cotton candy and asked everyone who attended the event, which featured Toronto Maple Leaf legend Johnny Bower, to make a donation. Tax receipts and "Do Something Sweet" T-shirts were given to all those who donated $20 or more. Zachary also has a website that's linked to the hospital for online donations and printable tax receipts, www.zacharysdosomethingsweet.com.

GIVING SEASON: Associated Hebrew Schools student Hudson Polsky, 8 – pictured with his sisters Sarit, left, 10, and Barrett, 4 – asked his friends not to give him birthday presents this year but rather to give him gift cards to Toys R Us. He let them know that he would be using the gift cards (in their entirety) to purchase gifts for children at the Hospital for Sick Children to help them celebrate the holiday season.

INTERFAITH GIFTS: Jews, Muslims and Christians gathered last week in Toronto's Dundas Square to wrap gifts for needy children. Gifts 4 Good: The Toronto Interfaith Wrap-a-thon – an event organized by Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee in partnership with the Tony Blair Faith Foundation's Faiths Act Fellowship – resulted in the donation of more than 1,000 toys for children in need. The free, family event also served as a venue for dialogue between members of the three faiths, while promoting Jewish values and the power of partnerships, organizers said.

Two Winnipeg teens charged with hate crime

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Two Grade 10 students at a southwest Winnipeg high school are now facing assault and hate charges as a result of threatening a Jewish girl at the school with a lighter and singeing her hair.

The incident took place Nov. 18 but police weren't informed until a week later. Initially just one student was charged in the incident.

The alleged assault with accompanying antisemitic remarks took place at Oak Park High School in Charleswood. While Charleswood in the past has not been known as a Jewish neighbourhood, in recent years, younger Jewish families – especially immigrant families from South America and Israel – have been moving into the area. The victim, however, is Canadian-born. (None of the students involved can be identified because of their age.)

Winnipeg Police Service spokesperson Jason Michalyshen said police are recommending to the Crown that both 15-year-old boys be charged with assault with a weapon and with public incitement of hatred.

"We expect the Crown to officially lay the charges within a couple of weeks," Michalyshen said. "Both boys were holding lighters. While the second boy may not have used his lighter on the girl, he didn't try to stop his friend."

Michalyshen said the first boy to be arrested was released from custody after promising to appear in court, while the second boy has been spoken to.

"We are taking this investigation very seriously," Michalyshen said.

The alleged attack has shocked the community, both Jewish and non-Jewish.

"This is such a rare incident," said Shelley Faintuch, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's community affairs director. "It's a great shock. We hear about racial slurs and graffiti from time to time, but not this kind of thing. Winnipeg is such a diverse city."

The student who committed the assault reportedly has skinhead and neo-Nazi associations. He has also reportedly been bragging about his actions on Facebook, where he has garnered some support and much more criticism.

Faintuch said that other Jewish students at the school have contacted her since the incident. (The Jewish student population at the school is small, but the exact number isn't available.)

Lawrence Lussier, the superintendent of Pembina Trails School Division, where Oak Park is located, said the school has about 1,000 students, who hail from a wide variety of backgrounds. There is a French immersion track for students from grades 9 through 12 and a grade 10-to-12 English track.

"Winnipeg has received a lot of immigrants in recent years, and the aboriginal population in the city is also growing," he said. "Oak Park's student body reflects that diversity."

The male student who allegedly committed the assault is relatively new to the school division, Lussier said. He began attending Oak Park in September.

"He came from another school division," Lussier said. "We haven't had much experience with him. We only learned about his neo-Nazi associations from media sources after the fact. There is some evidence of that on his Facebook page."

The first teen was suspended and has left the school, while the second student who was charged has been suspended from the school as well.

The Jewish girl is back at school.

Faintuch has approached the school, on behalf of the federation about helping its administration develop a plan to respond to the incident. "The principal is very serious about dealing with this," she said.

Lussier commended Faintuch for her help. "We really appreciate having Shelley's support," he said. "It's good for the girl's family, as well as other concerned students. When something like this happens, it arouses some fear. It's important that we respond and reinforce the values of respect, acceptance and inclusiveness that we consider important."

He added that Faintuch has suggested a program called "Fighting Anti-Semitism Together" (FAST), which was designed for middle school students, but could be adapted for older students.

"We are looking into introducing FAST to Oak Park School," Lussier said. "We think it might help our kids."

Vivian Distler

Long-time resident of Palo Alto and a leader in the Jewish community there, passed away on December 6, 2011.

Vivian was born in Montreal, Canada in 1965 and took great pride in both her Canadian and Jewish heritage. She moved to Palo Alto, CA in 1996 and became an active member of the Jewish community. She served on the board of the Palo Alto JCC, overseeing the construction of the new Oshman Family Jewish Community Center. She also served on the board of the Kehillah Jewish High School, and the Jewish Community Federation South Peninsula Council. She chaired the 2007 To Life! Jewish Cultural Street Festival and was a board member of New Bridges to Jewish Community. She trained in emergency preparedness and ran marathons and triathlons, to raise money for the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society Team in Training program.

Vivian graduated from Boston University with a BS in broadcasting and film and a BA in history in 1987. She earned a JD from UC Berkeley School of Law in 1994, where she was managing editor of the California Law Review. She was a law clerk at the U.S. District Court, District of Nevada. Her early career was in Television production, first in New York, and then in Los Angeles. Later, she practiced Law at Wilson Sonsini in Palo Alto. In 2007, she joined the Institute for the Future and became Director of Research and Collaborative Networks for the Health Horizons Program.

Vivian's keen intelligence, compassion, wisdom, loyalty and generous nature were evident in all she did. We remember her irreverent sense of humor and wonderful, hearty laugh. Vivian overcame many adversities in her life, including breast cancer in 2005, but even in the darkest moments, her generosity and humor shone through.

Vivian is survived by her brother Jacques Distler of Austin, Texas; sister-in-law Suzanne Fremont; beloved niece and nephew, Lauren and Avi. Funeral services were held in Austin, Texas.

Cotler says speaker 'erred' in poll ruling

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — House of Commons Speaker Andrew Scheer described a Conservative Party telephone campaign in Irwin Cotler's Mount Royal riding as "reprehensible," but for technical reasons said he could not rule that the veteran Liberal MP's parliamentary privileges had been breached.

While expressing sympathy for Cotler having had to endure calls to his constituents that spoke of an "impending, if not imminent, byelection" and asking if they would support a Conservative candidate, Scheer said the facts on the ground show that the MP's ability to carry out his parliamentary duties has not been impeded by the partisan campaign.

Cotler is dissatisfied with the Dec. 13 ruling and believes Scheer erred in not finding a breach of privilege. He thinks the speaker should have – and still could – pronounce that such practices must cease. Cotler would also like an apology from the Conservatives.

Had Scheer ruled in Cotler's favour, the matter could have been referred to committee for investigation and possible sanction.

As for the technical constraints he faced in coming to a decision, Scheer, the Conservative MP for Regina-Qu'Appelle, stressed the limitations of the speaker's powers in such matters. He also found that what constitutes evidence of breach of privilege has not been sufficiently codified.

The precedents set by previous speakers, which he cited, point to the difficulty of deciding these matters, but the practical effect of any alleged interference with an MP's job has to be a prime consideration, he indicated.

Scheer quoted his predecessor Peter Milliken, from 2009: "In adjudicating questions of privilege of this kind, the speaker is bound to assess whether or not the member's ability to fulfil his parliamentary functions effectively has been undermined."

Scheer noted that judging by how "extremely active" Cotler has been in the House and in committee and the "extensive sympathetic coverage in media across the country" that he has received to his "legitimate grievance" the Conservative tactics have neither hindered his work nor damaged his reputation.

Nevertheless, he stated: "I am sure that all reasonable people would agree that attempting to sow confusion in the minds of voters as to whether or not their member is about to resign is a reprehensible tactic and that the honourable member for Mount Royal has a legitimate grievance."

Cotler finds it ironic that his activity as an MP should be invoked as a reason to not find the Conservative Party at fault.

Irwin Cotler

First elected in 1999, Cotler raised the matter in the House Nov. 16, after his office received numerous communications from his constituents (and a few people living just outside the riding) about the phone calls, which appeared to be made by a pollster.

The calls were traced to the Ontario-based market research firm Campaign Research Inc., and House leader Peter Van Loan subsequently acknowledged that the survey was conducted by the Conservative Party to identify voter support. He made no apology for the callers speaking of an upcoming byelection, saying such rumours have been rife almost since the time Cotler was first elected.

Even though it was not the one he sought, Cotler said the ruling is "clearly an acknowledgement that something wrong occurred."

"No Canadian voter should be confronted with false and misleading calls and expected to sort out the truth from rumour [as Scheer suggested]. Indeed, they should not receive such calls in the first place.

"Asking my constituents, outside an election, 'Do you support the Conservative Party?' is fine, but telling them there is an imminent byelection because I have resigned or am about to resign is something that ought not to be acceptable."

Cotler also believes Scheer was mistaken in not addressing the question of whether the phone campaign amounted to contempt of Parliament, whatever his conclusions about the complaint. To Cotler, a former McGill University law professor and justice minister, it is obvious that this is what it was.

Although he has no further recourse in the House, Cotler is urging all parties to formally acknowledge that such tactics are unacceptable and vow to never engage in them.

Last-chance operation to catch Nazi war criminals

Toby Axelrod
JTA

BERLIN — A last-ditch effort to bring Nazi war criminals to justice in Germany was launched in Berlin.

Operation Last Chance II, announced last week, is a followup to a search for the last remaining unpunished Nazis launched by the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Jerusalem office in 2006. Efraim Zuroff, Jerusalem-based chief Nazi hunter for the organization, said at a news conference hosted by the German Bundestag.

To facilitate tipsters, a new mobile telephone hotline has been established in Germany (+49 1572 494-7407). A reward of up to 25,000 euros, or about $33,500 (all figures Cdn), will be offered in stages: 5,000 euros ($6,500) if the person is indicted, another 5,000 euros if the person is convicted, and 100 euros ($135) for every day the person is in jail, up to 150 days, Zuroff said.

Aside from any new tips, there are known Nazis living out their years without facing justice, Zuroff said, adding he was especially keen to see three Germans brought to justice. They are: Klaas Carl Faber, who was convicted and sentenced to life in prison in 1947 in Holland, and escaped jail in 1952 and fled to Germany, where as a German citizen he was protected from extradition; Soreren Kam, who was indicted in Denmark for the 1943 murder of a Danish anti-Nazi newspaper editor, and Gerhard Sommer, who was convicted in absentia in Italy of murder in the massacre of 560 civilians and has been under investigation since 2002.

"The passage of time in no way relieves the guilt of the killers," said Zuroff, whose 2009 book on the Last Chance project has just been translated into German. "Turning 90 doesn't make a murderer into a Righteous Gentile."

Efraim Zuroff

The Last Chance program got a shot in the arm from the conviction last May of John Demjanjuk, 91, as an accessory to murder at the Sobibor death camp in occupied Poland. Previously, the German prosecutors laid charges only when they could find evidence of a specific crime with a specific victim, but in the wake of the Demjanjuk conviction, that no longer had to be the case, explained Zuroff, who earlier this year signed a co-operation agreement with the Ludwigsburg-based Central Office of the State Justice Administrations for the Investigation of National Socialist Crimes.

German prosecutors reportedly said last October that the conviction of Demjanjuk paved the way for reopening hundreds of similar cases in which no specific crime or victim could be pinned on the defendant, but in which there was a great likelihood of the accused having been a part of the killing machine.

Demjanjuk is appealing his conviction, and Zuroff admitted that it would "be a disaster if he wins his appeal. It would ruin any hope" of bringing some war criminals to justice, he said.

Dutch withdraw bill banning ritual slaughter

JTA

AMSTERDAM — A bill to ban ritual slaughter was withdrawn by the Dutch Senate days before a scheduled vote.

Animal Rights Party leader Marianne Thieme withdrew the bill Dec. 13 after a majority of senators expressed their objection to the ban on kosher slaughter, or shechitah. The measure had passed the lower house of the Dutch parliament in June.

The bill had required that animals be stunned before slaughter. Jewish and Muslim ritual slaughter must be performed with the animal fully conscious.

A slaughterhouse that could prove the animal did not suffer more pain than when stunned would have been exempted from the prohibition.

Under a compromise presented by Agriculture Minister Henk Bleker, an agreement could be made with Jewish and Muslim slaughterhouses regarding the length of time that an animal is conscious before dying and the number of animals to be ritually slaughtered.

European Jewish Congress President Moshe Kantor praised the suggestion of a compromise.

Moshe Kantor

"This compromise is befitting Holland's long history of freedom of religion and specifically, tolerance towards its Jewish community," Kantor said in a statement. "While the details have to be worked out, we hope the spirit of the compromise will be embraced by all sides of the debate."

The European Jewish Congress, along with the Dutch Jewish Community and Shechita UK, led a campaign against the proposed ban. The campaign has included presenting the case to leading Dutch politicians and ensuring that the Jewish voice was heard in the public arena.

The European Union requires animals to be stunned before slaughter, but makes exceptions for religiously mandated ritual slaughter. Nevertheless, ritual slaughter is banned in Luxembourg, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland.

Islamists win 70% in second round of Egypt's elections

Avi Issacharoff

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM —Islamist parties won 70 per cent of the vote in the second stage of Egypt's landmark post-Hosni Mubarak elections, according to unofficial results published on the website of Egypt's Al-Ahram newspaper on Sunday.

The Muslim Brotherhood party won 39 per cent, and the Salafi Al Nour party 31 per cent.

The unofficial results for the second stage of elections for the lower house of the Egyptian parliament also showed that the secular, liberal Wafd party won 22 per cent of the vote.

The 70 per cent won by the Islamist parties was a similar result to that in the first stage of elections, which took place on Nov. 28, but the gap between the Muslim Brotherhood and Al Nour shrank in this round of voting – the Brotherhood won 49 per cent, and Al Nour 20 per cent, in the first round.

Turnout in the second round of voting in Egypt's parliamentary elections reached 67 per cent, with most constituencies expecting run-off votes, elections officials said Sunday. More than 12 million citizens cast their ballots on Wednesday and Thursday.

The turnout was higher than that in the first round, estimated by the High Elections Commission at 60 per cent. A final round has been set for January.

Meanwhile, violence continued on Sunday for the third day straight in Egypt, as the military sought to isolate pro-democracy activists protesting against their rule, depicting them as conspirators and vandals. Troops and protesters pelted each other with stones near parliament in the heart of the capital.

At least 10 protesters have been killed and 441 others wounded in the three days of violence, according to the health ministry. Activists say most of the 10 fatalities died of gunshot wounds.

The Islamists have been staying clear of the recent violence, fearing that they could jeopardize their electoral gains by taking part in the protests. Their stance has prompted many activists to accuse them of political opportunism. The clashes began early Friday when one of several hundred peaceful protesters staging a sit-in outside the cabinet offices near parliament was detained and beaten by troops. The protesters began their sit-in three weeks ago to demand that the nation's ruling military immediately step down and hand over power to a civilian administration.

'All options remain on the table'

It can be assumed that Barak was also given an opportunity to see the director of the CIA, David Petraeus. All of them are important, but Obama makes the ultimate decision. Barak had his hearing before the final authority.

When it comes to the division of responsibility in Netanyahu's government, Barak is the liaison officer to the Democratic administration. Netanyahu is the liaison to the Republicans. The third decision-maker in Israel today, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, deals with Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin.

The Americans are in no hurry to befriend Lieberman. Barak is the interlocutor.

Gen. Martin Dempsey, chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, does not suggest bombing the Islamic republic's nuclear facilities, but rather building an international consensus around the fact that Iran's conduct is unacceptable, before deciding how to deal with it.

This suggests that Washington will take the stance of the Arab countries and Turkey into account on the Iranian issue. Thus the decision is not simply one made between Washington and Jerusalem.

U.S. seeks international consensus

The standard mantra that "all options remain on the table," is beginning to sound more like a message to Israel than to Iran.

The proof as to whether Barak has been successful, however, will be apparent only during a later stage in the U.S. election campaign, when Obama faces his Republican opponent and the controversy over Israel, the Palestinians, Iran and the region really catches fire.

And that may not be all that catches fire.

IDF sets up new foreign ops command

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Forces is forming a command to supervise "depth" operations, actions undertaken by the military far from Israel's borders, the army announced last week.

The new authority will be commanded by a military officer at the rank of major general and will be headed by the former chief of the elite Sayeret Matkal special forces unit Shai Avital, who will return to military service to fill the position.

Onoing concerns with Iran's contentious nuclear program serve as the backdrop for the IDF's announcement, with both U.S. and Israeli officials noting that, while diplomatic efforts were the preferred tool with attempting to thwart Iran's nuclear ambitions, no options were "off the table."

Last week, diplomatic sources said that Iran could soon launch sensitive atomic activities in an underground facility deep inside a mountain, a development likely to add to tension between Tehran and the West.

Iranian experts have carried out the necessary preparations at Fordow near the holy city of Qom, paving the way for the Islamic state to begin higher-grade uranium enrichment at the site on a former military base.

F-15 fighter jets of the Israel Air Force

The machines, equipment and nuclear material needed have been transferred and installed at Fordow, the sources added, suggesting the work itself – until now conducted above ground at another location – could start when Iran takes the decision.

Understanding the Israeli social protests

Michele Alperin
JointMedia News Service

NEW YORK — For Israeli economist Manuel Trajtenberg, appointed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to recommend policy measures in response to this summer's social protests, the half-million "tent city" protesters represent the potential for significant change in his country.

"One of the things for me that is most interesting and telling is the young generation in Israel that have discovered that they can make a difference and have a voice, that you can take charge of your destiny on these issues," he said recently during a press briefing at the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee's offices in New York. "Once you've discovered that something, it is impossible to take it away from you."

Trajtenberg, who is chair of the planning and budgeting committee of Israel's Council for Higher Education, said the protests were surprising for two reasons: the healthy, growing economy that had survived the 2008 and 2009 recession unscathed, alongside serious security concerns about the Palestinians' effort to seek membership in the UN and civil unrest in Gaza and the West Bank.

Although this combination isn't usually a recipe for social unrest, last summer's protests erupted with force, making them the largest of their kind in Israeli history on socioeconomic issues.

"In four weeks, up to half a million Israelis were in the streets all over the country, marching peacefully and calling for social justice – and even that expression we haven't heard in Israel for decades," Trajtenberg said.

The protesters' sole focus on socioeconomic issues, completely setting aside other critical issues such as the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, was unique, as was the group at the centre of the protest: young, mainstream Israelis with good jobs, raising families, who are facing overdrafts at the end of each month; Israelis who cannot contemplate buying a house, and Israelis who are so unsure of their futures that they question whether they can afford another child.

"You've done everything right, grew up, went to the university, applied for job, and yet your economic horizon is very uncertain," Trajtenberg said.

While these young Israelis view members of the high-tech sector who have gotten rich through their entrepreneurship and creativity as role models, they direct their anger at the "tycoons" – prominent businessmen who have accumulated fortunes through what protesters say are monopolistic practices and the appropriation of natural resources for their own purposes. Protesters have also focused on the lower end of the income distribution, in particular haredi men who do not work. Although one might expect sympathy or empathy toward the poorest part of the population, said Trajtenberg, the middle class resents paying heavy taxes that go to support large religious families.

Manuel Trajtenberg

"It's hard to sympathize with a segment of the population that is seen as being very poor by choice," he said.

The third provocation for the massive summer protests is a sense of alienation of younger Israelis from the political system. "When you belong to a small society, you expect that each and everyone counts," Trajtenberg said. "And when you feel that is not the case, that you don't have the voice, that the political system is looking down on you and not paying attention to you, that the institutions of government are not tuned to your needs, you feel alienation."

The preparation of Trajtenberg's report was not a dry, academic effort, but a careful process of listening to the protestors and conveying their demands to the government, he said.

"We saw our role as translating the clamour of the people into a language that the government, the political body, can understand and do something about," Trajtenberg said.

The committee engaged the protesters and the public in a dialogue through social media and public meetings that were broadcast live on the Internet, and sometimes on television. The passions of the protesters ran high, which is unusual for young Israelis who have various obligations – army, reserve duty, work, and early marriage and children.

"It's heavy stuff, and you struggle through it," Trajtenberg said, "But you don't have the awareness, the predisposition, the energy to affect your life by affecting politics. Then they discovered that they can do it. Something awakened."

While in the past social issues had played second or third fiddle behind the Palestinians, Iran, and even the religious-secular divide in Israel, they suddenly took centre stage this summer. Some thought that the terrorist attacks in Eilat and rockets from Gaza would quash the demonstrations, as had been true in the 1990s when protests were postponed due to security issues, but that did not happen.

"That's something new, something that was unthinkable in Israel, and something I see as very positive," Trajtenberg said. "You have to control your destiny in spite of the [Israeli-Palestinian] conflict."

As for the degree to which the government will adopt and implement the recommendations in his report, Trajtenberg takes a long view and is hopeful. One big success for Trajtenberg, given Netanyahu's stated political platform of reducing taxes, is tax increases for wealthy individuals and corporations. For example, the marginal income tax, which was supposed to decline to 37 per cent by 2017, was raised from 45 to 48 per cent. Additionally, a measure exempting Internet purchases from all taxes has gone through.

Trajtenberg emphasized that achieving real results requires a social transformation. "If we want to build a more just society, it takes much more than social protest, a committee, a report and recommendations," he said. "It requires a different state of mind, a different kind of body politic."

For Trajtenberg, Israel and the entire western world are facing a serious challenge in that, "We lack collectively a coherent model of what does it mean to have a market economy that works on more just principles."

Pushing aside socialism as an "ism" in the graveyard of the 20th century, for people who share his hair colour (he is 61), Trajtenberg warned, "You don't build a new socioeconomic model with nostalgia. We need to reinvent things." Socialism, in his opinion, failed miserably because it went against human nature. "The big challenge," he said, "is how to go along with human nature and build a fairer and more just society."

In the next elections, Trajtenberg is convinced that both the issues from the protests and the new generation of Israelis who care about them will play a significant role.

PM, Peres deplore segregation

Israel's prime minister and president came out against efforts by some haredim to segregate women in public. Civil liberties groups have complained about gender segregation in buses and public places frequented by haredim, and the shunning by some soldiers of female entertainment troupes in the military. Speaking last week at a conference on human trafficking, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said, "The place of women in public spaces must be ensured and equal. The segregation of women clashes not just with the democratic principles that we know and cherish. It also clashes with Jewish tradition," he said. President Shimon Peres told the same event that men should be free to avoid the company of women they're not related to, "But no man has the right to force a woman to sit in a place that he decides on."

Bridge reopened

The Mughrabi Bridge, which allows pedestrians to walk to the Temple Mount, was reopened 48 hours after it was closed due to safety concerns. The bridge was reopened Dec. 14, with a fire truck stationed nearby as a safety precaution. The Jerusalem city engineer last week threatened to order the immediate closure of the bridge, calling it a fire hazard that is in danger of collapsing. If the bridge does catch fire, it could quickly spread to the Temple Mount, the municipality has warned. On Dec. 13, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's inner cabinet decided to delay razing the bridge and to renovate instead. "The government's helplessness in dealing with this hazardous and dilapidated nuisance at the heart of the Western Wall and entrance to Temple Mount is regrettable," the municipality said in a statement after the decision. It urged the government to build a "permanent and safe walkway."

Apple plans R & D centre

Apple will open a development centre in Israel focusing on semiconductors, according to reports. The centre would be the first outside Apple's California headquarters, the Israeli business daily Globes reported. Aharon Aharon, a veteran in Israel's high-tech industry, reportedly has been hired to head the centre. The announcement came as the company enters talks to acquire its first Israel-based company, Anobit Ltd. of Herzliya, a flash storage solutions provider. Apple's corporate vice-president of research and development, Ed Frank, visited Israel last week, and reportedly met with several Israeli high-tech companies.

Russia intercepts material

Israeli media reported that Russian authorities aborted an attempt to smuggle radioactive materials to Iran. The radioactive sodium was reportedly apprehended by Russia's Federal Customs Service at Moscow's Sheremetyevo airport from luggage bound for Iran. The report indicated that the luggage pieces contained sodium-22, a radioactive isotope of sodium that could only be produced at a nuclear reactor. Last month, the German newspaper Die Welt reported that North Korea has supplied Syria and Iran with a special kind of steel, called maraging steel, used to upgrade missiles and build centrifuges for uranium enrichment. It has been known for years that Iran is trying to obtain the steel through clandestine purchasing networks around the world. The steel would enable Tehran to construct modified centrifuges, which would in turn allow it to enrich higher quality uranium at a faster speed. According to the report, the delivery of the steel is part of a wider North Korean expertise package to Syria, which is building a new missile factory near Homs. The factory is reportedly partly funded by Iran, and is expected to become operational within 18 months. Maraging steel would significantly upgrade Syria's Scud missile capabilities and the amount of damage the missiles' warheads could inflict.

Seniors facing elder abuse over money

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A "perfect storm" of financial abuse is brewing and the potential victims are among the country's most vulnerable individuals.

Senior citizens who have accumulated some wealth are increasingly facing elder abuse in financial matters, according to a recent report of the parliamentary committee on palliative and compassionate care.

Baby boomers are the wealthiest generation in history and the largest group of seniors ever. As they begin to retire, "their children with some of the highest debt loads in history and a generalized sense of entitlement, can be tempted to look at their parents' nest egg as a potential source of capital," the parliamentary report states.

Financial abuse causes stress and leads to psychological and medical effects. The committee recommended co-ordinating a multilevel response involving public guardians and trustee offices across the country, along with police and the financial sector.

As a lawyer specializing in wills, Les Kotzer has witnessed instances of elder financial abuse up close. He's seen families at odds over the disposition of parental assets. He's advised seniors afraid to talk to their children about money. And he's seen middle-aged "waiters" running up debt in anticipation of a big payday when they inherit their parents' estates.

"I'm seeing it and hearing it," he told The CJN.

A public figure who appears regularly on radio and television programs, he often hears after the show from distraught families about the bad blood engendered by fights over wealth.

Greed, a sense of entitlement and financial illiteracy all contribute to the coming "tsunami of financial abuse," he said. And parents who love their children often don't expect to be let down by those closest to them. As a result, they get into situations in which trusting in others puts them into dire financial straits.

"Beware" those who could take advantage of you, he cautions, and "be aware" of your financial situation.

One common pitfall is the move to put parents' assets into joint ownership with their children. Those doing so are hoping to avoid probate fees, since joint assets on death immediately vest in the survivor. Probate fees, as a result, are avoided.

But the savings are relatively modest on even valuable properties – about $15,000 on a $1 million property, he said. And there's a danger attached to joint ownership, one that parents may not be considering. If their child gets into debt, a creditor can force sale of the property to recover the amount owing.

One unhappy mom called him after she received a creditor's letter saying they wanted to put up her house for sale.

Another hazard occurs when a parent, trusting their child, lends them money without documenting the loan. After appearing on a television show warning about the practice, Kotzer received a call from a 70-year-old woman who was working at two jobs. Her late husband had loaned their two children $100,000 and $150,000, respectively, and when she asked her daughter for the money, she was told that if she asked her husband to pay it back, he might divorce her. Her son told her the money wasn't a loan, but a gift, and he wouldn't return it. He even told his mom she'd have to take him to court if she disputed that, Kotzer related.

His advice: "You must get it in writing."

Giving up control of their finances is another problem for seniors, Kotzer continued. He recounted a story told to him by a woman who was standing behind an elderly lady in a supermarket checkout counter. The woman was frantically searching through her purse for nickels and dimes to pay a bill and customers in the line were getting agitated. The woman offered the elderly lady some money, and later, when they were outside, the senior offered to send her a cheque the next month for the sum.

But why wait until next month for such a trifling amount? The senior had turned over all her money to her children to avoid taxes. She received a monthly allowance from her kids, and she feared they would yell at her if she asked for more.

Kotzer's advice: "Be very careful when you give up control of your assets to your children to save taxes or probate." The unfortunate reality is that "children won't always give you your money back."

Many seniors make a mistake in relying exclusively on their children to draw up their wills, he continued. In one case, a senior told him that only one of his children was named as an executor of his estate, which allowed him to bill the estate for work he did. On another occasion, the child gave himself plum assets, allocating less-desirable properties to siblings.

Kotzer offers clients free review of their wills and will consult with parents only if the beneficiaries are absent.

Kotzer believes the parliamentary committee hit the nail on the head when it said highly indebted baby boomers see their parents' assets as an easy way to pay off their bills. Many feel the money will be coming to them anyway, so they might as well spend it now, he said.

To illustrate the point, he tells of a middle-aged couple that drove up to his office in a fancy car, wore expensive watches and lived in a pricey part of town. Their jobs could not have afforded them their lavish lifestyle, especially when the wife said her husband was a "waiter." Not the kind that works in restaurants, she said. "'He's waiting for his mom to die to get the house and pay off all his debts.'"

Not all the stories end badly, though. Kotzer recalled one incident in which a mom had turned over her house to her daughter after she'd been threatened that she'd die in her own urine and filth if she refused.

Later, the mother visited Kotzer's office by herself and had him "make a new will and cut her daughter out."

Singer, the Nobel Prize and Yiddish today

The California-based academic and psychoanalyst Janet Hadda released a revised edition of her biography Isaac Bashevis Singer: A Life (Univ. of Wisconsin Press) in 2003.

A year later, during the centenary year of Singer's birth, amidst a good deal of celebration, there were no small number of dissenters. Yiddishists who did not accept Singer's dominance over contemporary Yiddish literary life.

Inna Grade, the widow of the Yiddish writer Chaim Grade, had this to say about the travelling exhibits, the birthday bash at the Forward newspaper, and readings at museums and libraries: "I profoundly despise him. I am very sorry that America is celebrating the blasphemous buffoon."

All of this might seem like a soupçon of farce mixed with post-Holocaust bitterness, if not for the fact that the legacy of Yiddish writers and their milieu looms unavoidably large today. But why, when so few Yiddish readers remain and the economics of translating and publishing literary books becomes increasingly difficult?

Reviewed by

Norman Ravvin

For anyone in search of an understanding of prewar Jewish Europe, its decimation and its survival in major centres like New York, Yiddish is a key resource.

Singer's career and personal life straddle these phenomena in unusual ways. Born into a lower-class family from small-town Poland, his childhood was spent on the now-iconic Krochmalna Street, in Jewish Warsaw, where his father presided over a rabbinical court.

Pinchos Menachem Singer received his neighbours' questions related to ritual life, marriage and business. Following the example of his older brother and sister, Singer left his parents' observant way of life in favour of another kind of court. His chosen cultural home was at the Warsaw Yiddish Writers' Club, situated off a courtyard in the shadow of the Great Synagogue on Tlomackie Street.

Hadda is assured in her portrayal of the club's peculiar culture, its community of women who "preached free love," and the attention it drew from the researchers at YIVO, who came to record its "treasure-trove of jokes, curses, vulgar expressions, anecdotes."

It was at the club where Singer befriended Melech Ravitch, a writer he would look to for advice in later years when Ravitch had settled in Montreal and Singer had departed Warsaw for Manhattan.

Biographies are strangely selective texts, following their author's inclinations as carefully as those of their subject. Hadda is most interested in the gradual shifts, during Singer's American years, which led him to gain the kind of reputation that might befit the recipient of the Nobel Prize in literature. Upon receiving it in 1978, Singer found himself a figure representative of the entire Yiddish literary tradition, especially what survived of it after the Holocaust.

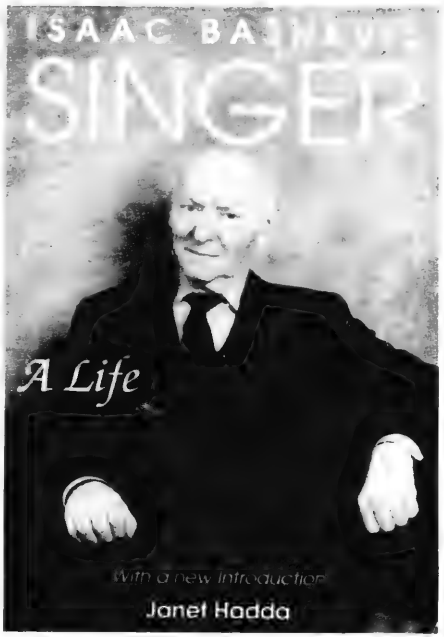
Upon arriving in New York City in 1935, Singer saw his own predicament and that of Yiddish in a dark light: "In spite of everything, it's sad, and it's sad because here in New York I see even more clearly than in Poland that there is no Yiddish literature, that there is no one to work for. There is a crazy Jewish people here which keeps slightly kosher... and awaits Marxism for the people of the world. But it doesn't need Yiddish literature. We built on a paper bridge."

In his early fiction and journalism for the Forverts, Singer embarked on a recreation of his lost Polish world. Here Hadda reminds us of the particularities of prewar Yiddish life that a writer like Singer offers: "His characters would speak the endless dialect varieties of Polish cities, towns and shtetlach. Their conflicts would be the eternal Jewish conflicts around God, the community and their private Jewish souls." Routinely, key aspects of these ethnographic portraits were lost in translation. And Singer himself gradually shifted his attention to the lives of Polish Jewish survivors living out their troubled lives in Manhattan and Florida.

Hadda points to the misapprehensions so common to the reception of Singer's translated works. Even the Nobel committee, arguably, had him wrong, in describing only one aspect of Singer's work as deserving of its prize. The Swedish Academy highlighted what it called Singer's "redeeming melancholy, sense of humour and clear-sightedness" in his portrayal of eastern European Jewish life, "such as it was lived in cities and villages, in poverty and persecution, and imbued with sincere piety and rites combined with blind faith and superstition. Its language was Yiddish – the language of the simple people." (When Singer accepted his prize in Stockholm his speech cited Baudelaire, Poe and Strindberg, as if to counter the notion that his was a literature of simple folk.)

It's true that in his early work, such as the much anthologized Gimpel the Fool, Singer mined the many meanings of simplicity, but in his mature novels, including Shadows on the Hudson and Enemies, A Love Story, it is the complexities of culture and damaged personalities that drive his narratives.

The propensity for getting Singer wrong, to be peeved by his subject matter, may reflect the difficulty non-Yiddish readers have accessing aspects of his Yiddish worldview and the prewar context that underwrites it. The same inability to read Singer in the original may contribute to the kind of celebratory treatment he now receives in Warsaw, where every summer a Singer Festival is attended by locals and tourists alike, in the area of the once-Jewish Grzybowski Square. This past summer crowds attended theatre presentations, klezmer acts and performances by bands from Israel, the United States and Canada. Singer's visage haunts the event on flags and banners, his crooked smile a reminder of the ease with which readers have misread, or read their own expectations into his work.



Norman Ravvin's recent books include the novel The Joyful Child (Gaspereau), and Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein, which he co-edited with Sherry Simon (McGill-Queen's).

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

An impressionistic biopic of Mordecai Richler

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The late, great Canadian novelist Mordecai Richler is the subject of a cogent biopic to be broadcast on Citytv on Dec. 25 at 8:30 p.m.

M.G. Vassanji on Mordecai Richler, directed by Lewis Cohen, is part of an extensive series on stellar Canadians, Extraordinary Canadians, which will air in Mandarin, Hindi and Italian on OMNI TV in the spring of 2012.

It's narrated by Vassanji, a Hindu Canadian who has written a biography on Richler and who, like Richler, was brought up in what he describes as "a closed community."

While Richler, the son of east European Orthodox Jewish immigrants, came of age on St. Urbain Street in Montreal and developed his talents in Spain, France and Britain before returning to Canada as a celebrity, Vassanji was born in Kenya, raised in Tanzania and educated in the United States before settling in Canada, where he has had a distinguished career as a writer and editor.

Given the broadly overlapping themes in their respective backgrounds, Vassanji is well placed to understand and appreciate the forces that shaped Richler.

He met Richler at a reading in Montreal and was struck by his humility and kindness. Some critics might disagree with Vassanji's flash assessment of Richler's prickly personality, but one can assume he had good reasons to form this appraisal.

In this impressionistic documentary, based on file footage and old interviews with the man himself, Vassanji traces the trajectory of Richler's life in conventional chronological order and laces it with pungent personal commentary.

But prior to setting out the details, he makes an important point, arguing that Richler, far from having painted himself into a corner by focusing exclusively on the Jewish experience in Canada, portrayed characters and depicted situations that were quintessentially Canadian at their core.

Richler was born in 1931 into what would be a dysfunctional family. His parents, Moe and Lilly, were locked in a loveless marriage that broke apart after Lilly's indiscreet affair with an Austrian Jewish refugee/boarder in their cold-water flat. The affair, the topic of embarrassing gossip, alienated Richler, who remained estranged from Lilly. Richler, however, was relatively close to his father.

At Baron Byng High School, Richler was a bright but rebellious student. He continued his education at Sir George Williams University, writing for the campus newspaper, but soon dropped out. Eager to leave Montreal's Jewish ghetto, and anxious to hone his skills as an aspiring writer, Richler went to Paris.

Although he valued his independence, he relied on his parents for handouts. Without their financial assistance, he could not have survived in Paris. "The umbilical cord was long," Vassanji wryly observes.

After nine months in the City of Light, Richler moved to a Spanish island, where he finished his first novel, The Rotten People. When the 400-page manuscript was rejected by publishers, Richler returned to Montreal and rewrote it. The novel was published under the title of The Acrobat. Richler was only 22.

In Vassanji's judgment, it was not "authentic," falling short of the mark in recreating Jewish Montreal. Vassanji has words of praise for Richler's second book, Son of a Smaller Hero, which he wrote in London. Though it was clearly autobiographical, Richler disingenuously insisted it was not.

At this juncture, Vassanji segues to Richler's love life. His first marriage, to a francophone Canadian, upset his father. In any case, the union did not endure. Richler met Florence Wood, a model, and divorced his wife to marry her. Deeply in love, they remained devoted to each other.

Mordecai Richler at work

Vassanji claims that with the publication of The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, Richler found his true voice as a biting satirist. With St. Urbain's Horseman under his belt, he moved back to Montreal, hungry for new Canadian material. Montreal inspired him. Richler produced three novels in the next few years: Joshua Then and Now, Solomon Gursky Was Here and Barney's Version.

Though this film ends somewhat abruptly, it gives a viewer a rounded picture of one of Canada's greatest literary figures.

Bubble Wrap Kids: A new series on Slice TV helps overprotective parents loosen up and let their kids experience more freedom. In Bubble Wrap Kids, host Lenore Skenazy counsels parents who won't let their kids use forks and knives, ride bikes or leave the backyard; even some who monitor their kids with walkie-talkies and video cameras. The goal is to help their kids become independent adults.

Skenazy gained fame after she let her nine-year-old ride the New York City subway by himself; when press reports dubbed her "America's worst mom," her feisty response was a blog and a book, Free-Range Kids: How to Raise Safe, Self-Reliant Children (Without Going Nuts with Worry) that catapulted her into the spotlight. The show is produced by Cineflix Inc. of Toronto, in association with Shaw Media, Astral Media and TLC International. Premières Jan. 3, 9 p.m.

Names in the News: Matthew Miller, who as the American Jewish, chassidic reggae artist Matisyahu became a musical superstar, stated that he had shorn his trademark beard and other trappings of his ba'al tshuvah lifestyle.

The revelation prompted JTA to issue a worldwide bulletin. "Sorry folks, all you get is me… no alias," he wrote. "When I started becoming religious 10 years ago, it was a very natural and organic process. It was my choice. My journey to discover my roots and explore Jewish spirituality – not through books but through real life. At a certain point, I felt the need to submit to a higher level of religiosity… to move away from my intuition and to accept an ultimate truth… I am reclaiming myself. Trusting my goodness and my divine mission."

Because of some confusion that followed, the singer then posted a tweet saying: "For all those who are confused, today I went to the mikvah and shul just like yesterday."

Esquire magazine once called Matisyahu "the most intriguing reggae artist in the world" and Billboard named him the top reggae artist in 2006. Pundits are already asking whether his fan base will shrink now that he has traded his chassidic look in favour of a clean-cut, non-denominational image. "Is his music truly good enough that he will continue to be successful when he is no longer a poster boy for anything other than himself?" Heeb Magazine asked.

Marilyn Lightstone recalls role in classic film

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The newly restored version of a classic Canadian film, Lies my Father Told Me, will be presented by Vision TV in a world premiere television broadcast Dec. 27 at 9 p.m.

Probably no one is more thrilled by this announcement than Toronto actor, radio broadcaster and multimedia artist Marilyn Lightstone, who appeared in the 1975 movie and considers her role in it as one of the finest of her career.

"The role and the movie are very special to me because the characters are iconic, and a lot of people identified with it in a very personal way," she said, calling the film something of a time capsule. "It has stuck in the consciousness of the community."

Lies My Father Told Me, based on a story by Montreal writer Ted Allan and directed by Academy Award-winning Czech director Jan Kadar, was nominated for an Oscar for best original screenplay and won the 1976 Golden Globe for best foreign film.

Lightstone, starring in her first feature film as Annie Herman, a 1920s Montreal Jewish housewife and mother, picked up prizes as best actress from ACTRA (the Alliance of Canadian Cinema, Television and Radio Artists) and the Canadian Film Awards, the precursor of the Genies.

Thirty-five years on, Lightstone's upbeat appraisal of it remains remarkably intact.

"I thought it was a jewel when we made it, and I think it is every bit as meaningful now," she said. "Perhaps because it was a period piece, it doesn't feel, sound or look dated in any way. It's a film about family relationships, the basis of the greatest dramas ever written."

Shot on location in Montreal, Lies my Father Told Me unfolds through the eyes of David Herman (Jeffrey Lynas), a precocious seven-year-old boy caught between two opposing forces – the traditional Orthodox Jewish values of his grandfather (Yossi Yadin) and the material ambitions of his parents.

Widely praised by critics, it was described by the Canadian Jewish News as a film about "a boy's evolving view of the world, the vagaries of human nature and the Jewish experience in Canada."

The actor as she appears in Lies My Father Told Me.

Marilyn Lightstone in her art studio

Lightstone – the current host of Nocturne on Canada's only all-classical radio station, 96.3 FM – was in her mid-30s and playing Mary, Queen of Scots, at the Charlottetown Festival in Prince Edward Island when she was asked to audition for the part.

"It was at the very beginning of my career, so I imagine I wanted it a lot," she recalled. "Mostly, I thought I was a natural for it because I'd grown up with people like this in my family and community.

"In fact," she added, "the locale for the film was very close to the streets where I was born and grew up. Not much research was required."

To Lightstone, the story line was similar as well. "All I had to do was think of my mother, who was also caught between her parents and her husband. The situation was very familiar to me, as I was born into it and didn't have to look anywhere but my own childhood for inspiration."

Lightstone's parents, however, were not immigrants.

"They were both born in Montreal, as were their brothers and sisters. My maternal grandmother was still very much of a Yiddishe bubbie, but my paternal grandparents immigrated to Canada when they were children and were really quite assimilated."

Although Kadar (The Shop On Main Street) cast her, Lightstone exchanged few words with him on set.

"He was a childless man who loved children and was very absorbed with Jeffrey Lynas, who was at the heart of the film. Kadar was having a lot of problems and was very stressed."

Looking back, Lightstone expressed contentment at having been hired.

"Ted Allan's script was wonderful, I had a fair amount of screen time, and the actors I worked with were great. Except for little Jeffrey, we all understood this world viscerally, inside and out. If we hadn't lived in it ourselves, our parents, grandparents, aunts and uncles had. Yiddishkeit is imprinted in the bones, after all.

"As for little Jeffrey, he was a revelation. He did instinctively what adults study how to do for years. I've worked with many, many children over the years, but Jeffrey was special."

Three years after Lies My Father Told Me, producer Robert Lantos cast Lightstone in the movie In Praise of Older Women.

"That was nice, but the character I played didn't nearly have the same emotional scope or screen time as Annie Herman."

In its wake, she acted in a succession of films and television shows, notably as Ms. Stacey in two popular miniseries, Anne of Green Gables and Road to Avonlea.

But there was a downside.

"Frankly, the 'biz' in Canada had a way, and perhaps still does, of stereotyping you ethnically. Not in the theatre, but on screen. If there was a role out there for a Jewish gal, I could always be sure of getting a call, which was nice.

"But it could be a millstone around your neck professionally. Thankfully, there were producers and directors out there, like Kevin Sullivan of Anne of Green Gables and Road to Avonlea, who were not of that ilk."

TEATRON Toronto Jewish Theatre presents
A Tiny Piece of Land
by Joni Browne-Walders & Mel Weiser
Directed by Ari Weisberg
After the untimely death of his wife, American dentist Barry impulsively makes his first trip to Israel. Happiness at the reunion with his long-estranged younger brother Yosi, is put to the test by events beyond their control. The play premiered last year in Los Angeles where it played to sold-out houses.

A disturbing look at hockey family's breakup

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Watching Tom Jefferson on late night TV talking about the physical and psychological abuse he endured at age 13 was almost as difficult as reading about it first.

In the summer of 2000, Tom accompanied his older brother, Mike, to a summer getaway with Mike's hockey coach and a bunch of older players. The venue was the cottage of Mike's junior coach, David Frost, and the description of the goings-on is cringe inducing, to say the least.

Veteran sports journalist Steve Simmons describes the event in a totally engrossing and quite disturbing new book, The Lost Dream: The Story of Mike Danton, David Frost and a Broken Canadian Family (Viking Canada).

In two weeks, Tom's life was changed forever. He admits to Simmons he no longer trusts anyone, he's always antsy and feels his life was ruined.

If that's what could happen to a youngster exposed for only two weeks to the environment fashioned by Frost, what about someone who was immersed in it for years?

Tom's older brother, Mike, was under Frost's spell for years and, like a member of a cult, can't seem to let it go.

Danton, who changed his name from Jefferson to sever all ties to his family, was convicted in the United States for hiring someone to kill Frost, his former coach and agent. Though he spent five years in jail for the offence, Danton subsequently contended it was really his father, Steve, he had contracted to have killed – even though Steve was not in the United States at the time and the "hit man" was given a photo of Frost to identify the victim.

Simmons traces the Danton saga from his days as a hardworking teen hockey star in Brampton, Ont., and Toronto to his inclusion in a talented clique of hockey players held by some strange power in Frost's sway.

Readers will be exposed to the world of minor hockey and the progression of players all the way to the NHL.

Drafted by the New Jersey Devils, Danton was traded to St. Louis and was in the midst of a playoff run in 2004 when he was frantically trying to arrange Frost's murder.

Particularly revealing in the book is the close-knit, almost incestuous, relationships between prominent hockey personalities. Frost, for instance, was married to a woman whose father was the former director of NHL officiating. Bob Goodenow, who went on to head the National Hockey League Players' Association, was Frost's unofficial assistant coach with the Young Nationals and was instrumental in getting him certified as a player agent – even after Jefferson's weeks in hell were revealed.

Steve Simmons

Mike Gillis, for whom Frost worked as a "bird dog," finding players, was brought on to serve as Danton's agent. He's now the general manager of the Vancouver Canucks.

Bill Wirtz, the late owner of the Chicago Blackhawks, wrote a letter to the NHL and the players' association asking how someone like Frost could be certified as an agent after being vetted by the players' organization.

Sheldon Keefe, who as a young man was part of the Frost entourage, now coaches a successful Tier II junior team in Pembroke. And so on…

While the description of minor hockey and the pro ranks is revealing, Simmons is most effective in describing the way Danton's infatuation with Frost broke up the Jefferson family, causing immense pain and a sense of loss.

The story is about more than hockey and abuse of players, Simmons said. "It's about control and how a guy 'kidnapped' a kid."

Steve, Sue and Tom Jefferson are primary sources for the book; Simmons admits Danton refused to speak to him.

The family, particularly Steve, got caught up in the pursuit of the NHL dream and let pass incidents that should have ended their son's association with Frost.

"I think the mother saw everything, but wasn't a strong enough person to do what she needed to do," Simmons said. "She probably can't get through a day without crying."

Does the hockey world share some of the blame for allowing Frost to rise to prominence while exercising unnatural control over his players? At St. Michael's Majors, for instance, management saw that Frost was creating a poisonous atmosphere on the team, controlling the play on the ice of four of his Brampton-area players. Feeling they were losing control of the team, management traded Frost's players elsewhere.

"Can you blame them?" asks Simmons. "They were doing the best for their own interests."

Ultimately, it's up to parents to be their son's most aggressive advocate, he said. "If you're a parent with a child in high level sport, it's your responsibility to know the coach and what is going on.

"That's true in other sports, too. You have to know who is the coach, what's he doing with your child and is your child changing."

What happened to the Jefferson family, the estrangement of Frost's wife from her parents, "is not natural," said Simmons. "That's not hockey. That's the weirdness of this group."

So what has become of the book's protagonists?

Tom Jefferson lives with his parents in Brampton – their attempts at contacting Danton have been repeatedly rebuffed. Frost has taken his wife's maiden name and splits his time between California and Ontario. Danton, after being released from prison, studied psychology at Saint Mary's University in Halifax and played on the school's varsity hockey team. He's now in Sweden, playing third-division hockey, the lowest level of the pro sport.

And, according to Simmons' sources, he's still in contact with Frost.

Canadian helps African AIDS orphans go to school

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

When Leeat Weinstock was 12 years old, she attended private school. She had a lavish bat mitzvah and a gorgeous dress to wear for the occasion.

She never went to bed hungry, never worried about shelter or getting an education.

Meanwhile in Africa, more than 40 million children are denied the right to a primary education. Weinstock, now 32, witnessed this reality first-hand.

In 2009, Weinstock was in Mwanza, Tanzania, volunteering for Busega Children's and Development Services Assistance (BCDSA), a small grassroots NGO that runs a microfinance program, HIV/AIDS awareness and support programs, and a rural orphanage for 26 children.

During her time in Tanzania, she met a boy named Robert who visited her office several times a week seeking money to go to school. Matthew Shadrack, BCDSA's director, told Weinstock that Robert, 12, is the second of three boys.

His father died of AIDS, and his mother now cares for him and his brothers. In a good week, Robert's mother earns about $5.

On each visit to the office, Robert was dressed in the same T-shirt, which had more holes than fabric, the same pair of dirty worn-out shorts, and the same pair of barely wearable flip-flops, Weinstock said.

The year before, Shadrack had sent Robert and his brother, Peter, to school with money from his own pocket, since BCDSA, which is underfunded, couldn't provide the funds.

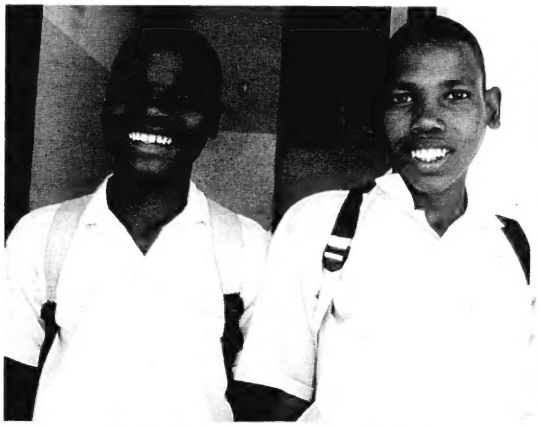
Unfortunately, Shadrack no longer had the personal means to support the boys, as he wasn't even earning a salary from BCDSA. After learning of this situation, Weinstock immediately made it her mission to send Robert and Peter to school.

Weinstock accompanied Shadrack to the boys' school to visit the headmistress. After a brief meeting, Robert and Peter were registered and ensured admittance once they had the proper uniforms.

The headmistress had a list that included more than 50 names of local orphans who needed financial support for school fees and/or food. Robert and Peter's names were on the list.

"Mr. Shadrack, Robert, Peter and I set off to the main market in town to buy uniforms and other school supplies. While the day was full of smiles and many firsts – Robert and Peter bought their first pair of shoes and enjoyed their first ice cream cone – it was also one of mixed emotion for me," Weinstock said.

Project Waza founder Leeat Weinstock helps Tanzanian orphans graduate from high school.



Robert and Peter on their first day of school

"As we walked through the market, we passed by countless street kids begging for money and food. They looked no different than Robert and Peter. The only difference was that I could not afford to help them all."

After Robert and Peter's first day of school, the boys came to see Weinstock at the BCDSA office dressed in their uniforms.

"I cried. They looked so different I almost didn't recognize them. I was completely overwhelmed," she said.

Weinstock later sent an e-mail to friends and family about her experience. In response, she received "an unexpected and overwhelming amount of support" from people who also wanted to send a child to school.

"One of these was my former MBA classmate at the Rotman School of Management [at the University of Toronto], Randy Gladman, who fundraised on his own and raised $3,000 in a matter of weeks. With the money raised, we were able to send 50 orphaned children to school that year."

Weinstock called the initiative Project Waza. Waza means 'imagine' in Swahili.

"Project Waza is committed to ensuring that orphaned kids in Tanzania graduate from high school and have a real opportunity to better their lives," she said. Now entering her fourth year of fundraising, Weinstock said she hopes to send 65 children back to school for 2012.

She has met all of the kids that her project supports and has promised them that, together with her friends in Canada, she will ensure they graduate from high school.

"I am now doing everything in my power to keep that promise. One year of school is great, but a full education is what is truly needed."

To date, Weinstock has raised more than $10,000 to send African children to school, and more than $25,000 that includes grant money she has worked to obtain to build a new orphanage for 26 of the 65 orphans her project is supporting.

"One hundred per cent of the funds go directly to the students," she said.

The children that Weinstock supports range in age from seven to 18 years and come from communities in and around Mwanza. All 65 boys and girls have been affected by HIV/AIDS, with most of the children having lost one or both parents to the disease. Twenty-six of the children and adolescents live in the rural orphanage that Busega runs.

"This coming year, 13 of the girls we are supporting will be attending high school. This is a huge accomplishment in and of itself, as school attendance rates drop dramatically in high school, especially for girls, many of whom are expected to help their families and take care of younger siblings."

Weinstock said she believes education is one of the best ways to provide orphaned and vulnerable children in Tanzania the opportunity for a better future.

"Education contributes to improved health, higher income and greater gender equality. It provides skills and knowledge that empower impoverished kids to create a better future for themselves, their families and their society.

"Here in Canada, we take for granted that we have access to free primary and secondary school education. In many parts of the world, children are denied even the basic right to attend primary school."

Weinstock said her experiences in Tanzania have made her that much more appreciative of the good things in her life, especially her education.

"After volunteering in Mwanza in 2009, my interests and career goals completely shifted. In addition to universal education, I am most interested in social finance and impact/mission-related investing to create positive change in our local communities and around the world."

"תראי את כל הבלונדינים הקטנים האלה." אומרת לי טלי, כשאנו מתבוננות בשורה הצוהלת של הילדים הממתינים בתור כדי להצטלם על ירכו השמנמנה של סנטה קלאוס חייכן. "כל הנוצרים הקטנים האלה."

טלי מנענעת בראשה. "גועל נפש." היא מסכמת, "רק תראי לאן הגענו."

אני: לאן הגענו? לקנדה הגענו. וזה נורא חמוד מבחינתי שישראלים מאמצים טיפה ממנהגי החג. מה רע בזה, כל עוד לא נכנסים להיבטים דתיים?

טלי: מה רע בזה? שאני אזכיר לך את מסעי הצלב אולי?

אני: מה זה שייך לסנטה האומלל? כולה נותן מתנות בלי הבדלי דת, גזע ומין.

טלי: ואפרופו מתנות, כל הבלגן הזה. בבית ספר של הבנות העמידו עץ ליד המזכירות, וכל מי שרוצה, שם מתנה לחברים או למורים. עכשיו. לקטנה יש שבע מורות! לגדולה חמש! תעשי חישוב עם עוד איזה עשרים ילד לשתיהן, וכל השבועיים האחרונים אני באטרף למצוא מתנה ספציפית לכל דורש.

אני: וכאילו שבישראל לא היית צריכה לקנות מתנות לחנוכה. הרי לכל בת-דודה רחוקה שעשתה טובה והזמינה לך את הילדים לשוקו וסופגניה, היית צריכה לקנות איזו ערכה קוסמטית לחג. אגב, אני רוצה ערכה קוסמטית לחג.

טלי: למה בדיוק את אומרת את זה לי?

אני: הרי אתם באים מחרתיים לנר חמישי, לשוקו ולסופגניה, לא?

טלי: שתהיי לי בריאה. לא רוצה את הסופגניות שלך. מאיר תמיד ממלא ריבת חלב וחלבה, ואני יוצאת פרה מיוסרת מהבית שלך. והלביבות שלו...אוי...יותר קל לגויים. כמה קלוריות יש כבר בסוכריות? אצלינו תמיד זה בצקים ושמן.

אני: נכון, כי אנחנו יודעים לחיות!

טלי: ברשותך, אני רוצה לחזור לענייני הכריסטמס. בכלל לא נחמד לי שהקטנה עושה ארטס אנד קראפטס של סנטה קלאוסים רוקדים עם פתיתי שלג.

אני: את מספרת לי? זה מטנף את השטיחים, כל הפתיתי שלג האלה מנייר.

טלי: אולי תפסיקי להתמקד בשטויות? זה נותן להם לגיטימציה. זה הכל.

אני: לגיטימציה למה? להתנצר? את חושבת שאם ילד יישב על הברכיים של שחקן מובטל שמגיש לו סוכרייה מהדולרמה, בדיוק אז, באותו רגע, הוא יחליט שזהו, שהוא פורש מהיהדות, שישו הוא מושיעו, והצלב הוא האקססורי החדש?

טלי: אני רק אומרת שצריך לשמור. הילדים הם עם מושפע מאוד, שתדעי לך. בכלל, למה שלא ישימו איזה מתיתיהו חשמונאי עם זקן לבן על כיסא עם סוכריות? הרי המציאו כבר חנוכה-בוש. זו קונקורנציה לגיטימית.

אני: או איזה יהודה מכבי חתיך ושרירי, שהאמהות היהודיות המתוסכלות יוכלו לשבת על ברכיו לשעה קלה, ולהביע אצלו את מישאלותיהן הכמוסות?

טלי: צחוק צחוק, אני לא רואה את הילדים שלך עומדים כאן בתור לסנטה.

אני: בטח שלא. זה איזה עשרים דולר לתמונה, השתגעתי?

NEW YEAR MINI MAC APPETIZER

1 1/2 tbls butter + some for brushing
1/4 c Parmesan cheese
2 tblsp flour
3/4 c milk
1 c packed shredded cheddar cheese
4 oz. Colby or Muenster cheese
1 egg yolk
1/4 tsp smoked paprika

Preheat oven to 425°. In large saucepan of boiling salted water, cook macaroni about 5 min. Drain. Brush mini muffin pan with butter. Sprinkle with 2 tblsp Parmesan; tap out excess. In large saucepan, melt butter. Whisk in flour over moderate heat for 2 min. Whisk in milk until boiling, about 5 min. Add cheeses and whisk until melted. Off the heat, whisk in egg yolk and paprika. Fold in macaroni. Spoon slightly rounded tablespoons of macaroni into prepared muffin cups, packing gently. Sprinkle each "muffin" with remaining cheese. Bake mini macs in oven about 10 min, until golden and sizzling. Cool 5 min. Using small spoon, carefully loosen mini macs, transfer to platter and serve.

RIP Warren

Warren is dead. He is out of misery and no longer has to panhandle, get beaten up or suffer through his horrible epileptic seizures. Warren is gone.

My colleagues and I were surprised Warren lasted so long on the streets, and when he passed away on Halloween, we quietly shared the sentiment, "Perhaps this is good, maybe Warren has found peace."

Warren, who was about 45, lived near Ve'ahavta's former offices at Yonge Street and Eglinton Avenue. He was on the streets for a long time. He was a scraggly impish, rascally elf of a man. Oliver. In some ways, he was what we expect homeless people to be – dishevelled outwardly, and eventually dishevelled from within – or so we surmised. In some ways, he was the polar opposite.

What happened in Warren's world? It's difficult to say other than that he drank, had epilepsy and was appreciated by most of the locals, businesspeople and many of the police and EMS. His baseball hat sat starkly in the middle of the walkway and seemed to jingle with enough coins for a meal – a solid measurable for investor confidence in the panhandler.

Warren was entrepreneurial. The word on the street was that he stashed cash. Sometimes this effusive, gentle man complained that the hospitals were cheap, not providing him tokens to get home to his underground parking lot.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Warren was born to parents, and throughout his life, he loved his mother and spent time with her One winter morning, Warren told me his mother had died. A few months later, he said he had been with his mother, at her place, the night before. (A long time ago, I stopped asking about the inconsistencies in street people's stories. What for?)

Sporting Life hires a police officer to direct traffic. Warren used to be a manager there. He used to walk the floors of this busy, upbeat store, no doubt encouraging staff to educate themselves about the various sweatsuit weaves. Then, later on, after the seizures took him over, we'd frequently find Warren sitting on the pavement with a gash on his forehead or deep cuts on his fingers. These two disparate images are challenging.

Some "homeful" people would hit Warren. There are those individuals who are shirty, resent the homeless and will smack them in the head as they walk to work. The homeless must make them feel vulnerable.

I wondered what Warren brought to our world, what his journey into Canaan was all about.

Warrren needed community and found it on the streets. Mine is Ve'ahavta. Yours may be the Agudah or Beth Tikvah Congregation or Holy Blossom Temple. He taught me that my universe is contained, just as his was. Warren showed me that, in some ways, we are all homeless, alone in our existence. And he represented "the stranger" mentioned 39 times in the Torah, and how it is our responsibility to take care of them. His life insisted on tikkun olam. We could have exploited him.

There was something panjandrum, self-important about Warren, and despite the beatings, the cold, the heat, alcoholism, epilepsy, loneliness and disappointment, he never lost the twinkle in his eye. He was vacantly present and kept his playful personality intact until the end. He smiled a lot.

Now Warren is being eulogized in The CJN, unlike another homeless person who might have died, alone and unknown, last night in Parkdale. RIP Warren.
